AUTHORS' INTRODUCTION

To write a history is but to commit to words in type events as they have transpired, and to be pure history, it must be colored as little as possible by the views or personal opinions of the writers.

In presenting this history of Randolph county, the authors have attempted in every instance, to refrain from the expression of their opinions and to give the facts—indeed, it will be noticed, by the careful observer, that the same incident is given, in some instances, in different language, in more than one place, because coming from different sources of seemingly equal authority. We make no claims to originality, but have, with great care and much labor, sifted every possible particle of information, hoping from the mass to collect the best and most important facts and events for preservation.

It has been impossible to publish all of the matter placed at our disposal; much has, no doubt, been omitted which should have been published, and much, perhaps, has been published which the reader will consider superfluous. Much information, in the possession of those who should have been glad to furnish it, has been omitted for lack of interest of those parties and their failure to furnish us the facts, though often requested so to do.

The authors desire to express their appreciation of the assistance of Enos Lollar, W. P. Noffsinger, Willard Upham, Beeson Bros., Elijah Peacock, H. S. Wood, and many others who have helped in this work. Especially do they desire to pay tribute to the faithful and careful work of Rev. Ebenezer Tucker who labored in gaining special information of the pioneers among whom he lived.

The earnest endeavor, on the part of the authors, to give a complete history of the county to June 30, 1914, will, we trust, be appreciated.

JOHN L. SMITH,
LEE L. DRIVER.

PREFACE

All life and achievement is evolution; present wisdom comes from past experience, and present commercial prosperity has come only from past exertion and suffering. The deeds and motives of the men who have gone before have been instrumental in shaping the destinies of later communities and states. The development of a new country was at once a task and a privilege. It required great courage, sacrifice and privation. Compare the present conditions of the people of Randolph county, Indiana, with what they were one hundred years ago. From a trackless wilderness and virgin land, it has come to be a center of prosperity and civilization, with millions of wealth, systems of railways, grand educational institutions, splendid industries and immense agricultural and mineral productions. Can any thinking person be insensible to the fascination of the study which discloses the aspirations and efforts of the early pioneers who so strongly laid the foundation upon which has been reared the magnificent prosperity of later days? To perpetuate the story of these people and to trace and record the social, political and industrial progress of the community from its first inception is the function of the local historian. A sincere purpose to preserve facts and personal memoirs that are deserving of perpetuation, and which unite the present to the past, is the motive of the present publication. The work has been in the hands of able writers, who have, after much patient study and research, produced here the most complete historical memoirs of Randolph county ever offered to the public. A specially valuable and interesting department is that devoted to the sketches of representative citizens of this county whose records deserve preservation because of their worth, effort and accomplishment. The publishers desire to extend their thanks to the citizens of Randolph county for the uniform kindness with which they have regarded this undertaking and for their many services rendered in the gaining of necessary information.

In placing the "History of Randolph County, Indiana," before the citizens, the publishers can conscientiously claim that they have carried out the plan as outlined in the prospectus. Every biographical sketch in the work has been submitted to the party interested, for correction, and therefore any error of fact, if there be any, is solely due to the person for whom the sketch was prepared. Confident that our efforts to please will fully meet the approbation of the public, we are,

Respectfully,

THE PUBLISHERS.

HISTORICAL

CHAPTER I.

THE GENESIS OF THE COUNTY.

All things must have a beginning. To trace the beginnings of the original inhabitants the limits of Randolph county is of course impossible. The first people of which we have a trace left nothing but a few mounds and embankments by which we might know them.

That Randolph county was inhabited by these people known as the "Mound Builders" goes without question. Traces of their work and art are found in various parts of the county. Their mounds, or look-outs, are still fairly well preserved; their "fort," the only one in this portion of Indiana, is still partially preserved. It is to be regretted that much of it has been destroyed, we know nothing of these people except that they lived and built a few crude mounds and forts. We are but little interested in their welfare, because they have left nothing by which the world is wiser or better. No nation, as well as individual, can hope to have future generations interested in its life unless it has left something by which humanity has been made better.

From whence the mound builders came, or whither they went is only a matter of conjecture. They attained some degree of skill but certainly had no very high degree of civilization.

Their successor or the Indian dates back to the time of tradition and yet the Indians had no tradition of the mound builders, so great was their antiquity.

The first inhabitants of Randolph county, so far as the knowledge of the Indian goes, were the Miami Indians. The Miamis were a fierce war-like tribe that inhabited practically all the Northwest Territory as well as other portions of the middle west. The Iroquois, on the east, were also a fierce war-like tribe and overcame the Miamis about two hundred years ago. The Miamis, however, with the support of the other Indians and the French, succeeded in driving the Iroquois back into New York and again claiming the control of the middle west. That the Miamis laid claim to the land in this county is clearly shown by a speech made on the 22nd of July in council at Greenville, Ohio, by Little Turtle the head chief of the Miamis, and in his address to General Wayne, he said:

"I wish to inform you where your younger brothers, the Miamis lived, also the Potawatamies of St. Joseph together with the Wabash Indians. You have pointed out to us the boundary line of the Indians and the United States, but now I take the liberty to inform you that that line cuts off from the Indians a large portion of country which has been enjoyed by my fore-fathers time immemorial without molestation or dispute. The print of my ancestors' houses are everywhere to be seen in this portion. It is well known by all of my brothers present, that my fore-fathers kindled the first fire at Detroit; from thence he extended his line to the head water of the Scioto; from thence to its mouth; from thence, down the Ohio to the mouth of the Wabash; and from thence to Chicago, on Lake Michigan; at this place, I first saw my older brothers, the Shawnees."

General Wayne in the Treaty of Greenville recognized these claims and dealt with the Miami Indians accordingly.

Later on, 1809, an additional treaty was made with the Miamis at Ft. Wayne by which we gained the Twelve Mile Purchase. This purchase is a strip of land twelve miles wide, the western boundary of which is parallel to the boundary line established by the treaty of Greenville.

There is no history of Randolph county connected directly with any Indians as the county itself had very few Indians ever dwelling within its borders. The few who were here were of the roving type, traveling from one camp to another. The only Indian's name identified with the county is the word "Mississinewa."

The territory of which we are now a part was first organized in 1721 as Illinois county. The first government was attempted in 1779 when Col. John Todd, who bore the commission of county lieutenant of the county of Illinois, visited the old settlement of Vincennes and Kaskaskia for the purpose of organizing, among the inhabitants of these places, forms of temporary government, according to the provisions of the Acts of the General Assembly of Virginia of the previous October. But little headway was made with this organization. Indiana territory was organized, as such, by an Act of Congress May 7, 1800. By this act we received the name of "Indiana." Just why this territory should be called Indiana is not known. The word no doubt is a memorial to the Indians, who received their name from Columbus, when he thought he had discovered the East Indias. It perhaps was applied directly to this territory because a company of Englishmen, whose purpose it was to exploit this territory, named their company the "Indiana Company."

Had Thomas Jefferson's plan been adopted for the new territory, the northern part of this county would have been in the state of Metropotamia and the southern part would have been in the state of Saratoga, as the line dividing these two suggested states passed through Randolph county.

Settlers began to come in the county as early as 1814. Many of the easterners, especially of Virginia, had emigrated to the Carolinas and there being dissatisfied with local conditions, especially slavery, had come on into the then unsettled valley of the Mississippi. Among these settlers were the Wrights and the Ways, who started their homes along White river in and around Winchester. The Parkers, Thomases and Wilcutts came farther north and settled first in Wayne county, and then moved on over what is now the southern boundary of Randolph county. These people being Quakers and religiously opposed to slavery had left the Carolinas because of that institution, and came into the middle west to establish homes free from its pernicious influences.

By 1818 enough settlers were in the northern part of Wayne county to justify the organization of a new county, complete account of which is given under the chapter of "Organization," in this volume.

Courts were established and the wheels of government started.

The church became an early factor of the community for these people were indeed God-fearing, and were not of the rough and wild type to be found in many of the frontier settlements. The traveling minister, be his denomination what it may, found always a welcome into any of the homes where he might wish to stop. Settlers eager and anxious to hear the doctrines of their church discussed or to hear proclaimed from the lips of a good man, any doctrines that would lead to the betterment of society.

The peddler with his stock of goods upon his back was also a welcome visitor to the pioneer home. He not only provided the family with temporary needs, physically, but was the disseminator of news and gossip from one farm home to another.

The tavern soon became a necessity and many a farm home became the stopping place of the traveler. Some such homes bore splendid reputations and were always eagerly sought by the wayfarer. Regular taverns were kept in some of the settlements. The first to be built in Winchester was in 1819 by a Mr. McCool. Paul W. Way was also another early hotel keeper.

The justice of the peace was always a man of influence, however ignorant he might be of the law. He was no doubt limited in the finer arts of legal practice, but he had, and exercised, great authority. At first it might seem that he was an extremist, but it must be remembered that he had drastic laws to enforce. For example, horse stealing, upon second offense, was punishable by death, and a fine of $1.00 was assessed for each offense for "blaspheming in the name of God, Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost." Any one who "Marked a hog, shoat or pig other than his own, or changed the mark of a hog, shoat or pig, other than his own, should be fined in any sum not to exceed $10.00 and should have upon his or her bare back lashes not to exceed thirty-three."

It will be seen that travel was extremely difficult, as our rivers were not large enough to be navigable and paths had to be blazed through the unbroken forests. But man is a social being and the paths soon became trails and the trails became public highways. These usually led from one town to another, from one church or another or from the neighborhood mill. Indeed, the early mill became, what in later days, would be called a "social center." The railroads eventually came, and the problem of transportation was solved.

Many towns were "laid out" and their proprietors hoped to make a metropolis of them. Among the towns organized with bright hopes, but which never got beyond the dreams of the proprietors were, Randolph, in Wayne township, Castle, Mt. Holly, Allensville, Flemingsburg, Springborough, Rockingham, Steubenville, Royston, Newburg and Newtown. Others thrived for a few years but local conditions and locations conspired to defeat their becoming a metropolis. Others such as Deerfield, Windsor, Huntsville, Arba, and New Pittsburg were trading points of importance but were "killed by railroads missing them."

In the development of the county, in every institution or enterprise, it has been and will always continue to be the "survival of the fittest." The old must give way to the new; the problem of yesterday is solved today and becomes a memory tomorrow.

FIRST THINGS.

The first settler was Thomas W. Parker, on Nolan's Fork, in Greensfork township, west of Arba, in April, 1814.

The first boy in the country was Jesse Parker, son of Thomas Parker above, eight years old. He lived long at Bethel, Wayne county, Indiana, a jovial, hearty old man, honestly earning his living by the constant "rap, rap, rap of his well worn hammer." (Died near Lynn, fall of 1881.)

The first girls were Celia and Sarah Parker, daughters of Thomas and Anna Parker above. Sarah was burned to death when a girl; Celia was married to Benjamin Arnold, and resides at Arba.

The first woman was Anna Parker, wife of Thomas Parker above. Thomas and Anna Parker died more than eighty years ago.

The first county formed in what is now Indiana, was Knox county, created in 1790, under Governor St. Clair, with Vincennes as the county seat, and including all Indiana and Michigan, the settlers along the Ohio, a fort and garrison at Fort Wayne, and one at Detroit.

The first settlement in Indiana was at Vincennes, by the French (perhaps) in 1702. A post was established by Sieur Juchereau and Missionary Meret at that date.

When General Gage, a British officer, demanded of the French settlers at Vincennes that they should leave their homes and their lands, the French protested that they had held them by charter from the French King for seventy years, and that to drive them away now would be unjust and cruel, and they were allowed to remain.

The first county east of the "Old Boundary" (Wayne's), agreed on in 1795, was Dearborn, erected by Indiana Territory in 1803, settled in 1796, before any surveys had been made except the "gore" between the Ohio line and the "Old Boundary" line, which was surveyed in 1800, three years before, and embracing the whole region west of the Ohio line and east of Wayne's boundary.

Wayne county was organized in 1810, embracing all the territory east of the "New Boundary," and north of the southern boundary of the county.

Randolph county was organized in 1818, at first extending westward only to the west boundary of the Twelve Mile Purchase. It was first settled in 1814.

The first organization of the Northwest Territory was by the (old) Congress of the Confederation in 1787.

The first Governor was Gen. Arthur St. Clair, October 5, 1787.

The first capital of the Northwest Territory was Marietta, established by Governor St. Clair shortly after his appointment.

The first capital of the state of Indiana was Corydon, in Harrison county, in the southern part of the state, almost exactly south of Indianapolis.

The first Governor of Indiana was Jonathan Jennings, elected in 1816.

The first Representative for Randolph county was Ephraim Overman.

The first Senator was Patrick Baird, of Wayne county.

The first two townships in Randolph county were Greensfork and White River, established in 1818 by Eli Overman, John James, Benjamin Cox, country commissioners, and embracing the entire county.

The first road opened through the county was the "Quaker Trace," from Richmond to Fort Wayne, in 1817.

The first "public road" established was from Winchester to Lynn in 1819, at the May session of Commissioner's Court.

The first justice of the peace may have been John Wright. At any rate he officiated at the second wedding in February, 1819.

The first marriage license was issued by Charles Conway, clerk, to Jacob Wright and Sally Wright, February 2, 1819. They were married by John Gibson, a Methodist Episcopal minister.

The first licensed store was opened by William Connor, November, 1818, on sections 10, 18, 14, two or three miles northwest of (Old) Snow Hill, in Washington township. (Jesse Connor, son of John Connor, and nephew of this William Connor says that he was born in that first store, and that the place was where Lynn now is, and not as above stated. Mr. Jesse Connor was born, however, not before 1831, thirteen years after this store was licensed. This William Connor was a bachelor, and unsettled in residence and business.)

The first town laid out was Winchester in November, 1818.

The first house in Winchester was built in the spring of 1819. It was a round log-cabin, one story, "scutched down" with clapboard roof and stick and clay chimney. It stood on inlot No. 9, north front, and was owned and occupied for many years by Martin Comer.

The first steam-mill was built at Winchester by Elias Kizer, in about 1835. It stood on Salt creek on the north side of Washington street.

The first steam engine brought to the county was for that mill.

The first dwelling in the county was erected by Thomas Parker, in the spring of 1814, on Nolan's Fork, west of Arba.

The first meeting-house was built by the Friends, at Arba, in the fall of 1815.

The first school was taught in Friends' meeting-house at Arba, during the winter of 1815-16, by Eli Overman.

The first Methodist meeting was held at the dwelling of Ephraim Bowen, northwest of Arba, in 1815.

The first Methodist sermon was preached by the Rev. Holman, of Louisville, Kentucky, at the cabin of Ephraim Bowen, in the year of 1815.

The first white child born in the county was Robert Thomas, son of John W. Thomas, the second settler in the county. The child was born near Arba, December 18, 1814.

The second child was a son of Clarkson Willcutts, who was the third settler, and it was born February 13, 1815.

The first white child born in White River township is thought to be Fanny (Diggs) Hill, daughter of William Diggs, Jr., [Old Billy Diggs], wife of Matthew Hill, of Jericho; she was born September 11, 1817.

Lydia (Wright) Jones, sister of Solomon Wright, who lived near the mouth of Cabin creek, was born October 5, 1817, three weeks after the arrival of her parents from Clinton county, Ohio.

The first sheriff was David Wright, appointed by Governor Jennings to organize the county in 1818.

The first county election was held in August, 1818.

The first officers elected were Wm. Edwards, John Wright, associate judges; Charles Conway, clerk, and recorder; David Wright, sheriff; Solomon Wright, coroner; Eli Overman, Benjamin Cox, John James, commissioners.

The first Commissioners' Court was held in August, 1818.

The first Circuit Court was held at the house of William Way, October 12, 1818, by the associate judges, Edwards and Wright.

The first attorney admitted to practice law in Randolph county circuit court was James Rariden, who was also appointed first prosecuting attorney.

The building of the first court house was let to Abner Overman, for $254.50, December 6, 1818.

The building of the first jail was undertaken by Albert Banta, for $125.00, December 6, 1818.

They were both accepted by the commissioners, June 6, 1820.

The first bill by the grand jury was John P. Huddleston versus James Frazier, for an affray, found June, 1820.

The first trial in the circuit court was Conway versus Connor.

The first judgment rendered by the court was in the same case. The judgment was for the plaintiff, and the amount $135.00. Time of rendering judgment, April, 1820.

The first criminal case was State versus James Frazier. Acquittal.

The first divorce granted was in favor of Huldah Way from her husband, Nathan Way, August, 1823.

The first settler in Greensfork township was Thomas Parker, west of Arba, April, 1814.

The first settler on White river was William Diggs, Jr., who came during the summer of 1816, with Paul, Henry H., William and Robert Way. He married during the winter of 1816 or 1817, and settled, perhaps, February, 1817.

The first settler in West River may have been William Blount. He first entered land, and may have been the first settler. His entry is dated April 10, 1815. It was afterward the Zimmerman (Retz) farm, on West river.

The first settler in Ward township is not now known. James Strain entered a section of land in 1816, but he is said never to have lived on the land. Fifteen entries were made in 1817, the first being Daniel Richardson, May 21, 1817, southwest quarter of 12, 21, 14, on Mississinewa river, northeast of John Keys.

The first settler in Nettle Creek was probably John Burroughs, southwest of Losantville, in 1822.

The first settler in Stoney Creek may have been Isaac Branson. "Aunt Patsy" Branson said that she came with her husband to Stoney Creek township in 1819. She was perhaps mistaken. He entered his land November 28, 1822. Yet, he may have resided in the county some years, and he entered land in that township, November 28, 1822.

However, David Vestal made the first entry, October 31, 1822, four weeks before Isaac Branson did his. Yet Mr. Branson is said to have come in February, 1819, and "Aunt Patsy" thought they were first, and perhaps they were.

The first settler in Green township may have been Martin Boots. His entry was made August 18, 1832, six entries being made in that year.

The first settler in Monroe township was perhaps John Rody. At least he entered the first land, April 10, 1833, one mile south of Morristown.

The first settlers in Wayne township were probably Benoni and Henry Hill and Amos Peacock, in the spring of 1818.

The first resident of Jackson township is thought to have been Philip Storms. He lived at a very early day at the Allensville crossing of the Mississinewa, and still before that in the southern part of the township. He was poor and not able to purchase land, and once or twice had land entered from under him, which provoked him, as well it might, since that was justly enough reckoned a very serious breach of "squatter unwritten law." He resided in the region in 1830.

The first settler in Washington township may have been Travis Adcock.

At any rate, he made the first land entry in that township, 1814, and he was residing there at a very early date.

The first settler in Franklin township was Meshach Lewallyn, during the summer of 1817.

The first framed bridge (probably) was made over White river north, toward Deerfield.

The first railroad through the county was the Indianapolis & Bellefontaine railroad, completed in 1852-3. This road was afterwards called the "Bee Line" and is now a part of the New York Central Lines.

The first wagon-shop, so far as now known, was owned by Thomas Butterworth, before 1840, who lived two and a half miles southeast of Winchester.

The first blacksmith shop may have been John Way's at Winchester, (not known). James Frazier, father of Francis Frazier, the bellmaker, was a bellmaker and blacksmith. He came in 1817, (in the spring). Jere Smith's father came in August, 1817, and he was a blacksmith and worked at his trade.

The first brick may have been burned by David Wysong, south of Winchester. He burned the brick for the court house, built in 1826.

The first lime kiln was probably at Maxville.

The first orchard is thought to have been set out by Henry H. Way, near Sampletown, about 1817 or 1818. Some of the trees are still standing, two to two and a half feet through, and in a bearing condition.

The first binder was owned by Wm. Wright in Stoney Creek township. This machine was a "Buckeye Wire Binder" sold by George Robbins of Farmland. It was necessary to watch the machine as it was in danger of being destroyed.

The first brick house in Winchester, and perhaps in the county, was built by Martin Comer, where the Randolph County Bank now stands.

One of the oldest brick dwellings in the county now stands on the Brickley farm, one mile southwest of Dunkirk meeting-house. The bricks were burnt on the farm for the purpose.

The first frame house in the county was built in Winchester, by Judge Sample, in 1820.

The first penitentiary sentence was rendered in the August term, 1824, against David Banta, for hog stealing. The prisoner escaped into Ohio and was never captured, and so the sentence remains not carried out to this day.

The first conviction was David Banta's.

The first slander case was tried August, 1826.

The first slander conviction was February, 1828.

The first water-mill in Greensfork township may have been Jessup's on Greenville creek. It was built as early as 1820, and perhaps earlier.

The first mill in the county may perhaps have been Lewallyn's, near Ridgeville, as early as 1819, and probably sooner than that.

The first mill on White river was probably Sample's Mill, west of Winchester, or Jeremiah Cox's mill near Jericho. Cox's mill was built in 1825, five or six miles east of Winchester. No mill is found at either place now.

The first carding machine in the county was owned by Daniel Petty east of Winchester, very early, exact date not known.

The first carding machine in Winchester is supposed to have been built by Moorman Way, Esq. It was run by ox-power, and was built about 1832.

The first grist mill in Jackson township is thought to have been a corn-cracker, built soon after 1833 by Jacob Johnson.

The first water mill in Jackson township is thought to have been built on the Mississinewa by Hinchey. The exact date is not known.

The first school in Jackson township was taught by Mrs. Beach in 1838, in her own house.

The first pike in Randolph county is thought to have been the Greenville and Winchester pike (or a pike near Bloomingsport).

The first two-story hewed log cabin in Winchester was built in the fall of 1819, on Inlot No. 1, west front, by James McCool, a blind man. It was good and substantial, and was occupied by him as a hotel in 1819.

The first cook stove brought to Randolph county was by Edward Edger, of Deerfield, about 1838 or 1839. It cost $50.00 in silver at 10 per cent. premium, equal to $55.00 in currency, besides the cost of hauling it from Cincinnati.

Another cook stove was brought to the county at the same time for Mrs. Kinnear, south of Deerfield. It was just like Mr. Edger's and cost the same amount.

The first entry in Randolph county was by Jeremiah Mottatt, in Wayne township, northwest of Harrisville, December 1, 1812, northwest quarter section 18, town 20, range 15. He never occupied the tract.

The first entry in Greensfork township was by Clarkson Willcutts, January 9, 1814, southeast quarter section 28, town 16, range 1.

The first entry in Washington township was by Travis Adcock, May 14, 1814, northwest quarter section 14, town 18, range 14.

The first entry in West River township was by William Blount, April 10, 1814, southwest quarter section 8, town 18, range 13.

The first entry in White River township was by Shuball Ellis, November 30, 1814, northeast quarter section 18, town 20, range 14.

The first entry in Ward township was by James Strain, October 16, 1816, section 13, town 21, range 14. He never lived on it.

The first entry in Jackson township was by John Abercrombie, October 16, 1816, southwest quarter section 7, town 21, range 15. Jackson township was not settled till long afterwards.

The first entry in Stoney Creek was by David Vestal, October 31, 1822, southwest quarter section 8, town 19, range 12. Two more entries were made the same day by John Connor, and five more in the month of November following, or 880 in all in less than a month.

The first entry in Nettle Creek was by John Burroughs, October 21, 1822, southwest quarter section 15, town 18, range 12. Within less than a month, 760 acres were entered in that township.

The first entry in Franklin township was by Meshach Lewallyn, July 19, 1817, sections 1 and 12, town 21, range 13.

The first entry in Monroe township was by John Rody, April 10, 1833, southeast quarter of southeast quarter section 17, town 21, range 12.

The first entries in Green township were made by John Michael and Martin Boots, August 18, 1832, northwest quarter section 8, town 21, range 12, and northeast quarter section 9, town 21, range 12.

The first carding machine in Randolph county was on Salt creek, east of Winchester, owned by Daniel Petty, date not known.

The first tan-yard was probably set up by Hugh Botkins southeast of Huntsville. Mr. Botkins came very early. The first one may have been at Sampletown.

The first burying ground was probably at Arba. Arba, Lynn, Cherry Grove, Jericho, White River and Dunkirk meetings were all established shortly after the settlement of the county, Arba being almost certainly the first.

The first drain-tile made in the county, as also in the state, were manufactured by hand by John K. Martin in a machine made by himself in 1856. He made 200 rods and burned them in a brick-kiln in his father's yard.

The first woolen factory in Randolph county is thought to have been at Unionsport by Hiram Mendenhall. The date cannot be stated.

The first teacher's institute was held at Winchester under the direction of Prof. E. P. Cole, principal of Randolph County Seminary, about 1850.

Those early institutes were full of interest and profit, and would compare very favorably with many held in later times.

The first session of the Union Literary Institute commenced June 15, 1846, with Rev. Ebenezer Tucker as principal, in a two-story hewed log house, upon ground cleared from the heavy green woods for the purpose. A huge tree-trunk, four feet through, lay for years not twenty feet from the door, that had just been felled "in the green," and the boarding house erected the next year had several green stumps under the floor.

The first hotel in Winchester was kept by James McCool, a blind man. It was set up in 1819.

The first hotel in the county may have been kept by Joseph Gass, between Economy and Winchester. At least it was there in the spring of 1817, when the "Way Company" came through from Caroline to White River.

The first store in Winchester would seem to have been kept by Esquire Odle, at what date is not now known.

The first hatters' shop was owned by James Oldham, which was begun perhaps in 1819.

The first county treasurer was Jesse Johnson, appointed by the commissioners, November, 1818.

The first assessor (lister) was George Bowles, appointed February, 1819. He made his report in May and was allowed $10 for assessing the county.

The first treasurer's report was made May, 1819; sum received $10; expenditures, $20.

The first grist-mill on the Mississinewa, above Lewallyn's was built by Mr. Parsons, who came there in 1829, and built it soon after.

The first murder in the eastern part of the state was done in Wayne county, in 1816. A man by the name of Criss killed his son-in-law, Mr. Chambers. He was tried, convicted, and hung at Salisbury, then the county seat of Wayne county.

The first post offices in the various townships were probably as follows: White River (and in the county), Winchester, Ward, Deerfield; Greensfork, Spartanburg; Washington, Bloomingsport; Franklin, Ridgeville; Wayne (old) Randolph; Stoney Creek, Windsor; West River, Trenton; Huntsville, Nettle Creek, Losantville; Jackson, New Lisbon; Green, Fairview; Monroe, Farmland.

CHAPTER II.

GEOLOGY AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Randolph county being one of the oldest as well as the highest counties in the state has been the subject for very careful survey, both as to its geology, fauna and flora.

The geological survey was carefully made of the county in 1882 by Prof. A. J. Phinney. Dr. Phinney was a physician, located in Muncie and made his report to Prof. John Collett, at that time state geologist.

Dr. Phinney's report is so complete and exact and was made after such careful investigation and research that we feel the best interests of our readers will be served by re-publishing his report, which is as follows:

SURFACE CONFIGURATION.

The surface is generally level or rolling, with the exception of three ridges in the southern part, which might in places be termed hilly. These ridges are highest south of the water-shed, owing to the erosion of the valleys during the slow elevation of the divide. The surface near the water-shed is usually level, but grows more hilly as you go towards the south line of the county. North of White River is a low ridge, forming the water-shed of the northern part. The highest land in the state is formed on the middle ridge near Bloomingsport (one and one-half miles northwest), on the summit between Green's Fork and Martindale creek, the elevation of the road bed of the I., B. and W. R. R., being here 1,234.40 feet above the ocean. Colonel Moore, Chief Engineer, estimates the elevation of some of the hills south of this point to be at least fifty feet higher, making the highest point in the state about 1,285 feet above the ocean. Hills on the east ridge are nearly as high. The following table of altitudes of the road bed of the I., B. & W. R. R. was furnished by Colonel Moore, Chief Engineer. The base line of this road places the Union Depot, at Indianapolis, at 721.20 feet above the sea level.

The county, as a whole, is one of the most elevated in the state, its southern part forming the water-shed of eastern Indiana. Streams flow in every direction from its summit. The principal rivers are the Mississinewa, and its branches, viz.: Elkhorn and Bear creeks, and the Little Mississinewa; White river and its tributaries, viz.: Little White river, Cabin creek, Sugar creek, and Salt creek, in the central part. South of the divide, West river, Martindale creek, Green's fork and Noland's Fork of White Water river, while on the east Greenville and Dismal creeks drain the swampy tracts near the summit. All these streams form an abundance of water for stock, though none are hardly large enough to furnish much water power for manufactories. Where streams are not accessible, water can usually be obtained by wells, the depth varying from ten to thirty feet. Springs are numerous, though mostly small, and the character of the water such as is usually found in limestone regions, though a few were observed which are chalybeate.

Nearly all the larger streams of the county have their sources in broad, swampy tracts, which, when the country was first settled, were almost impassable, and were from one quarter to two miles wide, and the larger from five to six miles long. The water-shed between Noland's Fork and Greenville creek is hardly perceptible, and the broad prairie which now borders both these streams can be traced from the south line of the county, with the direction a little east of north, to a point east of Union City, from thence continuing in the same direction for fifteen miles through the northwestern portion of Darke county, Ohio. South of Union City a branch of this prairie crosses the east ridge, and extends in a southwesterly direction to the valley of Green's Fork, forming the broad prairie from which Dismal creek, the east branch of Green's fork and White river have their sources. Cabin Creek and West River rise in another long swampy tract, which lies to the east of the west ridge. North of West River township, this swampy tract extends for about two miles. Bear creek and the stream from the north, which empties into the Mississinewa river a short distance above the mouth of Bear creek, are in the same line. The streams which occupy these broad valleys could never have excavated them; in fact, until ditches were cut, they had not even made a channel for themselves. They evidently mark the course of glacial rivers, flowing from the northeast to the valley of the Ohio of the ocean. The direction of the flow of these ancient streams, at right angles to the present lines of drainage, shows that the surface at the north was relatively much higher than at present, and that the divide now so prominent a feature of the surface configuration, hardly had an existence at the close of the Glacial epoch. The three ridges are only remnants of the broad table land which once existed, the glacial streams having carried away the material which once united them. The hills, so prominent a feature of the southern part of the ridges, were carved from the level table land by currents of water. They have nothing in common with those hills of sand and gravel (kames), found so frequently in Delaware county and other portions of the state.

Union City is situated on the east ridge, and the people have always had more or less difficulty in obtaining water. In order to secure a supply for water works, an excavation was made southwest of the city, thirty feet in diameter and twenty feet deep. A drill was then sunk twenty feet more, striking a vein of water which filled the well and overflowed the top, and has since continued to supply the city with clear cold water. They evidently tapped the ancient channel which passed a little to the east. In draining the swamps, elks' antlers have been found; some very large and having a spread of six feet. Remains of the mastodon have been occasionally met with.

North of the Mississinewa river, in Jay county, is a ridge known as the Lost Mountain. This ridge has a similar position, and evidently originated in the same manner as the low divide north of White river. Overflows from the Glacial river evidently once covered most of Wayne and White River townships, finding an outlet through the channel marked "probable course of Glacial river." Although no deep channel was formed, enough material was removed to give to the remaining portion the character of a ridge, and the erosive action of White river has still further contributed to that result. A similar condition prevails north of the Mississinewa river, in fact that channel marked "probable course of Glacial river" can be traced through Randolph to Jay county. West of Ridgeville it curves to the east, and with a somewhat circuitous course terminates in the main channel in Darke county, Ohio, making probably the supposition that the ridge is the result of erosion.

GENERAL GEOLOGY.

QUATERNARY AGE.

Under this head may be classed all those deposits which have taken place during and since the close of the Glacial epoch, and it embraces all those accumulations of peat, muck and vegetable mold which are now among the very best farming lands in the county. The largest of these deposits occur in the valleys of those ancient rivers, their channels having been silted up with sand and gravel, leaving, at first series of shallow lakes. All depressions in the surface were left filled as the waters slowly receded. These lakes and ponds, after a long period of time, became filled from the accumulations of an aquatic vegetation and the wash from the higher lands.. Although shunned by the earlier settlers, the judicious use of ditching has redeemed these wastes, and now, over a great part of these prairies, may be seen the fields of golden grain. The depths of these deposits varies from two to ten feet, the lower part, in places, resembling a marl. The largest of these prairies are found bordering Greenville and Dismal creeks on the east and Cabin creek and West river, near the southwestern part of the county. Smaller accumulations of muck occur in every township.

ALLUVIUM.

All of the streams of the county being small, no very extensive alluvial deposits are found here. The valleys of the Mississinewa and White rivers afford the best example of this formation. Although limited in extent, they are noted for their fertility—a characteristic of these deposits wherever found. Formed from the finer clay and sand washed from the higher lands, and mixed with vegetable detritus, they have every element necessary for the production of magnificent crops.

THE DRIFT.

This deposit covers the whole county, the depth ranging from twenty-five to possibly one hundred feet. It is here a gray and yellowish clay, with some sand and gravel in the deeper portions. From ten to thirty feet of clay is passed through, in digging wells before gravel is reached. The depth of the surface clays together with their extent, and the numerous large bowlders which are found on the surface are records of melting of extensive glaciers. The clays, sand and gravel, which are scattered over such a large extent of territory, tell us of the mighty force which ground to powder the shales, destroyed the cohesion of sandstones, and brought from the Canadian highlands mere remnants of those azoic rocks that were torn from their parent ledges.

If, standing upon the summit of Little mountain, Lake county, Ohio, seven hundred and fifty feet above the surface of Lake Erie, one will fill, in imagination, that vast vacuity which probably extends to the Canadian shore with the Erie shale, Waverly group and carboniferous conglomerate, which once occupied it, he will be able to form some conception of the mighty force which excavated the basin of Lake Erie, and scattered the debris over Indiana and Ohio. That great glacier moved from the northeast to the southwest, and the Little mountain, with its precipitous walls facing the lake, indicates the position of the land side of that glacial plow. Probably the low divide, which extends from northeastern Ohio into Indiana, passing through the southern part of Randolph county, marked the southern border of this glacier. This was followed by the great glacier from the north, which covered the continent as far south as the fortieth parallel of latitude. As this melted, leaving the debris of its work of destruction behind, to be sorted by the volumes of water flowing from it, a depression of the continent took place, the glaciers dropped their loads of gravel, sand, clay and bowlders. After this part of the ice age the surface clays were deposited and the future wealth of the soil determined. During the period of elevation which followed, the sheet of clay was cut through by the rivers which were draining the waters from the basins of the Great lakes. As the rivers flowed across the divide, they excavated those deep and broad valleys now occupied by Greenville and Dismal creeks, Cabin creek and West river. Portions of the table land separating them were subject to the action of currents of water, which carved those rounded hills, so common near the summit of the divide. As the lake basins became drained, the ancient river channels were silted up, in many places wholly obliterated, leaving only a series of shallow lakes to mark their former course. During this last act in the great drama of water and ice, the surface configuration of the county was marked out. Gradually, with a continued but unequal elevation, the present lines of drainage became established at right angles to those ancient river channels.

BOWLDERS.

Bowlders are common everywhere, but are found in greater numbers in the southern part, near the summit of the divide, the erosion which this part of the county has suffered having carried away the finer material, leaving them exposed. East of Windsor and south of White river is a line of bowlders, extending nearly to Macksville, many of which are of large size. In section 29, White River township, range 14 east, 20 north, is one thirteen feet long and five feet above the surface and with not less than five or six feet imbedded in the earth. West of Fairview and south of the Mississinewa river is another nearly as large. Quartzytes, green-stones and granites are the prevailing kinds. Many of the quartzytes are of great size, and show by their well-rounded forms the rough usage to which they have been subjected. The greenstones (Dioryte, with others of the Hornblende series) are, many of them, large, and are usually angular. All forms of granites occur here. The transition into the gneissoid rocks, however, is rare, the tendency of the gradations being towards the Syenites. But few limestones were found. In many places bowlders were so numerous that the farmers were compelled to haul them off their fields. The immense pile along the roadsides afforded ample opportunity for their study.

PALEOZOIC GEOLOGY.

The only rocks found in the county belong to the Niagara period, Upper Silurian age. But few exposures occur, and only along the larger streams. At Macksville, on White river, is an outcrop exposing a thickness of about six feet of a soft friable and coarse grained limestone of a whitish cream color, becoming yellowish on exposure, judging from what was seen on the surface. This is suitable only for lime, of which it makes an excellent quality. It sets quick, owing to its being nearly a pure carbonate. Mr. J.

C. Brickley burns annually about seven thousand bushels, which hardly supplies the local demand. This industry might be much increased if the rock was quarried properly. Instead of taking a few loads from where it can be obtained the easiest, a quarry ought to be opened and worked below the surface of the river, and with a front not less than ten or twelve rods in length. When once opened, rock could be obtained with much less expense than at present, and if a continual burner was used the cost of production would be much less. Not over two or three feet of stripping is required here, and that principally the alluvial deposits of the river. Although this rock is a magnesian limestone, the amount of magnesia present is much less than in rocks of the same age in Grant and Huntington counties.

The following analysis is taken from Professor Cox's report for 1878:

ANALYSIS OF ROCK AT MACKSVILLE.

Water expelled at 212° Fahr.	1.18
Silicic acid	1.20
Ferric oxide	1.30
Alumina	4.40
Lime	45.45
Magnesia	4.01
Carbonic acid	40.11
Sulphuric acid	.27
Loss and undetermined	2.08
Total	100.00

"The principal ingredients of this rock, as seen from the above, are carbonate of lime, carbonate of magnesia and alumina. In calcining, probably the greater part of the magnesia is driven off, especially if a white heat is obtained. The strata here range from two to five inches in thickness, and though very soft when first taken from the quarry, become hard on exposure. In the upper layers, casts of pentamerus oblongus are very abundant, many being nearly perfect; but as no pains have been taken to save the finest ones, only weathered specimens could be obtained. Impressions of an Orthis and Spirifer were observed, and, judging from the description given, Orthoceras annulatum and Platyostoma niagarensis have been occasionally met with. The direction and amount of dip could not be determined. A small exposure occurs in section 8, West River township, range 13 east, 19 north, on Cabin creek, which was worked for lime, on a small scale some years ago. No outcrop can be seen at present.

Near Ridgeville the rock is exposed along the Mississinewa river for about two miles. Here is found about six feet of a whitish, coarse-grained limestone which, though soft and friable when first taken from the quarry, hardens on exposure and forms the principal stone used in the vicinity for walls and building. The strata range from two to four inches in thickness. This stone makes excellent lime, though none is being burnt at present. This rock differs very little from that at Macksville, as can be seen from the following analysis from the Indiana Geographical Report 1878.

ANALYSIS OF ROCK AT RIDGEVILLE.

Water expelled at 212° Fahr	0.90
Silicic acid	.70
Ferric oxide	2.70
Alumina	3.75
Lime	45.08
Magnesia	4.36
Carbonic acid	40.21
Sulphuric acid	.44
Loss and undetermined	1.86
Total	100.00

The presence of iron in the upper layers causes them to turn rusty or yellowish red upon exposure to the air, the oxide becoming a sesquioxide. Numerous impressions of fossils were seen. Corals of the genus Favosites were numerous, but good specimens could not be obtained. The more common of the fossils found are Favosites niagarensis, F. Favosus, Strophomena, rhomboidalis, S. striata, Orthis elegantula, Pentamerus oblongus, P. sp., Cladopora reticulata, Zaphrentis bilateralis, Meristina nitida and Platyostoma niagarensis. West of Fairview, near the river, rock is found about two feet below the surface. This differs in no particular from that at Ridgeville, except that the strata are thicker. Only a small amount has been quarried. At neither of these localities could the dip be determined. The rocks in this county differ from that found in Delaware county in the absence of the argillaceous and cherty layers, as well as the more durable and desirable blue stone. The dip in Delaware county being to the southwest, the rock there belongs higher in the series. The difference is not due to a change in the lithological character of the same strata, but to a change in the conditions under which they were deposited.

At the close of the Lower Silurian age the southern portion of that line of upheaval known as the Cincinnati arch was raised above the sea. In the continental ocean surrounding it was deposited the Niagara limestone, the most extensive of any of the formations subsequent to the Lower Silurian. The Cincinnati arch, extending from Nashville, Tennessee, to a point between Toledo and Sandusky, Ohio, was a line of unequal disturbance, which finally culminated in the elevation of the whole arch above the ocean at the close of the Devonian age. This arch is not a single fold, but, as ably shown by Prof. J. S. Newberry, in the geological survey of Ohio, its northern portion consists of at least two distinct folds. During the deposition of the Niagara limestone around the Lower Silurian island, the sea was gradually returning with the elevation of the arch, and the different portions of the Niagara group, following the retreating waters, were deposited successively further from the old shore line. Today the most recently formed strata of the Niagara are probably found along the Wabash river, showing that there has been a gradual elevation of this portion of eastern Indiana, during the Niagara period. The dip of the strata is both to southwest and northwest.

The dip of the blue limestone of Delaware county is such that the strata, if continued into Randolph county, would overlap the whitish rock found here. This blue limestone if traced to the northwest, is found to underlie the yellowish, massive limestone of Grant county, the probable equivalent of the Guelph, Cedarville, or Pentamerus limestone, which is found covered by the whitish limestone along the Wabash. The limestone of Jay is similar to that of this county, but in Wells county the blue limestone appears in the bed of the Wabash.

Above the Niagara group in Ohio, is the Salina, with its beds of gypsum, but if any of this formation was deposited in Indiana, it is either covered by the drift or has been removed by erosion. Immediately succeeding this is the water-lime (Lower Helderburg), which forms the surface rock over a large part of Ohio, but gradually becomes thinner and disappears before reaching this portion of Indiana. It is possible that this formation may be covered by the drift in the northeastern part of the state; but so far, where the Devonian is exposed with the Niagara, there has been no water-lime intervening, and the exposures are so numerous along the western border of the arch, that if ever deposited it would have been observed; so far no out-crop of water-lime is found in Indiana. The water-lime of the falls of the Ohio at Louisville, belongs to the Upper Helderburg of Devonian age.

The prevalence of rocks of the Niagara group over so large an extent of territory in this state, together with the absence of the water-lime and salina, indicates that this portion of the state was above the ocean, at the time of their deposition. There is no evidence to show that Randolph and Jay counties were covered by Devonian seas, although they may have been. It is possible, even probable, that investigation will show that the Cincinnati arch, north of the Ohio river, consist of three folds instead of two, and that the older one of these extended from the Lower Silurian island, west of north, far into Indiana.

This county is the highest in the state, because it forms part of the Cincinnati arch which is crossed by the gentle fold extending from northeastern Ohio into Indiana; everywhere through its course it marks a high elevation, and where these two lines of disturbances—if they be such—cross, is found the highest point measured in Ohio and Indiana. The highest points do not necessarily coincide with the water-shed, for deep valleys were excavated through this ridge by the glacial streams, showing that its present relative altitude is of comparatively recent date.

ECONOMIC GEOLOGY.

The soil of this county is its only genuine and real mine of wealth and most bountifully has it responded to the labors of the husbandman. Although, with the exception of the prairies, the soil is for the most part a heavy clay, it has been enriched by the vegetable accumulations of ages. The clays being the debris of many different formations, contain all the elements necessary for a fertile soil. In the southwestern part of the county the soil is somewhat sandy; the fields of wheat one can see here, show well the adaptability of the soil. North of White river, the soil is a heavy clay, with occasional patches of muck; but as all this portion admits of draining but little difference could be seen as regards the prospects of a bountiful harvest. Wheat, corn and grass are the principal productions, and if the prospects for this year are a criterion from which to judge, few counties in the state will have better cause to feel proud of their crops of wheat and grass. Some complaint was heard that the wheat was turning to chess, but the real difficulty was that the farmer showed chess instead of wheat, and now, as harvest is near at hand, he tries to shirk the responsibility by claiming his misfortune to be due to a freak of nature, rather than to the proper cause—his own carelessness—as wheat never turns to cheat, nor cheat to timothy.

In the southern part of the county the prairies and the clays of the high lands are about equally divided, giving more variety of soil than is found in the northern part. All this portion admits of easy drainage, and the farmers are fast learning that labor expended in ditching is repaid many fold. The prairies and tracts of muck are well adapted to corn and wheat, while the clays, in addition, produce heavy crops of grass. Many fields will yield from two to three tons of hay per acre. Blue grass (Poa pretensis), is the most abundant of the native grasses, but timothy (Phleum pratense), grows equally well.

It must not be supposed that, however fertile a soil, it will continue to produce abundant harvests unless some effort is made to supply that waste of plant food which is lost with every crop harvested. Rotation of crops is a help to prolong the fertility of the soil; but as every crop of grass, corn stalks or straw, removes some of the silica, potash lime and phosphates, this waste will have to be supplied if the soil is expected to produce with its usual degree of fertility.

Randolph is comparatively a new county, and the vegetable accumulation of ages is still present, but the time will come when this will disappear, as it is constantly exposed to atmospheric agencies, and then over a great part of the county will be found a stiff and unproductive clay. The loss of vegetable material can be supplied by turning under green crops of clover, weed, corn stalks, etc., but the mineral loss must be replaced by some of the many fertilizers. There has been very little need of the farmer paying much attention to this subject; but the time will come when the successful farmer will be the one who knows best how to supply the soil the waste of mineral and vegetable material."

Many of the things mentioned in Dr. Phinney's report as existing at that time are yet of great importance from a historical standpoint.

Mr. J. C. Brickley spoken of in connection with the quarries at Maxville died but recently.

Lime is no longer burned in Randolph county.

The analysis of the rock at Macksville and Ridgeville is of the upper strata. At the present time the analysis of the rock at Ridgeville is quite different from that reported by Professor Cox, in 1878. The quarries there are now worked some forty or fifty feet deeper than what they were in 1878. The stone crusher at Ridgeville is one of the largest and most complete of any found in the state and hundreds of car loads of crushed lime stone are sent annually from this quarry for the purpose of building roads.

GRAVEL AND SAND.

Gravel is found in abundance in many parts of the county but some have been almost destitute.

Stoney Creek township has some great pits as almost the entire township is underlaid with a good quality of gravel. Nettle Creek township in the southwestern portion has some gravel; West River has but little excepting along the stream of West river. The recent dredging of this stream brought to light that the entire valley is underlaid with a vein of gravel twelve and fifteen feet thick. Washington township has one or two pits west of Lynn but very little elsewhere in the township. Greensfork has but little and Wayne township has one or two large pits, especially one that is known as the Thornburg pit. Jackson township is somewhat underlaid along the Mississinewa, as is Ward, Franklin and Green. The northeastern portion of White River has, so far as has been discovered, no supply whatever. These pits however, are all surface pits.

In recent years it has been discovered that the best gravel is far below the surface and can be brought to the surface only by pumping or dredging. Thousands of yards of first-class gravel have been brought to the surface in this way, principally by dredging. The county commissioners have had a dredge on the county farm and thousands of yards have been dredged there. In the eastern part of White River township along White river are some other dredge pits. Along West river many are also found. This has been responsible in two ways for the many splendid roads spoken of elsewhere.

In the communities where gravel is to be found the gravel roads are found, in other communities the crushed stone is to be found, the stone coming from the Ridgeville and Macksville crushers.

Many of these gravel pits also contain sand but the sand is not usually considered of being a high quality because of its lack of "grit."

BRICK AND TILE.

Abundance of good clay for brick and tile is found in many parts of the county.

Formerly, almost any man who wished to build a very large brick house would manufacture the brick on his own farm. This led to local brick yards furnishing the immediate community. Scores and scores of such factories have been in the county but at this time all have disappeared and all the bricks now used in the county are shipped from other places.

Tile has been manufactured in several parts of the county and there have been large factories at Farmland, "Strahan's Corner," half way between Farmland and Winchester, Oak Grove, two miles north of Parker, Huntsville, Winchester, Ridgeville and no doubt many other places. Two extensive factories have been started, one north of Winchester and the other at Lynn but at the present time, 1914 both of these factories have stopped making tile so it can be said of the tile as of the brick, the industry has gone and all the products now used in the county are shipped from other places.

Since Dr. Phinney has written his article on the geology of Randolph county a great change has been made in the water supply of the county. The rivers are no longer as large as they were at that time due to clearing of the forests and the draining of the land. Practically all of the streams of his time have now been tiled and the farmer plows the original bed of the small creek. The dug well is rapidly disappearing and very few, if any, are being put down in this day. Through the study of sanitation it has been found that the walls in these wells are so easily contaminated, thereby spreading many diseases, such as typhoid fever, that people no longer use this supply of water but resort to the driven deep well. These wells range in depth from sixty to two hundred ninety feet in the county.

Some obtain the water supply in gravel but nearly all find it in rock or limestone. This insures a bountiful supply of pure water which can not be contaminated from any surface conditions. Many flowing wells are found in different parts of the county. These wells are found in nearly every part of the county. Some of the strongest are along Greenville creek near Spartanburg, along West river, in West River township, Cabin creek in Stoney Creek township, Mississinewa in Jackson and Ward townships, and Salt creek in White River township. One of the strongest of these wells is upon the county farm only a few miles distance from the highest point in the state, making it somewhat problematical as to the source of the pressure raising this water. These wells have taken the place of the natural springs, once found so abundantly in the county and now almost a thing of the past. These springs which once furnished the supply of water to the early settler have long since ceased to flow, due of course to the draining of the swamps and ponds.

GAS AND OIL.

Another natural resource that has proven of great value to the county is that of natural gas and oil. When it was discovered that Indiana was underlaid with a supply of these fluids the people of Randolph county were quick to test for them. Practically the entire county has been tested but only three fields of any consequence have been found. The strongest gas wells were found in and around Parker, Monroe and Green townships. Many, however, have been dug in White River township around Winchester and a few have been drilled with success in the neighborhood of Saratoga, in Ward and Jackson townships. The rock pressure of these wells originally was about three hundred twenty pounds but have decreased in recent years to very much less half that amount. This supply was so wantonly destroyed and misused that instead of being an abundant cheap fuel, it has been wasted until it has become a very expensive one. When the flow of gas was at its height $1.00 per month was considered a high price for each stove but at the present time with the same amount of gas burned it would cost five to ten times that amount. The supply at present is very limited and it is only a question of a short time until it will be completely exhausted.

Oil was discovered about 1896 and the "boom" spread over this county as well as the remainder of the state. None of any consequence, however, was found in the county except in and around Parker, in Monroe township. The supply here was heavy for a while but was soon exhausted and the field is now practically abandoned.

Randolph county is one of the richest agricultural counties in the state, made so from its fertile soil, cultivated and developed by its industrious and intelligent people.

That the natural resources of the soil are fast disappearing is a matter of fact. These resources have been conserved and replenished by intelligent farming in many communities but it must be said that in many cases much of it has been wantonly destroyed through ignorance and greed. People have constantly taken from the soil as though it was an inexhaustible supply but already the effects of this debauchery may be seen in many communities. The agricultural communities are learning the values of conservation and fertilization and are giving this question study and experiment as it has never been given before.

At this time the county has as one of its officers, a county agent whose duty it is to confer with farmers upon these various questions, also to bring to them the latest and most scientific knowledge gained from study and research work in the problems they have to solve. The present incumbent of the office, Mr. Charles A. Mahan is a graduate of Kentucky Agricultural College, a man of three and one-half year's experience as a soil expert in the Philippines and one year's experience as County Advisor in Kentucky, hence his services to the county are those that would come from a trained mind and are of great benefit to the farming community. Randolph county will no doubt be much benefited by the progressive movements along agricultural lines as well as other lines. Its inhabitants are progressive, intelligent and energetic, characteristics which will make any county great.

CHAPTER III.

INDIAN OCCUPANCY—TERRITORY ACQUIRED BY WHITE MEN.

"When man first appeared on the soil of America is unknown; the record is lost in the misty ages of the past. But certain it is that for thousands of years before the age of history man dwelt in America. When the Europeans first landed on the American coast, they found in the unknown world a race of people who had traditions running back for many centuries. So long had they been here that they had lost all knowledge of tradition of whence they came. It was a race different in almost every respect from any of the other known races of the world. But prior to their time, running back for many ages, there had been another race which had peopled the continent and governed it for centuries and possibly for thousands of years, but that race had disappeared so long before the Indians took possession, that the red man had no tradition of them. Whether this race was the predecessor or the successor of still another race which has left evidence of its existence, is not known. The Toltecs of Mexico, the predecessors of the Aztecs, left records reaching back for a thousand years before the Christian era, and yet these records reach not back far enough to give the world any knowledge of the race which built the famous buried cities of Central America. The ruins in Central America show that at one time there had existed a race far advanced in civilization, living in houses in walled cities. Those cities were large enough to have contained a population reaching far in the thousands, possessing great wealth and a knowledge of many of the arts and sciences. The race that built and occupied those cities had disappeared, and the cities had been ruined and destroyed so long before the advent in Mexico of the Toltecs that the latter had no knowledge of them.

The growth of a people which depends for increase upon natural causes must of necessity be very slow; therefore, to have reached so great a population as occupied the ruined cities of Central America, the race must have dwelt upon the continent many centuries. To destroy a race, overturn its cities, and bury their ruins so deep that an occupation of the soil around them and over them, by another race for many centuries, revealed no knowledge of such ruins, must have required ages. Yet such is the history of Central America. In Indiana we find no trace of such a race, yet there is abundant evidence to show that at one time, long anterior to the coming of the red man, Indiana was quite densely populated by a race that lived, flourished and passed away without leaving any records except in its monuments, weapons, and utensils for domestic use. This has been called the race of Mound Builders. Who were they? Whence came they? When, where and how did they disappear? These questions remain unanswered, yet the fact is patent that at one time Indiana was quite densely populated by them. The works left by this prehistoric race are of three kinds—fortifications, mounds and memorial pillars. This is not the usual classification, for what are here denominational memorial pillars are generally classed as mounds."—Smith's History of Indiana.)

PREHISTORIC WORKS OF RANDOLPH CO.

The greatest specimen of the mound builders' art and the best known group of mounds is near Newark, Ohio, and consists of "elaborate earth works, in the form of a circle, octagon and square, enclosing an area of about four square miles, on the upper terrace between two branches of the Licking river. Scattered over the same plain, and crowning the neighboring hills, are numerous mounds, evidently erected by the same people that built the larger works." There seems to have been two similar chains of mounds extending from Ohio to Central America. They crossed Indiana in two chains, one in the southern part of the state, where there are some splendid specimens yet remaining, the other through the central part of the state, passing through Randolph county.

We have in this county two classes of mounds; one a fortification and the other memorial mounds. The fortification, or "The Old Fort," as it is known in the early history of the county, is near the city of Winchester, on what was formerly the county fair grounds. It is the best specimen of mound builders' fortifications found in the state. It is not only the largest, but is constructed on more scientific plans than any other of the state. It is an enclosure of about forty-three acres, and a rectangle of almost equal size, being 1,350 feet east and west, and about 1,200 feet north and south, as is shown on the map of it here given. There were two openings of about eighty feet, one in the east and one in the west end. The west opening was protected by a semi-circular embankment, with one part of the circle opened, so as to make the entrance easy of access, and yet protected. The embankments were from seven to ten feet high and when the first settlers entered this county they were covered with large forest trees, similar to those of the surrounding country. So far as we are able to learn, no scientific investigation has ever been made relative to the structure of these walls, which seems to have been made by throwing up dirt from the adjacent territory. The walls, except those on the south, have been carried away and made into brick. In the exact center of this fortification is a mound, at this time about fifteen feet high. No large trees have grown on the mound, but quite a number were near its edge. These trees, however, do not in the least indicate the proper age of these specimens of the mound builders' art. The mounds in general and this mound in particular, Dr. A. J. Phinney, writing of the geology of Randolph county for the State Geologist's Report of 1882, says: (It will be noted that Dr. Phinney's statements differ a little from the one given before, but we give each of them for what they are worth; they matter only in details and not in any essentials.)

"Evidences of a prehistoric race are abundant, and of such a character, in view of the magnitude of their works, that the observer experiences a feeling akin to reverence toward the mighty people, whose history is only written in their majestic ruins. In nearly every part those relics, as arrow-heads, axes, pestles, etc., have been found. From whence did they come? What their conditions of life, their religion, and fate? are questions one intuitively asks when in the presence of their monuments of industry. The largest works of this ancient people are near Winchester, west of the confluence of Sugar creek with White river. It consists of a walled rectangular enclosure, with curved angles, 1,320 feet long, and 1,080 feet wide. Its area is thirty-one acres. Part of the south and west walls lies within the county fair grounds, the remainder in cultivated fields, and they are in a fair way to be entirely destroyed. On the eastern half of the south wall, which has never been disturbed, are beech trees two feet in diameter. This part of the wall is the highest; and though it may have once been from eight to ten feet in height, it is now not over six feet. In the center of the enclosure is a circular mound one hundred feet across, and about eight feet high. Excavations have been made seven or eight feet in depth, both from sides and summit, but nothing has ever been found. The east and west walls each have, near their middle, an opening, or gateway. The one on the east is unprotected, but the west one formerly had an embankment in the form of a half circle, which overlapped the gate way. No trace of this remains at present. The mound lies in a direct line between the two passage-ways. No evidence exists of a ditch either on the outside or inside.

Mr. John K. Martin, in removing part of the east wall, north of the opening, reports having found a number of holes about fifteen inches in diameter, and extending seven or eight feet below the summit of the wall. These evidently, mark the position of posts, and shows that the enclosure was further protected by a palisade. Just inside of the embankment and about three feet from the surface, piles of ashes and charcoal are frequently met with. Their position indicates that they have been covered by the wash from the walls. No relics have been found. Nearly east from the northeast corner of the enclosure is a fine spring.

Southeast of the works along Sugar creek the bluffs are sandy, and the Mound Builders probably used them for their burial ground, as many human skeletons have been exhumed while digging for gravel. The absence of all implements of warfare shows that this enclosure was not occupied for any length of time as a fortification but as a permanent residence. The streams are small and the bluffs low. Had the inclosure included the spring, the supposition that it was for protection, would have been more probable. It is not unlikely that this was a place for holding council or religious ceremonies. In section 23, range 14 east, Washington township, is a large circular mound, which, although now somewhat reduced in size, could not have formerly been less than fifteen feet high and one hundred feet in diameter. In section 23, same township, is another, which measured three hundred feet in circumference and fifteen feet high; this was better preserved than the former. Small bowlders were observed on the summit and sides. No excavations had been made in either of these mounds. Both were evidently built of clay taken from the immediate vicinity. They may have served as points of outlook, as they are only about one mile apart. In section 4, one mile southwest of the last one described, is a very large mound which is considered artificial by the people in that vicinity; but its relation to some small streams suggested that it was more likely one of nature's carving. On the map is marked its location, as future investigations may probably show that it really belongs with the works of the Mound Builders.

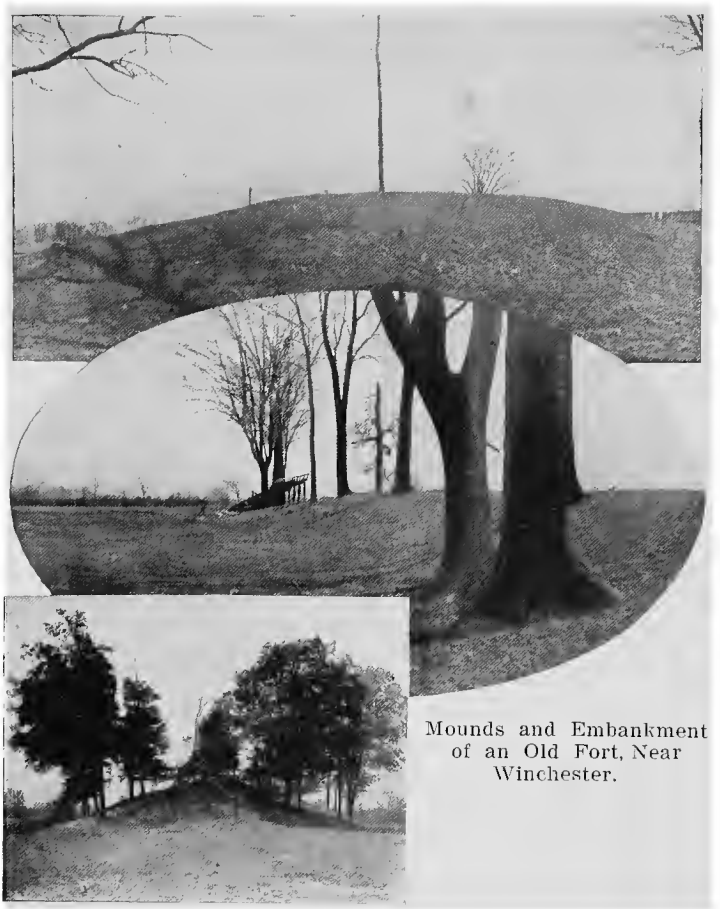
In section 28, range 12 east, 20 north, Stoney Creek township, between Stoney creek and White river, is a large mound now covered with small oak trees. This is nearly circular, fifteen feet high, 150 feet in diameter. Excavations show that it is composed of clay mixed with charcoal and ashes. At the depth of nine feet a skeleton was found; beneath it was a pile of stone two feet high and three feet in diameter. Mr. Thompson, on whose farm this is situated, has quite a collection of implements found in this vicinity.

In section 10, range 13 east, 2 north, Franklin township, was a circular inclosure, with an area of about one and one-half acres. The walls were four feet high. Although when first noticed by the earlier settlers it was in a good state of preservation, it has been destroyed, and no trace of it remains. North of the Mississinewa river, between Ridgeville and Fairview, are a number of small tumuli, which contain ashes and charcoal. These may have been built by the Indians, as this used to be their camping ground.

Many of the gravel banks have served for the Indians as burial places, as skeletons are frequently met with while digging gravel for pikes. Some of the skeletons were of large size, and deposited with them were articles of ornament, as paint, shells, etc. The position of some indicate that they had been buried in a sitting posture."

Another embankment exists west of Winchester, near Sugar creek, enclosing, perhaps, an acre. These walls, however, are not very high, and little, if anything, can be learned of their structure.

Washington township has at least three excellent specimens; one near the head waters of White river, one near Rural, and one west of Lynn. Doctor Moore, of Earlham College, a man of unusual scientific ability and carefulness of expression, wrote the following of this mound:



Mounds and Embankment of an Old Fort, Near Winchester.

Mound Near Windsor.

CONCERNING A BURIAL MOUND RECENTLY OPENED IN RANDOLPH COUNTY.

Southern Randolph and the adjacent portion of Wayne, is in the main a level tract, the land during ordinary seasons being rather wet.

Besides a number of well-defined made mounds in the neighborhood of Lynn Station on the Grand Rapids and Indiana railroad there are frequent examples of natural mounds. These are usually much larger than the artificial mounds. They may be compared to drift islands surrounded by flat areas of dark colored soil. Some of these mounds of modified drift have been utilized by ancient people as burial grounds. The one I speak of is a fraction over a mile west of Lynn Station. It is about one hundred and fifty yards in circumference and eighteen to twenty feet high, and is so symmetrical as to have the appearance of a made mound; but in a wide cutting made through it by the gravel haulers the structure clearly shows an aqueous deposit from top to bottom. In this mound the workmen say they have opened "more than a hundred graves." They "counted until they reached seventy." Quite a number of the skulls were sufficiently preserved to bear handling, even after being for a short time exposed to the air. Some of them on being treated with a solution of glue have rather a fresh, recent look. Very many of the bones were broken to crumbs by visitors in sport. Some of the skeletons were in a sitting posture with the chin crowded upon the knees.

The depth of the graves was from a yard or less to twelve feet or more. The skeletons were of both sexes and various ages, some quite young. It was alleged that a horse's bones were found, but I was unable to find the least scrap. They also tell of a dog's skull with the teeth all perfect. This is possibly so, but it would seem more likely that it was the head of a wolf, which is quite similar. Quite a number of implements were found, some of which are here on the table. One skeleton was found with a large dart in each hand.

They assert that a scapula was found pierced by a flint dart and that the dart was lodged in said bone, and that the bone immediately crumbled from about it. There were beads of bone, shell and copper—but few of the latter—also copper rings, tube pipes and various other things, the uses of which are not very well known.

You will see in the skulls presented for your examination that there is quite a diversity. Two of them are of the brachycephalic or short head type, one barely so, the other extremely so. The one has the lateral diameter on the proportion to the fore and aft, as 86 to 100, the other of 92 to 100. The others are all orthocephalic, though one of them approaches to the long-head style.

You will note, not only the extent to which the teeth are worn, but also the peculiar manner of wearing. It will also be seen that decayed teeth, caries of the bone and also signs of gumboils and abscesses are not confined entirely to civilized races. The upper wisdom teeth on one of the skulls show, each, examples of enamel tubercles on the fangs, a rather rare phenomenon, as I understand. You will note also in one of them an extraordinary double suture at upper border of occiput.

A question of interest: Did such diverse skulls belong to the same tribe, or did different tribes at different times bury in the same grounds?

No doubt Dr. Moore felt reasonably sure of the authenticity of the above.

A small mound west of Winchester, near the old Dunkirk meeting house, has been partially removed with no evidences of anything other than "a pile of dirt."

Stoney Creek township has the best specimens to be found in the county. There are some circular embankments near the Friends' meeting house at Cedar. A little north of Cabin creek there are two circular embankments together, the circles cutting each other. A small mound is in the center of each circle higher than the embankments. The earth for both the walls and the mounds would seem to have been taken from the space between the two, pretty much the same as is done or has been done in some of the Ohio mounds. The largest mound of the county, and one of the largest of the state, is to be found just east of Windsor, on the bluff between White river and Stoney creek. This is situated on the highest point to be found here and being some twenty-five or thirty feet high. It was, no doubt, used for observation purposes, while it is now covered with forest trees. We must consider them no objections to the above theory, because they in no way, as has been said before, indicate the age of these mounds. It is said that an excavation of considerable size formerly appeared, perhaps twenty rods from the base of the mound, and this is thought to have been the place from which the earth was taken for its construction. Excavations have been made in this mound, nothing, however, having been found, excepting some charcoal and a few arrow-heads, which were found in abundance in the surrounding fields. Squire Thompson, a former owner of this mound, had at one time many fine specimens of arrow-heads, hatchets, hammers and various other implements used, no doubt, by the builders of these mounds. However, these implements may not have been any of the work of the mound builders, for this mound would have served the purpose of a watch tower or protection to the American Indian, as well as to the mound builders, and may be silent remainders of many a bloody conflict in ages long since forgotten. There is another small mound across the river from the one just spoken of and not very far away.

It is the theory of some investigators that the mound builders emigrated from the east to the southwest, taking, perhaps, centuries of time in their travels and that these mounds were, in a way, only temporary affairs. But, who the mound builders were and whence they came, and whither they went, we know but little, for they have left no trace of their habitation, except these few crude mounds and embankments. In fact, we care but little about them, for no nation can expect future generations to be interested in its history unless they have left something that will in some way make humanity better. The passing of the mound builders was so remote that even the oldest of the American Indians have no tradition concerning them.

INDIANS.

Just when or how the American Indian had its origin as such is not known. One theory is that they lived across the Bering Strait and have come into America through what is now Alaska. Another is, that they may have in some way drifted across the Pacific ocean, following the Japan current, and landed on the western coast of North America. The third is, that they entered North America from the northeast, having come from Iceland or some of the Northern islands. We are little concerned in their history, except those that formerly occupied this territory.

The great family of the Algonquins occupied this territory. Those entering into the treaty of Greenville were the Chippewas, Ottawas, Potawatamies, Wyandots, Delawares, Shawnees, Miamis, Weas and Kickapoos. Those occupying this immediate territory were the Miamis and the Shawnees. This was clearly defined in the speech made on the 22d day of July, 1795, in council at Greenville, when Little Turtle spoke as follows:

"General Wayne: I hope you will pay attention to what I now say to you. I wish to inform you where your younger brothers, the Miamis, live, and, also, the Potawatamies of St. Joseph's, together with the Wabash Indians. You have pointed out to us the boundary line between the Indians and the United States, but now I take the liberty to inform you that that line cuts off from the Indians a large portion of country which has been enjoyed by my forefathers, time immemorial, without molestation or dispute. The print of my ancestor's houses are everywhere to be seen in this portion.

I was a little astonished at hearing you, and my brothers who are now present, telling each other what business you had transacted together heretofore at Muskingum, concerning this country. It is well known by all my brothers present that my forefather kindled the first fire at Detroit; from thence he extended his lines to the headwaters of Scioto; from thence to its mouth; from thence, down the Ohio, to the mouth of the Wabash; and from thence to Chicago, on lake Michigan; at this place I first saw my elder brothers, the Shawnees. I have now informed you of the boundaries of the Miami nation, where the Great Spirit placed my forefather a long time ago, and charged him not to sell or part with his lands, but to preserve them for his posterity. This charge has been handed down to me. I was much surprised to find that my other brothers differed so much from me on this subject; for their conduct would lead one to suppose that the Great Spirit, and their forefathers, had not given them the same charge that was given to me, but, on the contrary, had directed them to sell their lands to any white man who wore a hat, as soon as he should ask it of them. Now, elder brother, your younger brothers, the Miamis, have pointed out to you their country, and also to our brothers present."

The Algonquins were the natural enemies of the Iroquois on the east, and the Dakotas on the west, and were held together as a nation because of the enmity of those two nations, yet the tribes were frequently at war among themselves, which made Indian occupancy uncertain at all times.

The Miamis, who inhabited this particular territory, were among the highest type of the Algonquin nation of the Potawatamies, the Weas and the Kickapoos, and were almost their equal.

The Shawnees were in southern Ohio and Kentucky and in southern Illinois. It were they who created the most trouble through the influence of Blue Jacket, Black Wolf and Tecumseh.

The Miamis great chief was Me-che-can-noch-qua, or Little Turtle, who was a man of extraordinary courage and ability, and with physique equaling his courage. He was commanding in appearance and received unusual attention and rank from both the Indians and the whites. After the Indians had surrendered at Greenville, he visited Philadelphia, where, in recognition of his attitude toward the Americans, he was presented with a sword by President Washington. He fought until defeated, but knew when he was defeated. He advised against forming the confederacy by Tecumseh against the Indians. His successor was Pa-lonz-wa, or Francis Godfroy, as he was better known among the early settlers of this county. The Godfroy trail from Winchester to Fort Wayne was so named because one of the stations was at the home of Francis Godfroy. Godfroy was a man of unusual size and his courage and cunning won him a place with the Miamis, second only to Little Turtle. "During nearly all the time of his chieftainship he was a firm friend of the whites. As early as 1822 he employed some workmen from Fort Wayne to build for him on the banks of the Wabash a large house, after the manner and style of the white man of wealth. In this house he dispensed the most generous hospitality, and Indian and white man alike were welcome to his board. When his tribe made the final treaty with the government and ceded possession of their lands in Indiana, four sections on the Mississinewa were reserved for Pa-lonz-wa. On this reservation he erected a trading post, and became, for those days, a noted merchant. Reckless and careless of money and having more land than he knew what to do with, he scattered his favors with a prodigal hand. It was told of him that being at Lafayette on one occasion when a steamboat arrived at that point from the Ohio river, he offered the captain a half section of land if he would convey him and his party to their homes, some three miles above where Peru now stands. The offer was accepted and the trip up the Wabash was made, but on the return to Lafayette the steamer was lost. Pa-lonz-wa made the deed to the promised half section.

"He died in 1840, and was buried on a high knoll which overlooks the Wabash. On his grave a marble shaft has been erected, bearing on one side his white name, and the date of his birth and death. On the other is the following tribute to his memory: 'Late Principal Chief of the Miami Nation of Indians. Distinguished for courage, humanity, benevolence and honor, he lived in his native forest an illustration of the nobleness of his race, enjoying the confidence of his tribe and beloved by his American neighbors. He died as he lived, without fear or reproach.' His funeral was one of the noted events of that day, and was attended by hundreds of Indians and whites. The principal address was delivered by Wa-pa-pin-sha, a noted Indian orator of his tribe. Translated, it is as follows:

'Brothers, the Great Spirit has taken to himself another of our once powerful and happy, but now declining, nation. The time has been when these forests were densely populated by the red men, but the same hand whose blighting touch withered the majestic frame before us and caused the noble spirit by which it was animated to seek another home, has dealt in a like manner with his and our fathers; in like manner will he deal with us. Death of late has been common among us, so much so that a recurrence of it scarcely elicits our notice. But when the brave, the generous, the patriotic are blasted by it, then it is the tears of sorrow flow. Such is now the case. Our brother who has just left us was brave, generous and patriotic, and as a tribute to his merit and a reward for his goodness, the tears, not only of his own people, but of many white men, who are here assembled to witness his funeral rites, freely flow.

'At this scene the poor of his people weep, because at his table they were wont to feast and rejoice. The weak mourn his death, because his authority was ever directed for their protection. But he has left the earth—the place of vexation and contention—and is now participating with Pocahontas and Logan in those joys prepared by the Great Spirit for such as well and faithfully discharge their duties here. Brothers, let us emulate his example and practice his virtues.' "

"Pa-lonz-wa was followed in the chieftainship of his tribe by John Baptiste Big Leg, who was the last chief of the Miamis. He lies buried by the side of Pa-lonz-wa, and a plain marble slab marks the spot where his bones lie. It bears the following inscription: 'Head Chief of the Miami and Kansas Tribe. A brave warrior, a generous man, and a good Christian.' " Godfroy had three sons, Francis, Poqua and James.

Some of Godfroy's descendants yet live on the Mississinewa, near Peru, and one of them showed the courage and fire of his ancestors by his deeds of bravery and endurance in rescuing and saving the lives of many people during the flood of 1913.

There were many Indians in the county at the time of its settlement, although there were no Indian villages. It is interesting to know the opinions of some of the early settlers concerning these Indians, and we shall here take the liberty to quote some of them, found in Tucker's History, under the head of Biographies.

BIOGRAPHIES.

Mr. Hawkins says: (Joseph Hawkins, of Jay county, Indiana) "I was well acquainted with Johnny Green, the old Indian warrior mentioned by Jere Smith.

"The Indian chiefs were Cornstalk, Blue Jacket, Split Log and Capt. Johnny, Shawnees or Delawares; Richardville and the two Godfroys, Francois and Lewis, Miamis.

"This Cornstalk was not the chief who led the Indians in the battle of the Kanawha, 1774. That Cornstalk (as also his son) was basely shot while in a fort by the soldiers therein, into which he and his son had gone in a peaceable and friendly manner."

Mr. Hawkins was intimate when a boy with the Godfroy chiefs and their families. He gives the following incident concerning Poqua Godfroy (son of Chief Francois):

"Poqua Godfroy (son of Chief Francois) got into an affray at Hamilton. He was about twenty-one years old. He was frightened, and thought the white folks were going to kill him, and so he tried to be beforehand with them, and clashed away right and left himself. He was arrested for assault and battery, but was at length released on bail, and suffered to depart. On his way home, the first man he saw whom he knew was my brother, Samuel Hawkins, at Winchester, after the mail. The boy was wild with joy; he cried out, 'O, you my friend; you shall go home with me. They try to kill me, but you my friend!'

"And Samuel took his mail that way, and went home with Poqua and stayed over night at the house of the old chief, much to the delight of the frightened Indian boy and his aged father also." Chief Godfroy afterward moved to the mouth of the Mississinewa, and died there not far from 1840. His stately monument is still to be seen on the north side of the river near the mouth.

Godfroy was the home chief, and Richardville the war chief of the Miamis. Godfroy was an honest, upright, reliable man, esteemed by the whites and beloved by the Indians.

Cornstalk (the elder) was a Shawnee chief of bravery and distinction, and one of the leaders of his tribe at the battle of the Kanawha (Point Pleasant), Va., in 1776. He had tried before that disastrous engagement to induce his people to bury the hatchet, but in vain. After that, however, his efforts were crowned with success. He submitted in good faith to the whites, joined in the treaty and observed it faithfully, and lived quietly and at peace. Some of the Indians, however, remained hostile, and such was the temper of the times and so ready were the whites to commit atrocities against the helpless "red men," that, in 1777, when Cornstalk and his son, Enilipsco, both of excellent character, of kindly disposition, and entirely and sincerely friendly and peaceable, entered, in amity and good will, the American fort at Point Pleasant, they were murdered in cold blood. Cornstalk himself fell pierced by seven or eight bullets. His grave is said yet to be visible at Point Pleasant, near the site of the ancient fortress.

Some of the descendants of the old chief are thought to be still living, residing on the Kansas river. One of his sons lived to a greatly advanced age.

Cornstalk, the younger, was a chief in later times after the war of 1812. He was friendly and a fine, stately, noble Indian. He used to come to Randolph county to hunt, spending more or less time among the settlers. A striking incident is related of Cornstalk and his wife by Squire Bowen, which occurred soon after the settlement of his father, Ephraim Bowen, in the county. We have no detailed statement of the life of this chief at our command.

"Johnny Green" was a chief who dwelt in the region of Randolph, and was well known to many of the settlers of that time. Several mention him in their "Reminiscences." He was somewhat noted in the Indian wars, being present at "Wayne's victory" in 1794. He is supposed to have been concerned in the killing of Morgan in Wayne county. He had much provocation to the deed, since Morgan was a bitter "Indian hater," and had, not very long before, undertaken treacherously to procure the murder of the old Indian. At Brookville (perhaps), "Johnny" had obtained leave to accompany some whites in a trip they were making. Soon after they started, Morgan, among others, tried to induce the crowd to kill Green, and succeeded in getting a vote to that effect. One of the party took Johnny under his protection and got him safely away.

A white man was burned at the stake by the Indians somewhere east of Muncie, but the particulars of the fact, whether as to reasons, time or parties engaged, we have never learned.

[Note.—Whether this "Johnny Green's tribe" (mentioned below) belonged to the "Johnny Green" already named, we are not able to state. There may have been more than one "Johnny Green," as there were two "Cornstalks" and two "Killbucks."]

Johnny Green's Tribe.—They emigrated to the West and settled in Iowa, and they now live in Story county, near Marshalltown, on the Iowa river, above Iowa Rapids.

Johnny Green, the old chief, is dead, and his son, "Buck Green," is now chief. The number of the tribe is about 350. They own a reserve of land; have good houses and dress mostly like whites, though the women go bareheaded and wear blankets and moccasins, Indian-fashion.

The men spend most of their time in hunting; the women make baskets and beadwork and other curious things. The tribe is harmless and peaceable. The squaws may often be seen riding by on ponies, with pannier baskets laden with trinkets for sale, and having, besides, a child in each basket, the whole cavalcade presenting a sight comical to behold. [This account is given by a friend of the author's, who resides in Iowa, in the vicinity of the tribe in question.]

Francis La Fontaine, Miami Chief.—His Indian name was To-pe-ah. His father was French and his mother a Miami woman, and he was born near Fort Wayne in 1810. In 1832 he married Catharine (Po-con-go-qua), daughter of Chief Richardville, and upon the old chief's death was chosen principal chief. He moved to the forks of the Wabash, and lived there till the removal of his tribe west of the Mississippi, in 1846.

He spent the winter with his people, but returned in the spring; was taken ill on the journey and died at Lafayette, April 13, 1847, aged thirty-seven years. In person, he was tall, corpulent and robust, a man of wonderful size and strength, his usual weight being 350 pounds. He presented, when dressed in Indian costume, a splendid specimen of manly dignity.

He had seven children, only two of whom are now living.

His body was embalmed at Lafayette, brought to Huntington and buried there.

John B. Richardville (Pe-che-wa), was the son of the sister of Little Turtle, Taucumwah, by a French trader, Joseph Drouet de Richeville, born about 1761. Pe-che-wa became the recognized chief by a daring act of humane valor when but a young man. He was present at Harmar's defeat in 1790; signed the treaty of Greenville in 1795, of Fort Wayne and of Vincennes in 1809, and of St. Mary's in 1818.

In 1827 he built a fine dwelling on his reservation, five miles from Fort Wayne. He was an extensive trader, having an establishment in Fort Wayne, but moving, in 1836, to the forks of the Wabash, he died at his house at St. Mary's, August 13, 1841, aged about eighty-one years. He was of middling height and weight, quiet, modest and retiring, but genteel and manly in his deportment with the whites, and having a large influence over his people and, moreover, highly respected and confided in by the white settlers. His daughters erected a marble monument over his remains.

He was succeeded by Francis La Fontaine, who had married Catharine, daughter of Richardville.

"Captain Logan (Spemica Lawba—High Horn), a Shawnee chief, was born on Mad river, Ohio, in 1778. He was captured when a lad by Capt. Benjamin Logan, of Kentucky, in 1786; was adopted by him, and afterward returned to his tribe, continuing, however, to be the friend of the whites.

This friendship he showed in a most remarkable manner, finally sealing his fidelity with his blood.

"He was one of General Hull's guides to Detroit in 1812. Afterward he conducted twenty-five women and children from Fort Wayne to Piqua, through the wilderness, with signal kindness and humanity, making the entire journey without sleep, and treating his helpless charge with the utmost gentleness and the most delicate attention.

"During the siege of Fort Wayne by the Indians, after the surrender of Detroit by Hull in August, 1812, it was determined to send relief from Piqua, and it became necessary to convey the information to the beleaguered fort. Two white men, with Captain Logan and some friendly and faithful Shawnees, undertook the perilous task. They passed the besiegers and reached the fort in safety, and Captain Logan, with Captain Johnny and Bright Horn, two of his Indian companions, retraced their steps to their comrades, who were waiting outside the besiegers' lines. The re-enforcements reached the fort, and the Indians finally withdrew and abandoned the siege. Subsequently he met his death in a most affecting manner, which can be best related by quoting (substantially) from Kingman Bros.' History of Allen county, Indiana.

" 'On the morning of November 22, 1812, a subordinate officer charged him with unfaithfulness. Stung by this charge and to prove its falsity, he started with Captain Johnny and Bright Horn down the Maumee to reconnoiter. Suddenly they were surprised and captured by a company under Winamac, a Potawatamie chief, and Elliot, a half-breed, in the British employ. Seizing the opportunity, they attacked their captors, killing two and wounding three more. Logan, however, received a fatal wound, and Bright Horn was also wounded. Captain Johnny mounted the two wounded men, each upon one of the enemy's horses, and started them toward the camp, which they reached about midnight. He stayed long enough to secure Winamac's scalp, and came in on foot, reaching camp by daylight. Captain Logan lingered two days in intense suffering, and died. He was buried with the honors of war, but his death cast a gloom over the entire army, and especially caused great grief to him, whose bitter words had impelled Captain Logan to the act by which he met his untimely death at the early age of thirty-four.' "

Interesting reminiscences were given concerning some of the early traders and Indians. The Indian causing the most trouble in this county lived in the Mississinewa country, and was known as Fleming. Fleming created a great deal of disturbance and caused the white people a great deal of uneasiness, and it must have been rejoicing when they learned of his death at the hand of Jesse Gray, an early settler of that region. Of this event, we take the following from an interview given by Joseph Hawkins, Esq., of Jay county, and Thomas Ward, of Randolph county:

DEATH OF FLEMING.

[We subjoin an account of the death of "Fleming," an Indian (not indeed a chief), which occurred near Ridgeville, soon after the settlement of that vicinity, given by Joseph Hawkins, Esq., of Jay county, Indiana, as told him by parties acquainted with the transaction. Some account of the same tragedy may be found in the reminiscences of Thomas Ward, George Thomas, and perhaps others.] "One Smith, a mulatto, had a white wife. She told the Indian, Fleming, that if he would kill Smith she would marry him. The Indian shot Smith through the body, but did not kill him. Out of this in some way grew the fact that some half-drunk Indians (Fleming and others) made an attack on Joab Ward. He was at breakfast, and they came in armed with butcher knives. He arose, seized a gun from the hooks, and sprang backward to the outer door, and into the back yard, pointing his loaded gun at one and another of the gang. Elias Kizer managed to get another loaded gun, and joined Ward in the yard. Then Fleming began to run, and Ward told Kizer to shoot him, which he did, the bullet striking his foot, as it was raised in running, passing in at his heel and up his leg to his knee. The other Indians begged so hard that they were let go. Fleming got across the river and lay down in the bushes, remaining there some time. Jesse Gray, the famous 'Indian hunter,' hearing the fact, came with his brother John, a lad of sixteen), to shoot the Indian. He told his brother to shoot him. The Indian lay on his belly, and as the boy went to shoot, he bent his body upward from the ground; and as the boy shot, he drew himself suddenly down, hugging close to the ground, and the bullet only grazed his back. But he acted as though he had received a fatal shot, and they thought him killed and went off. After the poor fellow had been wounded (in all) three days, Lewallyn, from pity, took him in. Some days after, Jesse Gray and Smith came to Lewallyn's and shot Fleming in the bed as he lay, and killed him. The Indian saw them come, and turned over to the wall and wrapped his head in the blanket, and Smith put his gun against Fleming's back and shot him through the head as he lay there in bed."

[Note.—Joab Ward told Hawkins as to the attack, and Charles Simmons, an employe of David Connor, told him as to what Gray and Smith did.]

DEATH OF FLEMING—By Thomas Ward.

"A white man brought whisky and sold it to the Indians. That white man fell out with my father, Joab Ward, one morning, and told him he should 'smell h—l' in less than an hour. Within an hour's time three Indians, Fleming, Killbuck and another, came to father's house as they were eating breakfast, armed with big knives and partly drunk. Elias Kizer and Thomas Andrews were there. All three managed to get their guns. Fleming tried hard to kill father; but when the men got the guns, Fleming ran, and the other Indians began to beg. Elias Kizer shot Fleming as he ran, the ball striking his heel when his foot was raised, and running up his leg to his knee. He managed to cross the river, but fell in the weeds on the north bank, and lay there several days. Jesse Gray and his brother came and undertook to kill him as he lay in the weeds, and thought they had done so. They, however, did not injure him. Lewallyn, who lived near, took him in out of pity, but Smith, the mulatto whom Fleming had shot through, but had not killed, came with Jesse Gray to Lewallyn's house and shot him dead in his bed, as he lay upon a pallet of deer skins. Before Fleming was killed, he kept on threatening to kill Joab Ward and my father."

It seems that the Indians were not much offended at the death of Fleming. He was vicious, and they had turned him off, and he skulked around, getting his living from place to place among the whites as he could. They came and buried him, but said, "He no good—Fleming bad Indian."

Jesse Gray, however, was afraid of the vengeance both of the Indians and the whites, and he fled the state, taking up his abode in Ohio, near Hill Grove, Darke county, and resided at that place several years.

Tyre T. Puckett, residing west of Winchester, relates concerning the poor Indian, that Fleming lay wounded on a deer-skin at Lewallyn's cabin. The Indians, though they had banished him from their tribes, nevertheless took pity on him. In particular, "Aunt Sally," wife of "Uncle Jake," and mother of "Indian Jim," came and doctored him, and said he would get well. Gray and Smith came to the cabin. Gray undertook to get Mrs. Lewallyn out of the house; she resisted, and he pulled her out, she crying out meanwhile, "Don't do any murder here." Almost instantly she heard the shot, and, struggling back, she saw Fleming lay dead upon his pallet.

The grand jury (of which Mr. Puckett's father was a member) indicted Jesse Gray (and probably Smith) for the homicide, and a "true bill" was found against them. They fled the county and the state, and no special pains were taken to find them, since everybody was glad the "vicious Indian" was out of the way. Mrs. Lewallyn was the witness, of course, for the state, because she was the one (and the only one, perhaps) who saw the "deed," except indeed Smith and Gray themselves.

Charles Morgan and his two brothers were killed by the savages at a sugar camp in the northern part of Wayne county, where they were boiling sugar water. Morgan resisted powerfully, but was overcome and tomahawked. One boy was killed by the tomahawk and the other was shot as he started to run. All three were scalped. This took place before 1811. Morgan was a leader in the band that tried to murder Johnny Green, an Indian warrior residing in the region, and many thought at the time that Morgan's death was accomplished by Green in revenge for his bitterness against the Indians.

Armfield Thornburg, a pioneer of Stoney Creek township, is said to have said that the three Indians who killed Morgan and the two lads were "trailed and were killed on the banks of Stoney creek, three miles south of Windsor, just in Delaware county."

BURNING AT THE STAKE.

"In the Indian village of Old Town, five miles above Muncie, many victims were tortured to death by a slow fire. They were tied to a stake, which was of oak, and ten or twelve feet high. A ring of ashes was round the stake, and the dancing in a circle by the Indians had trampled the ground as hard as a brick. The stake remained for many years to be seen and shuddered at by the passing traveler.

Mr. Thomas S. Neely, of Muncie, Indiana, and a pioneer of that region (in history of Delaware county, also elsewhere quoted from), says: 'On the farm of Samuel Cecil, in section 25, Center township, in 1839, was a piece of ground near the then Richmond state road, now the Burlington pike, on which tradition says one Colonel Winchester was burned by the Indians. The stake was visible when I came, and was charred. Around it for about fifty feet the ground was level and smooth, and the spot was round like a circus ring, only not thrown up on the circle. This tradition had gained considerable credence at the time, and all believed it to be true.' "

Who this Colonel Winchester was, when the act was done, or why in particular they subjected this prisoner to that fate we have no information. This method of putting to death was but common among the Indians, and many wretched captives, both of Indians and whites, perished in that way.

Among the early Indian traders of this county were: David Connor, aong the Mississinewa; Joseph Gess, on the Muncie-Greenville trail, south of Winchester, and Edward Edger, of Deerfield. Of these men, Connor was the best known trader of that time. Of him, Tucker says:

David Connor, Indian trader and chief [white man], came to Greenville in 1811 or 1812, and opened a small store and trading house, from which he dispersed blankets, calico, powder, lead, flints, tobacco, whisky and what not, to the "noble red men." He was married, but his wife remained in Greenville, refusing to accompany him in his wild life among the Indians. Although a rough, hard man in many respects, yet he had some good traits. He wielded a great influence over the Indians, which he sometimes employed for good purposes. In about 1824 (so says Judge Wharry, of Greenville, Ohio, who knew Connor all his life) some New York Indians, traveling to Green Bay, were murdered by some white villains in Indiana. Connor succeeded in securing justice and keeping the peace, and the Miamis on that account made him a "chief" of their tribe, with all due ceremony. He established himsef at Fort Recovery soon after the war of 1812 had closed in the West, probably in 1814. He had used his influence in securing the treaty of peace, and had made some enemies thereby. Several Indians came to his store one day, and told him they had come to kill him. "All right," said he, "give me a few minutes to fix things up." They granted his request and sat down. Suddenly he took a keg of powder, poured it on a deer skin, and seizing a fire brand, swore in strong, rough Miami, that he and they "should go to h—ll together." They "got" in a "heap hurry." The Indians never molested him again. One of them told Judge Wharry: "Connor one devil of a man; he care no more for Indians than he care for himself."

He next built a shanty above Deerfield (1820-21). After a few years he moved down the river to three miles below Wheeling and twenty miles above Marion. Still again he moved three miles below Marion, bought land, built mills, grew rich, and died some years ago.

[Note.—Some will have it that he had a station at Mississinewa crossing, near Allensville, and also one at Ridgeville, but the residents along the river do not understand the matter thus.]

At Greenville the understanding was that he had a wife and two boys and that she would not go with him in his wild, roving border life, and he "took up" with Polly Voorhees, by whom he raised a large family. He was a very rough, outbreaking man, so passionate that few dared to cross him. R. H. Sumption taught school near him, and six of his children attended the school. He did not call for his pay till the middle of the second term. The bill was large and Mr. Sumption feared he might not take the matter kindly. Connor happened to be in good humor and paid the bill without a word. At one of his "posts," the Indians got "ahead" of him. He had a shed at the side of his cabin, and a log out on the side next the store-room, and as he bought bundles of skins, he would toss them through the "crack" into the shed. By some means the Indians made or found a hole from the outside into the shed, through which they got out parcels of skins. First one would get out a parcel and take it in and sell it to Connor, then another, and so on, till Connor began to wonder where they got so many coon skins. Polly had noticed the game of the "red skins," and at last she said, "Connor, you fool, how long are you going to buy your own coon skins?" "Why?" said he. "Because," said she, "those tarnal Ingins have been stealing your coon skins and selling them to you over and over." What he did then and there is not told, but we may easily guess that there was a "rumpus," or danger of one about that time. [Burgett Pierce and others mention Connor in their recitals.]

The "Jay County History" says "that a pioneer family lived for a considerable time in a cabin built at Fort Recovery, Ohio, by David Connor, for a trading house at that point. So that most probably Mr. Connor traded at one period with the Indians near Fort Recovery. Judge Wharry, of Greenville, who knew Connor well, states that he went from Greenville to Fort Recovery in 1814, and stayed and traded at that location for several years.

Connor is said to have been an adept in deceiving the Indians and at the same time commanding their confidence and respect. At one time he went among them with a supply of needles, and gave out the information that the needle makers had all died and that he had the only known supply and emphasized that as soon as this supply was gone, no more needles were to be had. He succeeded in disposing of his stock, exchanging one needle for each coon skin, worth, perhaps, from 50 to 75 cents. He is said to have taken tin cups, melted the bottoms out and handles off, and traded the rims to the Indians, convincing them that they were silver bands. He also did a thriving business with them in whisky until as one Indian said: "We no trade with Connor. Too much Mississinewa in fire-water. No make Injun drunk."

But, the haughty Indian, erect and defiant, lord of all he saw, was soon to give way to the milder Indian, who lived in subjected peace with his white neighbor; glad of the opportunity to trade him pelts, meat, or baskets, moccasins and trinkets for corn, salt, meal, powder, arms and last, but not least, fire-water, the last of which did more to exterminate the red man than all other forces combined. Through its influence he became indeed a "red devil," ready to fight, stab and kill and then become a helpless, besotted, horrible example of its exterminating force. It was impossible for him to live in civilization, and he was swept west of the Mississippi, never again to be a factor in the settlement of the great Middle West.

CHAPTER IV.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COUNTY.

"The night was dark, the rain falling in torrents, when the inmates of a small log cabin in the woods of early Indiana were aroused from their slumbers by a loud knocking at the only door of the cabin. The man of the house, as he had been accustomed to do on like occasions, rose from his bed and hallooed, 'Who's here?' The outsiders answered, 'Friends, out bird-catching. Can we stay till morning?' The door was opened, and the strangers entered. A good log fire soon gave light and warmth to the room. Stranger to the host, 'What did you say when I knocked?' I said, 'Who's here?' 'I thought you said Hoosier.' The bird-catchers left after breakfast, but next night returned, and hallooed at the door, 'Hoosier,' and from that time the Indianians have been called Hoosiers—a name that will stick to them as long as Buckeyes will to Ohioans, or Suckers to Illinoians."

Thus the Hon. O. H. Smith, in his early Indiana trials, accounts for the name of Hoosier as an appellation to the people of this great commonwealth. There are, however, other explanations of the same term, although they may not be as authoritative. There was an early traveler in this state by the name of Sulgrove. Meredith Nicholson, in his excellent book, The Hoosier, gives the following story:

"Sulgrove related the incident of an Irishman, employed in excavating the canal around the falls at Louisville, who declared after a fight in which he had vanquished several fellow laborers, that he was 'a husher,' and this was offered as a possible origin of the word. The same writer suggested another explanation, that a certain Colonel Lehmanowski, a Polish officer who lectured through the west on Napoleon's Wars, pronounced Hussar in a way that captivated some roystering fellow, who applied the word to himself in self-glorification, pronouncing it 'Hoosier.' Lehmanowski's identity has been established as a sojourner in Indiana, and his son was a member of an Indiana regiment in the Civil war. The Rev. Aaron Woods is another contributor to the literature of the subject, giving the Lehmanowski story with a few variations. When the young men of the Indiana side of the Ohio crossed over to Louisville, the Kentuckians made sport of them, calling them

'New Purchase greenies,' and declaring that they of the southern side of the river were a superior race, composed of 'half alligator, half horse, and tipped off with snapping turtle!' Fighting grew out of these boasts in the market place and streets of Louisville. One Indiana visitor who had heard Lehmanowski lecture on "The Wars of Europe" and been captivated by the prowess of the Hussars, whipped one of the Kentuckians, and bending over him cried, 'I'm a Hoosier,' meaning, 'I'm a Hussar.' Mr. Woods adds that he was living in the state at the time and that this was the true origin of the term. This is, however, hardly conclusive. The whole Lehmanowski story seems to be based on communication between Indiana and Kentucky workmen during the building of the Ohio Falls canal."

This could hardly have been the origin of the time because the canal was not built until 1830. Much earlier than this; in fact, 1828, a man by the name of John Finley, a Virginian, came to Indiana and lived in the state several years. He had been here at least seven years, when he published a poem known as The Hoosier Nest, in which he uses the word Hoosier. Evidently it had been in use for some time, because Finley himself could scarcely have originated the term. Finley is describing an early Indiana life when he says:

"I'm told in riding somewhere West,
A stranger found a Hoosier nest;
In other words, a Buckeye cabin,
Just big enough to hold Queen Mab in.
Its situation low, but airy,
Was on the borders of a prairie;
And fearing he might be benighted
He hailed the house, and then alighted.
The Hoosier met him at the door,
Their salutations soon were o'er.
He took the stranger's horse aside
And to a sturdy sapling tied.
Then having stripped the saddle off,
He fed him in a sugar trough.
The stranger stooped to enter in,
The entrance closing with a pin;
And manifested strong desire
To seat him by the log-heap fire.

Where half a dozen Hoosieroons,
With mush and milk, tin-cups and spoons,
White heads, bare feet and dirty faces, Seemed much inclined to keep their places."

In order to get a complete understanding of the history of Randolph county it will be necessary to go far back into our colonial history; in fact, to the very beginning of it. The territory was claimed by no less than four states—New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut and Virginia, which was organized under "royal charter, which gave them certain control of land as far west as the Mississippi. France also laid claim to this territory, through the right of exploration and discovery on the part of LaSalle and other

Frenchmen. At the close of the French and Indian War, France deeded this territory to Great Britain in 1763. The British then had three forts, one at Detroit, one at Vincennes and one at Kaskaskia. When the colonists declared their independence in 1776, the settlers west of the Appalachian mountains, became very restless. Especially was this true of Kentucky, which was then no more or less than a frontier settlement of Virginia. So keen did they become in the matter, that they sent one of their most forceful citizens, George Rogers Clark, to Williamsburg, Virginia, to confer with the governor, Patrick Henry, concerning the matter. Clark urged that they were in great danger from the Indian tribes, and this danger could not be overcome until the forts along the Ohio were captured. For the British were doing all in their power to incite the Indians against the Americans. From the forts at Detroit, Vincennes and Kaskaskia, agents were sent out among the Indians, encouraging them to all sorts of depredation. Rewards were paid for prisoners and scalps. Governor Henry was not disposed to look upon the scheme with much favor, and gave it but little encouragement at first. Clark, however, was insistent and succeeded finally in impressing upon him the great amount of dissatisfaction that existed among the colonists in Kentucky. He did not succeed, however, in doing this until he put the matter squarely at Governor Henry, by saying, "A country that was not worth defending, was not worth possessing." This remark fired the zeal of Henry, and he gave Clark money and authority to raise a company of Kentuckians, to move against Kaskaskia and Vincennes. Clark succeeded in capturing these forts, and upon this claim, Virginia based its claims to what is now known as the Northwest territory. Thus, we see that New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut and Virginia, each laid claim to this territory.

Trouble soon began to occur in Congress between the members of the House of Representatives and Senate from these various states, formed from the colonies that we have mentioned. This was especially true after the close of the Revolutionary war, and the people west of the Alleghenies began to clamor for their rights of statehood. The state of Franklin had been organized where we now have Tennessee, and the Carolinas and Maryland had had difficulties over this matter. Jefferson was long headed enough to see that the only solution of the problem was to put the control of the entire country under that of the general central government. Some of the colonies were slow to accept this idea, but Virginia through its representatives, kept pushing the matter and urging it not only at home, but in Congress as well.

"In 1781, Virginia signified her willingness to make the cession of the land northwest of the Ohio," says O. H. Smith, "when Congress should agree to the terms proposed by her. Finally, in 1784, the following deed of cession was made:

"To all whom shall see these presents: We, Thomas Jefferson, Samuel Hardy, Arthur Lee and James Monroe, the underwritten delegates for the commonwealth of Virginia, in the Congress of the United States of America, send greeting:

"Whereas, The General Assembly of the commonwealth of Virginia, at their session begun on the 20th of October, 1783, passed an act entitled 'an act to authorize the delegates of this state in Congress to convey to the United States, in Congress assembled, all the right of this commonwealth to the territory northwestward of the river Ohio in these words, to-wit:

"Whereas, The Congress of the United States did, by their act of the 6th day of September, in the year 1780, recommend to the several states of the Union, having claims to waste and unappropriated lands in the western country, a liberal cession to the United States of a portion of their respective claims for the benefit of the Union; and whereas, this commonwealth did, on the 2d day of January, in the year 1781, yield to the Congress of the United States, for the benefit of the said States, all right, title and claim which the said commonwealth had to the territory northwest of the river Ohio, subject to the conditions annexed to the said act of cession; and whereas, the United States, in Congress assembled, have by their act of the 13th of September last, stipulated the terms on which they agree to accept the cession of this state, should the legislature approve thereof, which terms, although they do not come fully up to the proposition of this commonwealth, are conceived on the whole to approach so nearly to them as to induce this state to accept thereof, in full confidence that Congress will, in justice to this state, for the liberal cession she hath made, earnestly press upon the other states claiming large tracts of waste and uncultivated territory, the propriety of making cessions equally liberal for the common benefit and support of the Union; be it enacted by the General Assembly, that it shall and may be lawful for the delegates of this state to the Congress of the United States, or such of them as shall be assembled in Congress, and the said delegates, or such of them so assembled, are hereby fully authorized and empowered, for and on behalf of this state, by proper deed or instruments in writing, under their hands and seals, to convey, transfer, assign and make over unto the United States in Congress assembled, for the benefit of the said states, all right, title and claim, as well of soil as jurisdiction, which this commonwealth hath to the territory or tract of country within the limits of the Virginia charter, situate, lying and being to the northwest of the river Ohio, and subject to the terms and conditions contained in the before recited act of Congress of the 13th day of September last; that is to say, upon condition that the territory so ceded shall be laid out and formed into states, containing a suitable extent of territory, not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit; and that the states so formed shall be distinct republican states and admitted members of the Federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom and independence as the other states; that the necessary and reasonable expenses incurred by this state in subduing any British posts, or in maintaining forts or garrisons within, and for the defense or in acquirng any part of the territory so ceded or relinquished, shall be fully reimbursed by the United States; and that one commissioner shall be appointed by Congress, one by this commonwealth, and another by those two commissioners, who, or a majority of them, shall be authorized and empowered to adjust and liquidate the account of the necessary and reasonable expenses incurred by this state, which they shall judge to be comprised within the intent and meaning of the act of Congress of the 10th of October, 1780, respecting such expenses; that the French and Canadian inhabitants, and the other settlers of the Kaskaskias, St. Vincent's and other neighboring villages, who have professed themselves citizens of Virginia, shall have their possessions and titles confirmed to them and be protected in the enjoyment of their rights and liberties; that a quantity, not exceeding one hundred and fifty thousand acres of land, promised by this state, shall be allowed and granted to then Colonel, now General George Rogers Clark, and to the officers and soldiers of his regiment who marched with him when the posts of Kaskaskia and St. Vincent's were reduced, and to the officers and soldiers that have been since incorporated into the said regiment, to be laid off in one tract, the length of which not to exceed double the breadth, in such place on the northwest side of the Ohio as a majority of the officers shall choose, and to be afterwards divided among the said officers and soldiers in due proportion, according to the laws of Virginia; that in case the quantity of good lands on the southeast side of the Ohio, upon the waters of the Cumberland river, and between the Green river and Tennessee river, which have been reserved by law for the Virginia troops upon continental establishment, should from the North Carolina line bearing in further upon the Cumberland than was expected, prove insufficient for their legal bounties, the deficiency should be made up to the said troops in good lands, to be laid off between the rivers Scioto and Little Miami, on the northwest side of the river Ohio, in such proportions as have been engaged to them by the laws of Virginia; that all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for or appropriated to any of the before mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the confederation or federal alliance of said states, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other purpose whatsoever; Provided, that the trust hereby reposed in the delegates of this state shall not be executed, unless three of them at least are present in Congress.'

"And, whereas, the said General Assembly, by their resolution of June 6, 1783, had constituted us, the said Thomas Jefferson, Samuel Hardy, Arthur Lee and James Monroe, delegates to represent the said commonwealth in Congress for one year from the first Monday in November then next following, which resolution remains in full force:

"Now, therefore, know ye that we, the said Thomas Jefferson, Samuel Hardy, Arthur Lee and James Monroe, by virtue of the power and authority committed to us by the act of the said General Assembly of Virginia, before recited, and in the name, and for and on behalf of the said commonwealth, do by these presents, convey, transfer, assign and make over unto the United States, in Congress assembled, for the benefit of the said states, Virginia inclusive, all right, title and claim, as well of soil as of jurisdiction, which the said commonwealth hath to the territory or tract of country within the limits of the Virginia charter, situate, lying and being to the northwest of the river Ohio, to and for the uses and purposes, and on the conditions of this said recited act. In testimony whereof we have hereunto subscribed our names and affixed our seals in Congress, the first day of March, in the year of our Lord, 1784, and of the independence of the United States the eighth."

New York, Massachusetts and Connecticut finally fell into line, and although Connecticut held for a long time to a claim on what is called the Western Reserve, it finally surrendered this to the government on the 30th of May, 1800. The plan of Jefferson had finally won, and the United States had control over the Northwest Territory, having all claims excepting that of the Indians. The first thing to do was to establish some sort of government. The British had governed it by the common law of England, and the French had had scarcely any government at all. At first Congress provided for the formation of the new territory of ten states. Smith, in his history, says: "The region west of Lake Michigan and north of parallel 45 was to be known as the state of Silvania; the lower peninsula of Michigan north of parallel 43 as Chersonesus; that part of Wisconsin between parallels 43 and 45 as Michigania; between parallels 41 and 43 the eastern state as Metropotamia; and the western as Assenisipia; between parallels 39 and 41, the eastern as Saratoga and the western as Illinois; between parallel 39 and the Ohio, the eastern state as Pelisipia and the western as Polypotamia; and the territory east of a meridian line drawn through the mouth of the Great Kanawha as Washington. By this proposition Indiana would have been divided among six of the states. No action was ever taken on this report.

From the time of cession until 1787 there had been no organized control over the Northwestern territory. The people had been left to struggle along as best they could. Several companies had been organized in the east for the purpose of settling and colonizing this territory, and propositions had been made to Congress for the purpose of large tracts of land, but none of them had ever fully materialized. On April 23, 1787, a committee consisting of Mr. Johnson, of Connecticut; Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina; Mr. Smith, of New York; Mr. Dane, of Massachusetts; and Mr. Henry, of Maryland, reported an ordinance for the government of the Western territory. It was discussed from time to time and greatly amended. Finally, on the 13th of July, it passed Congress. This great ordinance laid the foundation of freedom in the rich states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin, and is known as the Ordinance of 1787, for the government and control of the Northwest territory. This great document of state is of such great importance to all people, that even a history of so small a portion of this great territory as Randolph county, could not in any sense be complete without a definite knowledge of what this ordinance is. It lays the very foundation of our government, giving us our rights and privileges, and defining our relation to the state. It is as follows:

AN ORDINANCE FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF THE TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES NORTHWEST OF THE RIVER OHIO.

Be it ordained by the United States in Congress assembled, that the said Territory, for the purposes of temporary government, be one District; subject, however, to be divided into two Districts, as future circumstances may, in the opinion of Congress, make it expedient.

Be it ordained by the authority aforesaid, that the estates both of resident and non-resident proprietors in the said Territory, dying intestate shall descend to, and be distributed among their children, and the descendants of a deceased child, in equal parts; the descendants of a deceased child or grandchild to take the share of their deceased parent in equal parts among them; and where there shall be no children or descendants, then in equal parts to the next kin, in equal degree; and among collaterals, the children of a deceased brother or sister of the intestate shall have, in equal parts among them, their deceased parents' share; and there shall, in no case, be a distinction between kindred of the whole and half blood; saving in all cases to the widow of the intestate, her third part of the real estate for life, and one-third part of the personal estate; and this law relative to descents and dower, shall remain in full force, until altered by the Legislature of the District. And until the Governor and Judges shall adopt laws as hereinafter mentioned, estate in the said Territory may be devised or bequeathed by wills in writing, signed and sealed by him or her, in whom the estate may be (being of full age), and attested by three witnesses; and real estates may be conveyed by lease and release, or bargain and sale, signed, sealed and delivered, by the person, being of full age, in whom the estate may be, and attested by two witnesses, provided such wills be duly proved, and such conveyances be acknowledged, or the execution thereof duly proved, and be recorded within one year after proper magistrates, courts and registers, shall be appointed for that purpose; and personal property may be transferred by delivery; saving, however, to the French and Canadian inhabitants, and other settlers of the Kaskaskies, Saint Vincents, and the neighboring villages, who have heretofore possessed themselves citizens of Virginia, their laws and customs now in force among them, relative to the descent and conveyance of property.

Be it ordained by the authority aforesaid, That there shall be appointed, from time to time, by Congress, a Governor whose commission shall continue in force for the term of three years, unless sooner revoked by Congress: he shall reside in the District, and have a freehold estate therein, in one thousand acres of land, while in the exercise of his office.

There shall be appointed, from time to time, by Congress, a Secretary, whose commission shall continue in force for four years, unless sooner revoked; he shall reside in the district, and have a freehold estate therein, in five hundred acres of land, while in the exercise of his office; it shall be his duty to keep and preserve the acts and laws passed by the Legislature, and the public records of the District, and the proceedings of the Governor in his executive department; and transmit authentic copies of such acts and proceedings, every six months to the Secretary of Congress: There shall also be appointed a Court, to consist of three judges, any two of whom to form a court, who shall have a common law jurisdiction, and reside in the District, and have each therein a freehold estate, in five hundred acres of land, while in the exercise of their offices; and their commissions shall continue in force during good behavior.

The Governor and Judges, or a majority of them, shall adopt and publish in the District, such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the District, and report them to Congress, from time to time; which laws shall be in force in the District until the organization of the General Assembly therein, unless disapproved of by Congress; but afterwards the Legislature shall have authority to alter them as they shall think fit.

The Governor for the time being shall be Commander-in-chief of the militia, appoint and commission all officers in same, below the rank of general officers; all general officers shall be appointed and commissioned by Congress.

Previous to the organization of the General Assembly the Governor shall appoint such magistrates and other civil officers, in each county or township, as he shall find necessary for the preservation of the peace and good order in the same. After the General Assembly shall be organized, the powers and duties of magistrates and other civil officers shall be regulated and defined by the said assembly; but all magistrates and other civil officers not herein otherwise directed, shall, during the continuance of this temporary government, be appointed by the Governor.

For the prevention of crimes and injuries, the laws to be adopted or made shall have force in all parts of the District, and for the execution of process, criminal and civil, the Governor shall make proper divisions thereof; and he shall proceed from time to time, as circumstances may require, to lay out the parts of the District in which the Indian titles shall have been extinguished, into counties and townships, subject, however, to such alterations as may thereafter be made by the Legislature.

So soon as there shall be five thousand free male inhabitants, of full age, in the District, upon giving proof thereof to the Governor, they shall receive authority, with time and place, to elect representatives from their counties or townships, to represent them in the General Assembly; provided that, for every five hundred free male inhabitants, there shall be one representative, and so on, progressively, with the number of free male inhabitants, shall the right of representation increase, until the amount of representatives shall amount to twenty-five; after which the number and proportion of Representatives shall be regulated by Legislature; provided, that no person be eligible or qualified to act as a Representative, unless he shall have been a citizen of one of the United States three years, and be a resident in the District, or unless he shall have resided in the District three years, and in either case, shall likewise hold in his own right, in fee simple, two hundred acres of land within the same; provided, also, that a freehold in fifty acres of land in the District, having been a citizen of one of the States, and being resident in the District, or the like freehold and two years' residence in the District, shall be necessary to qualify a man as an elector of a Representative.

The Representatives, thus elected, shall serve for the term of two years; and in case of the death of a Representative, or removal from office, the Governor shall issue a writ to the county or township for which he was a member, to elect another in his stead, to serve for the residue of the term.

"The General Assembly or Legislature, shall consist of the Governor, Legislative Council, and a House of Representatives. The Legislative Council shall consist of five members, to continue in office five years, unless sooner removed by Congress; any three of whom to be a quorum; and the member of the Council shall be nominated and appointed in the following manner, to wit: As soon as Representatives shall be elected, the Governor shall appoint a time and place for them to meet together, and when met, they shall nominate ten persons, residents in the District, and each possessed of a freehold in five hundred acres of land, and return their names to Congress; five of whom Congress shall appoint and commission to serve as aforesaid: and whenever a vacancy shall happen in the Council, by death or removal from office, the House of Representatives shall nominate two persons, qualified as aforesaid, for each vacancy, and return their names to Congress; one of whom Congress shall appoint and commission for the residue of the term: And every five years, four months at least before the expiration of the time of service of the members of council, the said House shall nominate ten persons, qualified as aforesaid, and return their names to Congress; five of whom Congress shall appoint and commission to serve as members of the Council five years, unless sooner removed. And the Governor, Legislative Council, and House of Representatives, shall have authority to make laws, in all cases for the good government of the District, not repugnant to the principles and articles in this ordinance established and declared. And all bills, having passed by a majority in the House, and by a majority in the Council, shall be referred to the Governor for his assent; but no bill or legislative act whatever, shall be of any force without his assent. The Governor shall have power to convene, prorogue, and dissolve, the General Assembly, when, in his opinion, it shall be expedient.

The Governor, Judges, Legislative Council, Secretary, and such other offices as Congress shall appoint in the District, shall take an oath or affirmation of fidelity, and of office; the Governor before the President of Congress, and all other officers before the Governor. As soon as a Legislature shall be formed in the District, the Council and House assembled, in one room, shall have authority, by joint ballot, to elect a delegate to Congress, who shall have a seat in Congress, with a right of debating, but not of voting during this temporary government.

And for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions, are erected; to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in said territory; to provide also for the establishment of states, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the Federal councils on an equal footing with the original states, at as early periods as may be consistent with the general interest.

It is hereby ordained and declared, by the authority aforesaid, That the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact, between the original states and the people and states in the said territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent, to-wit:

Art. 1. No person, meaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner, shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments, in the said territory.

Art. 2. The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the Legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made, or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with, or affect, private contracts or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud, previously formed.

Art. 3. Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged. The utmost faith shall always be observed towards the Indians; their lands and property shall never be taken from them without their consent; and in their property, rights and liberty, they never shall be invaded or disturbed, unless in just and lawful wars authorized by Congress; but laws founded in justice and humanity shall, from time to time, be made for preventing wrongs being done them, and for preserving peace and friendship with them.

Art. 4. The said territory and the states which may be formed therein shall forever remain a part of this Confederacy of the United States of America, subject to the Articles of Confederation, and to such alterations therein as shall be constitutionally made; and to all the acts and ordinances of the United States in Congress assembled, conformable thereto. The inhabitants and settlers in the said territory shall be subject to pay a part of the Federal debts, contracted or to be contracted, and a proportional part of the expenses of government, to be apportioned on them by Congress, according to the same common rule and measure by which apportionments thereof shall be made on the other states; and the taxes for paying their proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the district or districts, or new states, as in the original states within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled. The legislatures of those districts, or new states, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers. No tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents. The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said territory as to the citizens of the United States and those of any other states that may be admitted into the Confederacy, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor.

Art. 5. There shall be formed in the said territory, not less than three nor more than five states; and the boundaries of the states, as soon as Virginia shall alter her act of cession, and consent to the same, shall become fixed and established as follows, to-wit: The western state in the said territory shall be bounded by the Mississippi, the Ohio and Wabash rivers; a direct line drawn from the Wabash and Post Vincents, due north, to the territorial line between the United States and Canada; and by the said territorial line to the lake of the woods and Mississippi. The middle states shall be bounded by the said direct line, the Wabash, from Post Vincents to the Ohio, by the Ohio by a direct line drawn due north from the mouth of the Great Miami to the said territorial line and by the said territorial line. The eastern state shall be bounded by the last mentioned direct line, the Ohio, Pennsylvania and the said territorial line; provided, however, and it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three states shall be subject so far to be altered, that, if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two states in that part of the said territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of lake Michigan. And whenever any of the said states shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such state shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original states, in all respects whatever; and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and state government; provided, the constitution and government, so to be formed, shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the Confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the state than sixty thousand.

Art. 6. There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; provided, always, that any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any one of the original states, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service as aforesaid.

Be it ordained by the authority aforesaid, that the resolutions of the 23d of April, 1784, relative to the subject of this ordinance, be, and the same are hereby repealed and declared null and void.

Government became a great necessity in this new territory. The Indians were committing all sorts of depredations and were not held in any restraint whatever, by what few authorities were there. In fact the same legislative bodies that passed the Ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest territory, of the 13th of July, 1787, also passed on the 21st of July the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the superintendent of Indian affairs for the northern department, and in case he be unable to attend, then Col. Josiah Harmar, immediately proceed to Post Vincennes, or some other place more convenient, in his opinion, for holding a treaty with the Wabash Indians, the Shawnees, and other hostile tribes; that he inform those Indians that Congress is sincerely disposed to promote peace and friendship between their citizens and the Indians; that to this end he is sent to invite them, in a friendly manner, to a treaty with the United States, to hear their complaints, to know the truth, and the causes of their quarrels with those frontier settlers; and having invited those Indians to the treaty, he shall make strict inquiry into the causes of their uneasiness and hostile proceedings, and form a treaty of peace with them, if it can be done on terms consistent with the honor and dignity of the United States."

Nor were the Indian troubles the only troubles of the United States at this time. The term of the enlisted soldiers was rapidly nearing an end, and this led Congress on the 3d of October, 1787, to pass another resolution as follows:

"Whereas, the time for which the greater part of the troops on the frontiers are engaged, will expire in the course of the ensuing year,

"Resolved, That the interests of the United States require that a corps of seven hundred troops should be stationed on the frontiers to protect the settlers on the public lands from the depredations of the Indians, to facilitate the surveying and selling the said lands, in order to reduce the public debt, and to prevent all unwarrantable intrusions thereon."

The Indian question was made all the more difficult to handle by a dissension among those in authority at Washington. This is indicated by a letter written December 14, 1786, from John Jay to Thomas Jefferson, which reads as follows:

"In my opinion our Indian affairs have been ill managed. Indians have been murdered by our people in cold blood and no satisfaction given; nor are they (the Indians) pleased with the avidity with which we seek to acquire their lands."

It will be noticed that neither Jay nor Jefferson had ever come in direct contact with the Indians or with the Indian question, and balancing against their opinion, were the opinions to the contrary of those who had come in contract with the Indians in their own habitat. Such men as Washington, St. Clair, Clark and Wayne were as strong in their opinions in favor of the way the Indians were being treated, as were the opposition. Congress evidently held to the opinion of these men, as on the 5th of October, 1787, it appointed Arthur St. Clair as the governor of the new territory.

St. Clair was a soldier, having served in the British army during the French war, and in the American forces in the Revolutionary war with great distinction. Congress evidently felt that he would be severe with the Indians, as he was instructed not to neglect any opportunity that might offer of extinguishing the Indian right to land as far west as the Mississippi river, and as far northward as the completion of the forty-first degree of north latitude. He was also instructed to use every effort to affiliate the various Indian tribes. He established his seated government at Marietta on the Ohio river. He had a general court composed of three men. That he and these men understood the conditions under which they labored is shown by the position that they established in their government, which was as follows:

"Whereas, idle, vain and obscene conversation, profane cursing and swearing, and more especially the irreverently mentioning, calling upon, or invoking the Sacred and Supreme Being, by any of the divine characters in which He has graciously condescended to reveal His infinitely beneficent purposes to mankind, are repugnant to every moral sentiment, subversive of every civil obligation, inconsistent with the ornaments of polished life and abhorent to the principles of the most benevolent religion. It is expected, therefore, if crimes of this kind should exist, they will not find encouragement, countenance or approbation in this territory."

"Whereas, mankind in every stage of informed society, has consecrated certain portions of time to the particular cultivation of the social virtues, and the public adoration and worship of the common Parent of the Universe; and whereas, as a practice so rational in itself and conformable to the divine precepts is greatly conducive to civilization as well as morality and piety; and whereas, for the advancement of such important and interesting purposes, most of the Christian world have set apart the first day of the week as a day of rest from common labors and pursuits; it is therefore enjoined that all servile labor, works of necessity and charity only excepted, be wholly abstained from on said day."

Thus it is seen that while St. Clair was stern in every particular yet he hoped to govern with kindness. This in view, he attempted a compromise or treaty with a number of the Indians of the Six Nations, but the Wyandot, Delaware, Ottawa, Chippewa, Potawatamie and Sac tribes refused to be bound by his treaties and entreaties, and soon began depredations against the people of Virginia and Kentucky.

Three expeditions under Harmar, Scott and Wilkinson had been sent against the Indians and had been unsuccessful, especially against the tribes of the Miamis and Shawnees. Their people had been killed, their villages had been destroyed, their children and women had been taken into captivity. This, however, did not subdue the Indians, and St. Clair found it necessary to form an expedition himself to go against them. British agents were making it all the worse, because they were secretly helping the Indians at every opportunity. This was especially true of the agents, Simon Girty, Alexander McKee and Matthew Eliott, who were subordinate agents in the British Indian department. It must be remembered that Great Britain still had forts along the Niagara and Detroit rivers, which they maintained in defiance of their treaty of peace of 1783. Had it not have been for the secret help of the British agents, the United States might have had no difficulty in handling the Indians and holding them to their treaty. But the British were jealous of the power of the United States, and were anxious for the profitable fur trade which they were carrying on in this territory. St. Clair, however, was not to be discouraged and on the 28th of March, 1791, he left the city of Philadelphia and proceeded to Pittsburg. From Pittsburg he went to Lexington and from Lexington to Fort Washington, where Cincinnati now is, where he arrived on the 15th of May. During the first part of the month of September, in 1791, General Butler in command of the major part of the army, who from Ludlow's Station near Fort Washington, had marched about twenty-five miles north where he built a fort called Fort Hamilton. As soon as this fort was finished, he continued his march toward the Miami village to a point about forty-two miles north of Fort Hamilton, where he built Fort Jefferson. Fort Jefferson is just a little south of where Greenville. Ohio, now is.

Having completed Fort Jefferson, they pushed on further to the north. Hard rains had been falling for several days and this turning to snow, made the soldiers very uncomfortable. The roads, if such they might be called, were very bad, indeed. In fact they were frequently stopped on account of the road-cutter not being able to keep ahead of the army, slow as it may travel. On the 30th of October, they made but seven miles, although they traveled all day and left a portion of their equipment behind. Provisions were short. The quartermaster's department was not adequate. The militia was very much dissatisfied and sixty of them deserted on the 31st. It was reported that half of them had gone but this was a mistake. St. Clair sent a convoy of soldiers in pursuit of them with orders to Major Hamtramck, to send a sufficient guard back with Benham, and to follow the militia about twenty-five miles below Fort Jefferson, or until he met the second convoy and then return and join the army. Only a few Indians were reported as having been seen. In fact they lament, that in one day, they saw five and allowed them to get away. This was not due to the fact that Indians were not around in plenty, but rather to the fact that the Indians were more skilled and cunning than the white men in the arts of Indian warfare. At this time the Little Turtle, Blue-jacket, Buck-ong-a-he-lax and other Indian chiefs of less distinction, were lined a few miles distant from St. Clair's army with about twelve hundred warriors, awaiting a favorable moment to begin an attack. Simon Girty, the British agent to whom we have referred to before, was an active agent among the Indians. The campaign of St. Clair was so disastrous, not only in its immediate but in its far reaching effect, and has such great bearing upon the attitude of the settlers in Randolph county years later, that we shall give his correspondence in full.

In a letter, dated "Fort Washington, November 9, 1791," and addressed to the secretary of war, Governor St. Clair said: "At this place (the ground on which the army was encamped on the evening of the 3d of November), which I judged to be about fifteen miles from the Miami village, I determined to throw up a slight work, the plan of which was concerted that evening with Major Ferguson, wherein to have deposited the men's knapsacks, and everything else that was not of absolute necessity, and to have moved on to attack the enemy as soon as the first regiment was come up. But they did not permit me to execute either, for on the 4th, about half an hour before sunrise, and when the men had been just dismissed from parade (for it was a constant practice to have them all under arms a considerable time before daylight), an attack was made upon the militia. Those gave way in a very little time and rushed into camp through Major Butler's battalion (which together with a part of Clarke's, they threw into considerable disorder, and which, notwithstanding the exertions of both those officers, was never altogether remedied), the Indians following close at their heels. The fire, however, of the front line checked them, but almost instantly a very heavy fire began upon that line and in a few minutes it was extended to the second likewise. The great weight of it was directed against the center of each, where the artillery was placed, and from which the men were repeatedly driven with great slaughter. Finding no great effect from our fire, and confusion beginning to spread from the great number of men who were falling in all quarters, it became necessary to try what could be done by the bayonet. Lieutenant-colonel Darke was accordingly ordered to make a charge with part of the second line and to turn the left flank of the enemy. This was executed with great spirit. The Indians instantly gave way and were driven back three or four hundred yards, but for want of a sufficient number of riflemen to pursue this advantage, they soon returned and the troops were obliged to give back in their turn. At this moment they had entered our camp by the left flank, having pushed back the troops that were posted there. Another charge was made here by the second regiment, Butler's and Clarke's battalions, with equal effect, and it was repeated several times and always with success, but in all of them many men were lost and particularly the officers, which, with so raw troops, was a loss altogether irremediable. In that I just spoke of, made by the second regiment and Butler's battalion, Major Butler was dangerously wounded and every officer of the second regiment fell except three, one of which, Mr. Greaton, was shot through the body.

"Our artillery being now silenced, and all the officers killed except Captain Ford, who was very badly wounded, and more than half of the army fallen, being cut off from the road, it became necessary to attempt the regaining of it and to make a retreat, if possible. To this purpose the remains of the army was formed, as well as circumstances would permit, toward the right of the encampment, from which, by the way of the second line, another charge was made upon the enemy as if with the design to turn their right flank, but in fact, to gain the road. This was effected and as soon as it was open, the militia took along it followed by the troops, Major Clark with his battalion covering the rear.

"The retreat, in those circumstances, was, you may be sure, a very precipitate one. It was, in fact, a flight. The camp and artillery were abandoned, but that was unavoidable, for not a horse was left alive to have drawn it off had it otherwise been practicable. But the most disgraceful part of the business is, that the greatest part of the men threw away their arms and accouterments, even after the pursuit, which continued about four miles, had ceased. I found the road strewed with them for many miles, but was not able to remedy it, for, having had all my horses killed and being mounted upon one that could not be pricked out of a walk, I could not get forward myself and the orders I sent forward either to halt the front or to prevent the men from parting with their arms, were unattended to. The route continued quite to Fort Jefferson, twenty-nine miles, which was reached a little after sunset.

"The action began about half an hour before sunrise and the retreat was attempted at half an hour after nine o'clock. I have not yet been able to get returns of the killed and wounded, but Major-general Butler, Lieutenant-colonel Oldham of the militia, Major Ferguson, Major Hart and Major Clarke are among the former. Colonel Sargent, my adjutant-general, Lieutenant-colonel Darke, Lieutenant-colonel Gibson, Major Butler and the Viscount Malartie, who served me as an aid-de-camp, are among the latter and a great number of captains and subalterns in both.

"I have now, sir, finished my melancholy tale—a tale that will be felt sensibly by every one that has sympathy for private distress or for public misfortune. I have nothing, sir, to lay to the charge of the troops, but their want of discipline, which, from the short time they had been in service, it was impossible they should have acquired and which rendered it very difficult when they were thrown into confusion to reduce them again to order, and is one reason why the loss has fallen so heavy on the officers, who did everything in their power to effect it. Neither were my own exertions wanting, but, worn down with illness and suffering under a painful disease, unable either to mount or dismount a horse without assistance, they were not so great as they otherwise would, and perhaps ought to have been. We were overpowered by numbers but it is no more than justice to observe, that, though composed of so many different species of troops, the utmost harmony prevailed through the whole army during the campaign. At Fort Jefferson I found the first regiment, which had returned from the service they had been sent upon, without either overtaking the deserters or meeting the convoy of provisions. I am not certain, sir, whether I ought to consider the absence of this regiment from the field of action as fortunate, or otherwise. I incline to think it was fortunate, for, I very much doubt whether, had it been in the action, the fortune of the day would have been turned; and, if it had not, the triumph of the enemy would have been more complete and the country would have been destitute of every means of defense. Taking a view of the situation of our broken troops at Fort Jefferson and that there was no provisions in the fort, I called upon the field officers, viz: Lieutenant-colonel Darke, Major Hamtramck, Major Zeigler, and Major Gaither, together with the adjutant-general (Winthrop Sargent), for their advice what would be proper further to be done and it was their unanimous opinion, that the addition of the first regiment, unbroken as it was, did not put the army on so respectable a foot as it was in the morning, because a great part of it was now unarmed; that it had then been found unequal to the enemy and should they come on, which was possible, would be found so again; that the troops could not be thrown into the fort, both because it was too small and that there were no provisions in it; that provisions were known to be upon the road at the distance of one or at most two marches; that, therefore, it would be proper to move, without loss of time, to meet the provisions, when the men might have the sooner an opportunity of some refreshment and that a proper detachment might be sent back with it to have it safely deposited in the fort. This advice was accepted and the army was put in motion at ten o'clock and marched all night and the succeeding day met with a quantity of flour. Part of it was distributed immediately, part taken back to supply the army on the march to Fort Hamilton and the remainder, about fifty horse loads, sent forward to Fort Jefferson. The next day a drove of cattle was met with for the same place and I have information that both got in. The wounded, who had been left at that place, were ordered to be brought to Fort Washington by the return horses.

"I have said, sir, in a former part of this letter, that we were overpowered by numbers. Of that, however, I have no other evidence but the weight of the first which was always a most deadly one and generally delivered from the ground—few of the enemy showing themselves afoot, except when they were charged, and that, in a few minutes our whole camp, which extended about three hundred and fifty yards in length, was entirely surrounded and attacked on all quarters. The loss, sir, the public has sustained by the fall of so many officers, particularly General Butler and Major Ferguson, can not be too much regretted, but it is a circumstance that will alleviate the misfortune in some measure, that all of them fell most gallantly doing their duty. I have had very particular obligations to many of them, as well as to the survivors, but to none more than to Colonel Sargent. He has discharged the various duties of his office with zeal, with exactness and with intelligence, and, on all occasions, afforded me every assistance in his power, which I have also experienced from my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Denny, and the Viscount Malartie, who served with me in the station as a volunteer."

In the disastrous action of the 4th of November, 1791, St. Clair lost thirty-nine officers killed and five hundred and ninety-three men killed and wounded. Twenty-two officers and two hundred and forty-two men were wounded. The officers killed were: Major-general Richard Butler; Lieutenant-colonel Oldham, of the Kentucky militia; Majors Ferguson, Clarke and Hart; Captains Bradford, Phelon, Kirkwood, Price, Van Swearingen, Tipton, Smith, Purdy, Piatt, Guthrie, Cribbs and Newman; Lieutenants Spear, Warren, Boyd, McMath, Read, Burgess, Kelso, Little, Hopper and Lickens; Ensigns Balch, Cobb, Chase, Turner, Wilson, Brooks, Beatty and Purdy; Quartermasters Reynolds and Ward; Adjutant Anderson; and Doctor Grasson. The officers wounded were: Lieutenant-colonels Gibson, Darke and Sargent (adjutant-general); Major Butler; Captains Doyle, Trueman, Ford, Buchanan, Darke and Hough; Lieutenants Greaton, Davidson, De-Butts, Price, Morgan, McCrea, Lysle and Thomson; Ensign Bines; Adjutants Whisler and Crawford; and the Viscount Malartie, volunteer aid-de-camp to the commander-in-chief. Several pieces of artillery and all the baggage, ammunition and provisions were left on the field of battle and fell into the hands of the Indians. The stores and other public property lost in the action, were valued at thirty-two thousand eight hundred and ten dollars and seventy-five cents. The loss of the Miamis and their confederates has never been satisfactorily ascertained, but it did not, probably, exceed one hundred and fifty in killed and wounded.

With the army of St. Clair, following the fortunes of their husbands, there were more than one hundred women. Very few escaped the carnage of the 4th of November and after the flight of the remnant of the army, the Indians began to avenge their own real and imaginary wrongs by perpetrating the most horrible acts of cruelty and brutality upon the bodies of the living and the dead Americans who fell into their hands. Believing that the whites, for many years, made war merely to acquire land, the Indians crammed clay and sand into the eyes and down the throats of the dying and the dead. The field of action was visited by Brigadier-general James Wilkinson, at the head of a small detachment of mounted militia on the 1st of February, 1792, about three months after the battle. In a letter dated "Fort Washington, 13th February, 1792," written by Captain Robert Buntin, and addressed to Governor St. Clair, this expedition of Wilkinson is noticed as follows:—

"I went with General Wilkinson to the field of action to recover the artillery carriages, which he was informed remained there, and to bury the dead. His little army for this excursion was composed of about one hundred and fifty regulars and one hundred and thirty-one volunteer militia on horseback. He has a good talent for pleasing the people; there is no person in whom they have more confidence; none more capable to lead them on. It appears as if he made the Indian mode of warfare his study since he first came to this country. I think him highly worthy your friendship, from his attachment to your person and interest.

"The regulars left Fort Washington as an escort to provisions for Fort Jefferson on the 24th ultimo—the snow about ten inches deep—and we marched next morning with the volunteers. The sledges which transported the forage delayed us so much that we did not get to Fort Jefferson until the 30th, about twelve o'clock. The general was much longer in getting to this place than he expected and in order to expedite the business and avoid expense, he ordered the regulars to return to Fort Washington. This morning (30th), the wind from the southward, with a constant fall of snow, rain and hail, and a frost the following night made the breaking of the road very difficult. Though the front was changed every fifteen or twenty minutes, the road was marked with the horses' blood from the hardness of the crust on the snow. We left Fort Jefferson about nine o'clock on the 31st with the volunteers and arrived within eight miles of the field of battle that evening, and next day we arrived at the ground about ten o'clock. The scene was truly melancholy. In my opinion those unfortunate men who fell into the enemy's hands, with life, were used with the greatest torture, having their limbs torn off; and the women have been treated with the most indecent cruelty, having stakes as thick as a person's arm drove through their bodies. The first, I observed when burying the dead and the latter was discovered by Colonel Sargent and Doctor Brown. We found three whole carriages; the other five were so much damaged that they were rendered useless. By the general's orders pits were dug in different places and all the dead bodies that were exposed to view, or could be conveniently found (the snow being very deep) were buried. During this time there were sundry parties detached, some for our safety, and others in examining the course of the creek, and some distance in advance of the ground occupied by the militia, they found a large camp not less than three quarters of a mile long which was supposed to be that of the Indians the night before the action. We remained on the field that night and next morning fixed geared horses to the carriages and moved for Fort Jefferson. * * * As there is little reason to believe that the enemy have carried off the cannon, it is the received opinion that they are either buried or thrown into the creek, and I think the latter the most probable; but, as it was frozen over with a thick ice, and that covered with a deep snow, it was impossible to make a search with any prospect of success. In a former part of this letter I have mentioned the camp occupied by the enemy the night before the action. Had Colonel Oldham been able to have complied with your orders on that evening, things at this day might have worn a different aspect."—(Dillon's History of Indiana.)

As we have said, the influence of this defeat was far-reaching. The news of it soon spread to Pennsylvania and Virginia and the tide of emigration which had been flowing into the middle states was stopped for a long time. "The principal causes of failure of the expedition were: Mismanagement of the quartermaster's department, the unfavorable season at which the army marched to attack the Indians and the want of discipline in the troops. The failure of the expedition can not justly be imputed to the conduct of the commander-in-chief, at any time before or during the battle."

"St. Clair resigned and Major-general Anthony Wayne was appointed in his stead. It was a fortunate thing, indeed, for the settlers of this country, that a man of the temperament and ability and training of Anthony Wayne was appointed to this responsible place. Wayne had had great training in the Revolutionary war, was a natural soldier, had a keen knowledge of Indian warfare and was an Indian hater. His indomitable courage, his keen scrutiny of human nature, in fact to the possibilities before him, made him an especially good man for this place. Although he hoped to settle these Indian problems in a peaceable way, he, soldier that he was, immediately began to recruit and organize his army. He sent out spies among the Indians to learn their every movement. Agents were also sent to them to insure them of his friendly mission, provided they would be loyal to the United States. These agents were to insure the Indians in the strongest and most explicit terms, that the United States renounced all claim to Indian land which had not been ceded by fair treaties made by the Indian nation. These instructions came from the secretary of war to General Rufus Putnam, on the 22nd of May, 1792. These agents were furnished copies of former treaties with the Indians, so that the Indian might be fully informed as to what the exact conditions were. There had been the following treaties: One of Fort Stanwix, made on the 22d of October, 1784. One of Fort McIntosh, made on the 21st of January, 1785. One made at the mouth of the Great Miami river on the 31st of January, 1876. One at Fort Harmar on the 9th of January, 1789. To show the Indian, in his sincerity, Wayne was instructed, in April, 1792, to issue a proclamation informing the people of the frontiers of the proposed attempts to conclude a treaty of peace and prohibiting all offensive movements of the whites to the northward of the Ohio, until they should receive further information on the subject.—(Dillon's History of Indiana.)

It was a difficult matter for Wayne to convince the Indians of his sincerity. For example, two messengers were sent from Fort Washington with a speech to the Indians on the Maumee. Dillon says that these messengers were captured by a party of Indians, who on being informed that their captives were messengers of peace, spared their lives and conducted them toward the rapids of the Maumee. But, while moving on to the route of that place, Freeman and Gerrard, the messengers, asked so many questions concerning the number of different tribes, the course of streams, etc., that their conductors took them to be spies and killed them when they were within one day's march of the main body of the Indian councils. But who can blame the poor, benighted Indian, after he had been treated in the manner in which he had by both the French and British, for years and years before. No wonder that he lacked confidence in the United States, for both the British and French had taught him that the people of the United States were traitors, not only to France and Great Britain, but to the Indians themselves, and was merely using every means to gain the land from them and force them west of the Mississippi river. And history seems to bear out the truth of such an opinion. In order to find out more about the Indians, Wilkinson, the Brigadier-general, advised that William May desert the American army and act as a spy among the Indians.

May did what he was ordered, with the promise that should he execute his mission with integrity and effect, he was to be given some little establishment to make his old age comfortable. May deserted according to orders and continued to reside among the Indians until the latter part of September, 1792, when he left them and arrived at Pittsburg and made his report to Major-general Wayne. On the 18th of August, 1794, almost two years afterward, May was captured by the Indians near the rapids of the Maumee and on the next day he was tied to a tree and shot. President Washington had a personal interest in this matter and about the 20th of May, 1792, sent Major Alexander Trueman and Colonel John Hardin of Kentucky, with copies of a speech to the hostile Indians. Major Trueman was engaged in this service of his own free will and desire and he was joined by Colonel Hardin, who undertook to discharge the duties of a peace-messenger, at the request of Brigadier-general Wilkinson. The speech with which these officers were charged was addressed "To all the Sachems and Warriors of the tribes inhabiting the Miami river of lake Erie and the waters of the Wabash river, the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Potawatamies, and all other tribes residing to the southward of the lakes, east of the Mississippi, and to the northward of the river Ohio," and it contained the passages which follow:

"BROTHERS—The President of the United States, General Washington, the great chief of the nation, speaks to you by this address. Summon, therefore, your utmost powers of attention and hear the important things which shall be spoken to you concerning your future welfare; and after having heard and well understood all things, invoke the Great Spirit above to give you due deliberation and wisdom, to decide upon a line of conduct that shall best promote your happiness and the happiness of your children and perpetuate you and them on the land of your forefathers. Brothers, the President of the United States entertains the opinion that the war which exists is founded in error and mistake on your parts; that you believe the United States wants to deprive you of your lands and drive you out of the country. Be assured this is not so. On the contrary, that we should be greatly gratified with the opportunity of imparting to you all the blessings of civilized life, of teaching you to cultivate the earth and raise corn; to raise oxen, sheep and other domestic animals; to build comfortable houses and to educated your children, so as ever to dwell upon the land. * * * War, at all times, is a dreadful evil to those who are engaged to act against so great numbers as the people of the United States.

Brothers: Do not suffer the advantages you have gained to mislead your judgment and influence you to continue the war, but reflect upon the destructive consequences which must attend such a measure. The President of the United States is highly desirous of seeing a number of your principal chiefs and convincing you, in person, how much he wishes to avoid the evils of war for your sake, and the sake of humanity. Consult therefore, upon the great object of peace; call in your parties and enjoin a cessation of all further depredations and as many of the principal chiefs as shall choose, repair to Philadelphia, the seat of the general government, and there make a peace, founded on the principles of justice and humanity. Remember, that no additional lands will be required of you, or any other tribe, to those that have been ceded by former treaties, particularly by the tribes who had a right to make the treaty of Muskingum (Fort Harmar), in the year 1789. But, if any of you can prove that you have a fair right to any lands comprehended by the said treaty, and have not been compensated therefor, you shall receive a full satisfaction upon that head. The chiefs you send shall be safely escorted to this city; and shall be well fed and provided with all things for their journey. * * * Come, then, and be convinced for yourselves, of the beneficence of General Washington, the great chief of the United States, and afterward return and spread the glad tidings of peace and prosperity of the Indians to the setting sun."—(Dillon's History of Indiana.)

The lack of confidence which the Indians had in peace, or in a document sent to them by Washington, and the treachery which they exercised toward his agent, is shown in the story of William May, whom we will remember had deserted and joined the Indians, as he told it to General Wayne on the 11th of October, 1792. The story is as follows: "That, in the latter end of June (1792), some Indians came on board the vessel for provisions; among whom was one who had two scalps upon a stick; one of them he knew to be William Lynch's (Major Trueman's waiter), with whom he (May) was well acquainted; he had light hair. That he mentioned at once whose scalp it was. The other they said was Major Trueman's; it was darker than Lynch's. The manner in which Trueman was killed, was mentioned by the Indian who killed him, to an Indian who used to go in the vessel with May, in his presence, and immediately interpreted, viz: This Indian and an Indian boy having met with Trueman, his waiter Lynch, and the interpreter, William Smalley; that Trueman gave the Indian a belt; that after being together three or four hours the Indians were going to leave them. Trueman inquired the reason from the interpreter, who answered that the Indians were alarmed, lest there being three to two, they might injure them in the night. Upon which Trueman told them they might tie both his servant and himself. That his boy Lynch was first tied and then Trueman. The moment Trueman was tied, the Indian tomahawked and scalped him, and then the boy. That the papers in possession of Trueman were given to Mr. McKee, who sent them by a Frenchman called Captain Le Motte, to Detroit, on board the schooner of which he, May, had the charge. That, upon his return from Detroit to the rapids (of the Maumee) he saw a scalp, said to be Hardin's; that he also saw a flag by the route of Sandusky; and that the hair was dark brown; but don't know by what nation he was killed; these papers were also sent to Detroit, on board the schooner, by Mr. Elliott. That a Captain Brumley, of the fifth British regiment, was in the action (of the 4th of November, 1791), but did not learn that he took any command; that Lieutenant Sylvey, of the same regiment, was on his march with three hundred Indians, but did not get up in time to participate in the action; that Simon Girty told him there were twelve hundred Indians at the place, but three hundred of them did not engage, who were taking care of the horses, exclusive of the three hundred with Lieutenant Sylvey; in all,fifteen hundred. * * * That it was the common opinion, and the common conversation, that no peace would take place unless the Ohio river be established as the boundary line between the Indians and the Americans."—(Dillon's History of Indiana.)

It seems that almost every act on the part of the white man, in the wilderness or in Congress at this time, was such as to make the Indians lose confidence in their sincerity. Some of the Indians really wanted peace at most any price, excepting that of losing their homes. This was true of the great Wabash and Illinois tribes, and on the 27th of September, 1792, Brigadier-General Rufus Putnam succeeded in forming a treaty with thirty-one Indians of these tribes. Nothing in this treaty was unreasonable, and Putnam congratulated himself upon the success. You can imagine the consternation of these Indians when the Senate of the United States, on the 13th of February, 1793, deemed one of the articles particularly objectionable, and after several consultations, finally refused to ratify the treaty by a vote of 21 to 4. The article which was so objectionable was:

"The United States solemnly guaranty to the Wabash and Illinois nations or tribes of Indians, all the lands to which they have a just claim; and no part shall ever be taken from them but by a fair purchase, and to their satisfaction. That the lands originally belonged to the Indians; it is theirs, and theirs only. That they have a right to sell and a right to refuse to sell. And that the United States will protect them in their said just rights."—(Dillon's History of Indiana.)

Is it any wonder that the Indians would doubt the sincerity of the people of the United States, when such an article as this, simple and truthful though it may be, should be turned down by the Senate of that great government. Yet, in spite of such treatment of the Indians, the United States continued in their attempt to make treaties with them. One of the strongest nations was the Potawatamie. This nation was invited to send a delegation to Washington, to consider the subject of treaty. And it is no wonder that the chief of the Potawatamie said in a speech: "We are very glad to hear from you; but sorry we cannot comply with your request (to send a deputation of chiefs to Fort Washington). The situation of affairs in this country prevents us. We are, every day, threatened by the other Indians, that if we do not take a part with them against the Americans, they will destroy our villages. This,alone, my father, makes it necessary for all the chiefs to remain at home. * * * My father: You tell us you art ignorant why the red people make war on your white people. We are as ignorant of it as you are; for, ever since the beginning of the war, we have lain still in our villages, although we have been repeatedly invited to go to war; but, my father, the confidence we have in you has prevented us from making war against you, and we hold you by the hand with a stronger grip than ever. My father, keep up your spirits more than ever; for you have this year more red people to fight than you have had yet. * * * If I could give you a hand I would do it; but I can not; and I am glad if me and my people can have a quiet life this summer. If I had been disposed to believe all the reports I have heard, I would have made your messengers prisoners; for we are told they are spies, and that you have an army coming against us; but I am deaf to everything that comes from the Miamis. Every day we received messengers from those people, but we have been deaf to them, and will remain so."—(Dillon's History of Indiana.)

"All this time General Wayne was preparing for war, and on the 7th of October, 1793, General Wayne was at the head of two thousand six hundred regulars, and four hundred auxiliary, marched from Fort Washington. The regular fort at Greenville, and another on the field where St. Clair met his defeat. This he called Fort Recovery. Here he remained until the 30th of June, 1794, without meeting any resistance. On that day, however, about fifteen hundred Indians, with some British and Canadians, assailed a body of troops under the very walls of the fort, but were finally repulsed. Not long after this, sixteen hundred volunteers under the command of General Scott, joined Wayne. His preparation at every point caused consternation to reign among the Indians. They had so easily overcome Harmar and St. Clair that they had been led to believe that all the Americans could be as easily overcome. It did not take long, however, before they saw in General Wayne, an entirely different character. Little Turtle, who had the command at the defeat of St. Clair, was among the first to recognize Wayne's ability. All that plan to surprise him failed. Every effort they had made to defeat him had come to naught. They had found him cautious, and diligent on all occasions, and he seemed to be endowed with some great power which they did not understand. Little Turtle referred to him as an "who-never-sleeps," and this had a great effect among the Indians.

That Little Turtle recognized that he had finally met his master, is shown by his urging that a treaty of peace be made, in a council held on the 19th of August of this same year, in which he says: "We have beaten the enemy twice under different commanders. We can not expect the same good fortune to attend us always. The Americans are now led by a chief who never sleeps. The nights and the days are alike to him, and during all the time that he had been marching on our village, notwithstanding the watchfulness of our young men, we have never been able to surprise him. Think well of it. There is something whispers me it would be prudent to listen to his offers of peace."—(Dillon's History of Indiana.)

Indians were under the subtle influence of that greatest of all chiefs, Tecumseh, and influenced by the magic spell by his brother, the prophet, and refused to follow the advice of Little Turtle. Believing in the power of Tecumseh and the prophet to protect them against the bullet of the white men, and feeling that they were sure of success, they prepared for battle, and attacked General Wayne on the morning of the 20th of August. That Wayne's separation had been complete, that Little Turtle's characterization of him was exactly right, and that the Indians were completely crushed, is shown by Wayne's report of the battle, which we will here give:

GENERAL WAYNE, TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

"Headquarters, Fort Defiance, Grand Glaize, 28th August, 1794.

"Sir: It is with infinite pleasure that I now announce to you the brilliant success of the Federal army under my command, in a general action with the combined force of the hostile Indians, and a considerable number of the volunteers and militia of Detroit, on the 20th instant, on the banks of the Maumee, in the vicinity of the British post and garrison, at the foot of the rapids. The army advanced from this place (Fort Defiance) on the 15th, and arrived at Roche de Bout on the 18th. The 19th was employed in making a temporary post for the reception of our stores and baggage, and in reconnoitering the position of the enemy, who were encamped behind a thick, brushy wood, and the British fort.

At eight o'clock on the morning of the 20th, the army again advanced in columns, agreeably to the standing order of march; the legion on the right, its flank covered by the Maumee; one brigade of mounted volunteers on the left, under Brigadier-General Todd, and the other in the rear, under Brigadier-General Barbee. A select battalion of mounted volunteers moved in front of the legion, commanded by Major Price, who was directed to keep sufficiently advanced, so as to give timely notice for the troops to form in case of action, it being yet undetermined whether the Indians would decide for peace or war.

After advancing about five miles, Major Price's corps received so severe a fire from the enemy, who were secreted in the woods and high grass, as to compel them to retreat. The legion was immediately formed in two lines, principally in a close, thick wood, which extended for miles on our left, and for a very considerable distance in front, the ground being covered with old fallen timber, probably occasioned by a tornado, which rendered it impracticable for the cavalry to act with effect, and afforded the enemy the most favorable cover for their mode of warfare. The savages were formed in three lines, within supporting distance of each other, and extending for nearly two miles, at right angles with the river. I soon discovered, from the weight of the fire and extent of their lines, that the enemy were in full force in front, in possession of their favorite ground, and endeavoring to turn our left flank. I therefore gave orders for the second line to advance and support the first; and directed Major-General Scott to gain and turn the right flank of the savages, with the whole of the mounted volunteers, by a circuitous route; at the same time I ordered the front line to advance and charge with trailed arms, and rouse the Indians from their coverts at the point of the bayonet, and when up, to deliver a close and well directed fire on their backs, followed by a brisk charge, so as not to give them time to load again.

"I also ordered Captain M. Campbell, who commanded the legionary cavalry, to turn the left flank of the enemy next to the river, and which afforded a favorable field for that corps to act in. All these orders were obeyed with spirit and promptitude; but such was the impetuosity of the charge by the first line of infantry, that the Indians and Canadian militia and volunteers were drove from all their coverts in so short a time, that, although every possible exertion was used by the officers of the second line of the legion, and by Generals Scott, Todd and Barbee, of the mounted volunteers, to gain their proper positions, but part of each could get up in season to participate in the action; the enemy being drove, in the course of one hour, more than two miles through the thick woods already mentioned by less than one-half their number. From every account, the enemy amounted to two thousand combatants. The troops actually engaged against them were short of nine hundred. This horde of savages, with their allies, abandoned themselves to flight and dispersed with terror and dismay, leaving our victorious army in full and quiet possession of the field of battle, which terminated under the influence of the guns of the British garrison, as you will observe by the inclosed correspondence between Major Campbell, the commandant, and myself upon the occasion.

The bravery and conduct of every officer belonging to the army, from the generals down to the ensigns, merit my highest approbation. There were, however, some, whose rank and situation placed their conduct in a very conspicuous point of view and which I observed with pleasure and the most lively gratitude. Among whom, I must beg leave to mention Brigadier-general Wilkinson and Colonel Hamtramck, the commandants of the right and left wings of the legion, whose brave example inspired the troops. To those I must add the names of my faithful and gallant aids-de-camp, Captains DeButt and T. Lewis; and Lieutenant Harrison, who, with the adjutant-general, Major Mills, rendered the most essential service by communicating my orders in every direction and by their conduct and bravery exciting the troops to press victory. Lieutenant Covington, upon whom the command of the cavalry now devolved, cut down two savages with his own hand and Lieutenant Webb one, in turning the enemy's left flank. The wounds received by Captains Slough and Prior and Lieutenant Campbell Smith, an extra aid-de-camp to General Wilkinson, of the legionary infantry, and Captain Van Rensselaer of the dragoons, Captain Rawlins, Lieutenant McKenny and Ensign Duncan, of the mounted volunteers, bear honorable testimony of their bravery and conduct.

Captains H. Lewis and Brock, with their companies of light infantry, had to sustain an unequal fire for some time, which they supported with fortitude. In fact, every officer and soldier who had an opportunity to come into action displayed that true bravery which will always insure success. And here permit me to declare, that I never discovered more true spirit and anxiety for action than appeared to pervade the whole of the mounted volunteers and I am well persuaded that, had the enemy maintained their favorite ground for one-half hour longer, they would have most severely felt the prowess of that corps. But while I pay this tribute to the living I must not neglect the gallant dead, among whom we have to lament the early death of those worthy and brave officers, Captain M. Campbell of the dragoons and Lieutenant Towles of the light infantry, of the legion, who fell in the first charge.

Enclosed is a particular return of the killed and wounded. The loss of the enemy was more than double to that of the Federal army. The woods were strewed for a considerable distance with the dead bodies of Indians and their white auxiliaries—the latter armed with British muskets and bayonets.

We remained three days and nights on the banks of the Maumee in front of the field of battle, during which time all the houses and cornfields were consumed and destroyed for a considerable distance both above and below Fort Miami, as well as within pistol shot of the garrison, which was compelled to remain a tacit spectator to this general devastation and conflagration, among which were the houses, stores and property of Colonel McKee, the British Indian agent and principal stimulator of the war now existing between the United States and the savages.

The army returned to this place (Fort Defiance) on the 27th by easy marches, laying waste the villages and cornfields for about fifty miles on each side of the Maumee. There remains yet a great number of villages and a great quantity of corn to be consumed or destroyed upon Auglaize and the Maumee above this place, which will be effected in the course of a few days. In the interim we shall improve Fort Defiance and as soon as the escort returns with the necessary supplies from Greenville and Fort Recovery, the army will proceed to the Miami villages in order to accomplish the object of the campaign. It is, however, not improbable that the enemy may make one desperate effort against the army, as it is said that a reinforcement was hourly expected at Fort Miami from Niagara, as well as numerous tribes of Indians living on the margin and islands of the lakes. This is a business rather to be wished for than dreaded while the army remains in force. Their numbers will only tend to confuse the savages and victory will be the more complete and decisive and which may eventually insure a permanent and happy peace.

Under these impressions, I have the honor to be your most obedient and very humble servant,

ANTHONY WAYNE.

The Hon. Major-general H. Knox, Secretary of War.

The British still maintained a fort on the banks of the Maumee, and General Wayne after the battle of the 20th of August, encamped almost within reach of the guns of this fort. The British questioned the right of Wayne to camp there and several letters were exchanged between their commanding officers, Major Campbell and General Wayne. The first two of these letters will show the position of the British in this Indian war and also the resolution with which General Wayne accepted the conditions.

(NUMBER I.)

Miami (Maumee) River, August 21, 1794.

Sir: An army of the United States of America, said to be under your command, having taken post on the banks of the Miami (Maumee) for upwards of the last twenty-four hours, almost within the reach of the guns of this fort, being a post belonging to his majesty the king of Great Britain, occupied by his majesty's troops and which I have the honor to command, it becomes my duty to inform myself as speedily as possible, in what light I am to view your making such near approaches to this garrison. I have no hesitation on my part to say that I know of no war existing between Great Britain and America.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,

WILLIAM CAMPBELL,

Major 24th Regiment, commanding a British post on the banks of the Miami.

To Major-general Wayne, etc."

"Camp on the bank of the Miami (Maumee), August 21, 1794.

Sir: I have received your letter of this date requiring from me the motives which have moved the army under my command to the position they at present occupy, far within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the United States of America. Without questioning the authority or the propriety, sir, of your interrogatory, I think I may, without breach of decorum, observe to you, that, were you entitled to answer, the most full and satisfactory one was announced to you from the muzzles of my small arms yesterday morning in the action against the horde of savages in the vicinity of your post, which terminated gloriously to the American arms, but, had it continued until the Indians, etc., were driven under the influence of the post and guns you mention, they would not have much impeded the progress of the victorious army under my command, as no such post was established at the commencement of the present war between the Indians and the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,

ANTHONY WAYNE,

Major-general and Commander-in-chief of the Federal Army.

To Major William Campbell," etc.

The Indians had been completely crushed and their only hope lay in being able to receive support from the British. Wayne had asked them to meet him at Greenville to make terms of peace, but the British had succeeded in getting them to refuse to go to Greenville but persuaded Little Turtle, Blue Jacket, Buck-ong-a-he-las, and other distinguished chiefs to agree to hold a council at the mouth of the Detroit river. The British soldiers of this section were hoping that Great Britain and the United States would again engage in war, which seemed at that time quite a possibility. However, this was averted through the skill of John Jay, who, as an emissary to England, succeeded in perfecting a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and Great Britain. By this treaty, Great Britain agreed to withdraw on or before the first day of June, 1796, all troops and garrisons from all the posts and places within the boundary lines of the United States, by the treaty of peace of 1783. Further said, "There shall be a firm, inviolable and universal peace and a true and sincere friendship between his Britannic majesty, his heirs and successors and the United States of America, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns and people of every degree, without exception of persons or places." Preliminary articles of peace agreeing to a meeting of Wayne and the Indians at Greenville, on or about the 15th of June, 1795, were made during the winter of 1794 by the Wyandots, Ottawas, Chippewas, Potawatamies, Sacs, Miamis, Delawares and Shawnees. The Indians began to assemble at Greenville early in June and by the 16th, were ready to begin negotiations. The council lasted from the 16th of June to the 10th of August. Perhaps no meeting of Indians has ever brought forth such flights of oratory as did the arguments upon this occasion. That the Indians were mindful of their rights, understood that they had been wronged and imposed upon by the French, the British and the Americans, is evident from the argument that they used there. Little Turtle denied that his tribe had ever sold their right. Masass, a Chippewa chief, speaking on the behalf of the Ottawas, Chippewas and Potawatamies, said during the course of discussion, "I always thought that we, the Ottawas, Chippewas and Potawatamies, were the true owners of those lands, but now I find that new masters have undertaken to dispose of them, so that, at this day, we do not know to whom they of right belong. We never received any compensation from them. I don't know how it is, but ever since that treaty, we have become objects of pity and our fires have been retiring from this country." There seemed to have been a general misunderstanding. Little Turtle, the Miami chief, in addressing General Wayne, said: "I was, yesterday, surprised when I heard from our grandfathers, the Delawares, that these lands had been ceded by the British to the Americans when the former were beaten by and made peace with the latter, because you had before told us that it was the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Potawatamies and Sauck-

"General Wayne: I hope you will pay attention to what I now say to you. I wish to inform you where your younger brothers, the Miamis, live, and, also, the Potawatamies of St. Joseph's, together with the Wabash Indians. You have pointed out to us the boundary line between the Indians and the United States, but now I take the liberty to inform you that that line cuts off from the Indians a large portion of country which has been enjoyed by my forefathers, time immemorial, without molestation or dispute. The print of my ancestors' houses are everywhere to be seen in this portion. I was a little astonished at hearing you, and my brothers who are now present, telling each other what business you had transacted together heretofore at Muskingum, concerning this country. It is well known by all my brothers present that my forefather kindled the first fire at Detroit; from thence he extended his lines to the headwaters of Scioto; from thence to its mouth; from thence, down the Ohio, to the mouth of the Wabash; and from thence to Chicago, on lake Michigan; at this place I first saw my elder brothers, the Shawnees. I have now informed you of the boundaries of the Miami nation, where the Great Spirit placed my forefather a long time ago, and charged him not to sell or part with his lands, but to preserve them for his posterity. This charge has been handed down to me. I was much surprised to find that my other brothers differed so much from me on this subject; for their conduct would lead one to suppose that the Great Spirit, and their forefathers had not given them the same charge that was given to me, but, on the contrary, had directed them to sell their lands to any white man who wore a hat, as soon as he should ask it of them. Now, elder brother, your younger brothers, the Miamis, have pointed out to you their country, and also to our brothers present. When I hear your remarks and proposals on this subject I will be ready to give you an answer. I came with an expectation of hearing you say good things, but I have not yet heard what I expected."

Tarke, or Crane, the chief of the Wyandots, then arose and made a speech, from which the following passages are copied: "Elder Brother (General Wayne): Now listen to us! The Great Spirit above has appointed this day for us to meet together. I shall now deliver my sentiments to you the fifteen fires. I view you lying in a gore of blood. It is me, an Indian, who has caused it. Our tomahawk yet remains in your head. The English gave it to me to place there. Elder Brother, I now take the tomahawk out of your head; but, with so much care that you shall not feel pain or injury. I will now tear a big tree up by the roots and throw the hatchet into the cavity which they occupied, where the waters will wash it away where it can never be found. Now I have buried the hatchet, and I expect that none of my color will ever again find it out. I now tell you that no one in particular can justly claim this ground; it belongs, in common, to us all; no earthly being has an exclusive right to it. The Great Spirit above is the true and only owner of this soil, and he has given us all an equal right to it. Brother, you have proposed to us to build our good work on the treaty of Muskingum; that treaty I have always considered as formed upon the fairest principles. You took pity on us Indians. You did not do as our fathers, the British, agreed you should. You might, by that agreement, have taken all our lands; but you pitied us, and let us hold part. I always looked upon that treaty to be binding upon the United States and us Indians."

The Indians were keen, but Wayne was keener; they were sagacious, but Wayne more than they; they were cunning, but Wayne seemed to divine every purpose and heated with a direct thrust; they were convincing, but Wayne showed them the fallacy of their position; they were determined, but Wayne met them with a greater determination. It was a clash between the best men of both nations, and the white man, as usual, won. Wayne succeeded in convincing them that he was sincere in what he was trying to do, and that the great father at Washington expected to use them and treat them as his children. He gave them the exact conditions of the treaty, read the provisions to them time and time again, and explained each and every provision. There could be no doubt as to the conditions of this treaty. That he was sincere and knew exactly how to impress his sincerity upon the Indians is shown by the following speech which was made in one of these meetings:

"Brothers: All nations present, now listen to me! Having now explained these matters to you and informed you of all things I judged necessary for your information, we have nothing to do but to bury the hatchet and draw a veil over past misfortunes. As you have buried our dead with the concern of brothers, so I now collect the bones of your slain warriors, put them ino a deep pit which I have dug and cover them carefully over with this large belt, there to remain undisturbed. I also dry the tears from your eyes, and wipe the blood from your bodies with this soft, white linen. No bloody traces will ever lead to the graves of your departed heroes—with this

I wipe all such entirely away. I deliver it to your uncle, the Wyandot, who will send it round among you. (A large belt with a white string attached.) I now take the hatchet out of your heads, and with a strong arm throw it into the center of the great ocean, where no mortal can ever find it; and I now deliver to you the wide and straight path to the fifteen fires, to be used by you and your posterity forever. So long as you continue to follow this road, so long will you continue to be a happy people. You see it is straight and wide, and they will be blind indeed who deviate from it. I place it also in your uncle's hands, that he may preserve it for you. (A large road belt.) I will, the day after tomorrow, show you the cessions you have made to the United States, and point out to you the lines which may, for the future, divide your lands from theirs; and, as you will have tomorrow to rest, I will order you a double allowance of drink—because we have now buried the hatchet and performed every necessary ceremony to render propitious our renovated friendship."

Thus the battle of argument came and went for several days, until all the articles of the treaty had been read and explained the second time. Wayne put squarely at the representatives of each tribe, and each in return answered that they were satisfied with the treaty, which was signed on the 3d of August, 1795, by the sachems, chiefs and principal men of the Indian nations who inhabited the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio. A copy of the treaty was delivered to each nation, and on the 10th of August, in council, General Wayne, at the close of a short speech, said: "I now fervently pray to the Great Spirit that the peace now established may be permanent and that it may hold us together in the bonds of friendship until time shall be no more. I also pray that the Great Spirit above may enlighten your minds and open your eyes to your true happiness, that your children may learn to cultivate the earth and enjoy the fruits of peace and industry. As it is probable, my children, that we shall not soon meet again in public council, I take this opportunity of bidding you all an affectionate farewell, and of wishing you a safe and happy return to your respective homes and families."

The past had been a Herculean one, but Wayne had proved himself equal to the occasion and the treaty was concluded in a manner satisfactory to the government and to the Indian tribes as well.

The Ordinance of 1787 provided for what is termed the second government. That is when the territory should contain five thousand free inhabitants of full age, they should elect a legislature of their own. The people elected the members of the House or Assembly, and this House or Assembly, when organized, could send to the President of the United States the names of ten persons. From this list the President should select five, who should act as a council or upper body of the Legislature. On the 29th day of October, 1798, Governor St. Clair issued a proclamation, calling for the election of representatives to this General Assembly. The election to take place on the third Monday of December and was to convene on the following 22d day of January, or January, 1799. The capital at this time was at Cincinnati. Governor St. Clair was extremely anxious that the new territorial government should be started about upon a broad, sane, moral basis, and to that effect he addressed the Assembly or Legislature as follows: The providing for ,and the regulating the lives and morals of the present and of the rising generation, for the repression of vice and immorality, and for the protection of virtue and innocence, for the security of property and the punishment of crime is a sublime employment. Every aid in my power will be afforded, and I hope we shall bear in mind that the character and deportment of the people and their happiness, both here and hereafter, depend very much upon the spirit and genius of their laws." The territorial government had scarcely been started when, on the 7th of May, 1800, the President of the United States, approved an act of Congress, which entitled, "that from and after the fourth day of July next, all that part of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio river, which lies to the westward of a line beginning at the Ohio opposite to the mouth of Kentucky river and running thence to Fort Recovery and thence north until it shall intersect the territorial line between the United States and Canada, shall, for the purpose of temporary government, constitute a separate territory, and be called the Indiana Territory." An act to divide the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio into two separate governments. This act put them back into the first form of territorial government again, and the William Henry Harrison, who had been elected as a delegate to Congress under the old territorial government, was appointed governor and government was established at Vincennes, where Governor Harrison assumed his duties as governor in January, 1801. He immediately called a meeting of the territorial judges, who met promptly and enacted several laws. In 1804 Congress attached all the land which was situated west of the Mississippi river and north of the 33d degree north latitude, to the territory of Indiana, under the name of "District of Louisiana," but in 1805 it was organized as a separate territory. The population of the new Indiana Territory having increased sufficiently, Governor Harrison issued a proclamation, calling for an election of members of the Assembly to take place January 3, 1805. The Assembly met at Vincennes on the first of February, and selected ten names for the President to choose a council from, just as they had done in former territorial government. A few days after this January election, however, Congress again divided territory, cutting off what is known as the "Territory of Michigan."

This was the last change made in the territorial boundaries until 1809, when the state received its present boundaries. In that year, February 3d, Congress passed a bill organizing the Illinois territory. This bill provided that on and after the first day of March, 1809, all that part of the territory lying west of the Wabash river, and running due north from Vincennes, should constitute the territory of Illinois. This left matters in a very muddled condition, and many doubted whether the Legislature was really a legally organized body or not. General Harrison, himself, was in doubt, and as soon as the election was over and the Legislature chosen, it was dissolved by him. Another election was called for in May, and he fixed the number of members of the House to be elected as eight, one less than the minimum number prescribed by the act of Congress. He also called for the election of a Congressional delegate at the same time. It has been thought by some that his purpose in doing this was to get the real voice of the people on the question of slavery. Doubts again arose as to the legality of this election. But the governor held that it was legal, and did not change his opinion until they held the election illegal. The governor apportioned the territory and ordered a new election.

In the meantime thousands of emigrants were pouring into the state, and the feeling became prevalent that the territorial government was inadequate to their needs, and that statehood was desired. Pursuant to this, the territorial Legislature adopted a memorial on the 14th of December, 1816, asking Congress to admit Indiana into the Union as a state, upon equal footing with the original state. This memorial met with favor on the part of Congress, and it passed an enabling act authorizing an election to be held on the first Monday of May, 1816, for the election of delegates to the convention, to frame the state's constitution. The delegates were duly elected and the convention began its session at Corydon on June 10th, 1816, and remained in session nineteen days. The act of Congress that enabled the people of Indiana Territory to form a Constitution and State Government contained certain conditions and propositions in respect to boundaries, jurisdiction, school lands, salt springs, land for seat of government, etc. All of these conditions and propositions were ratified and accepted by an ordinance which was passed by the Territorial convention at Corydon on the last day of its session, June 29, 1816. The conditions as to boundaries were: that the new state should be "bounded on the east by the meridian line which forms the western boundary of the state of Ohio, being a north line from the mouth of the Miami; on the south by the Ohio river, from the mouth of the Great Miami to the mouth of the river Wabash; on the west by a line drawn along the middle of the Wabash from its mouth to a point where a due north line drawn from the town of Vincennes would last touch the northwestern shore of said river, and from thence, by a due north line until the same shall intersect an east and west line drawn through a point ten miles north of the southern extreme of Lake Michigan; on the north by the said east and west line until the same shall intersect the first mentioned meridian line which forms the western boundary of the state of Ohio." Controversies have arisen at different times concerning the eastern and northern boundaries of the state, but the one that interests us is the line between Indiana and Ohio as that affects the eastern boundary of Randolph county. This confusion arises because of the difference between the line as described in the act of April 19, 1816, or the one enabling us to be admitted as a state, and that of May 7, 1800, when the territory northwest of the Ohio river was divided into two districts. By that act, Congress declared, "That from and after the fourth day of July next all that part of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio river, which lies to the westward of a line beginning at the Ohio opposite to the mouth of Kentucky river, and running thence to Fort Recovery, and thence north until it shall intersect the territorial line between the United States and Canada, shall, for the purpose of temporary government, constitute a separate territory, and be called the Indiana Territory." It will be noticed in the above that this division of territory was, "for the purpose of temporary government," and not for a government permanent as the state would be. The mouth of the Kentucky river is several miles west of that of the Great Miami. The line provided for in the act of May 7, 1800, would not have been a due north and south line, but would have run east of north until it reached Fort Recovery on the headwaters of the Wabash, and from thence would run due north. Such a line as that proposed by this act would have given to Ohio quite a strip along the southeast side of Indiana, while it would have added to Indiana some of the territory now in Ohio north of Fort Recovery. This line enters Randolph county about four miles west of the Ohio line and passes out of the county almost in the corner of Jackson township. It is known on the map as the "Old Indian Boundary Line."

The convention that formed the first constitution of the state of Indiana was composed, mainly, of clear-minded, unpretending men of common sense, whose patriotism was unquestionable and whose morals were fair. Their familiarity with the theories of the Declaration of American Independence—their territorial experience under the provisions of the ordinance of 1787—and their knowledge of the principles of the Constitution of the United States, were sufficient, when combined, to lighten, materially, their labors in the great work of forming a constitution for a new state. With such landmarks in view, the labors of similar conventions in other states and territories have been rendered comparatively light.

In the clearness and consciousness of its style—in the comprehensive and just provisions which it made for the maintenance of civil and religious liberty—in its mandates, which were designed to protect the rights of the people, collectively and individually, and to provide for the public welfare—the constitution that was formed for Indiana in 1816 was not inferior to any of the state constitutions which were in existence at that time."

The voting for the members of the first General Assembly of the State of Indiana resulted in the election of ten members of the Senate and twenty-nine members of the House of Representatives. What is now a part of Randolph county was then a part of Wayne, and our senator was Patrick Baird. Our members of the House of Representatives were: Joseph Holman, Ephraim Overman and John Scott. Ephraim Overman afterwards removed to Randolph county and lived near Arba. It was his oldest son, Eli, who was one of the first commissioners of the county. Thus the territorial government of Indiana was superseded by a State Government on the 7th of November, 1816, and the State of Indiana was formally admitted into the Union by a joint resolution of Congress, approved on the 11th day of December in the same year. Upon its admission into the Union, Indiana had fifteen counties, namely: Knox, Gibson, Posey, Perry, Warrick, Wayne, Franklin, Washington, Orange, Jackson, Jefferson, Switzerland, Dearborn, Harrison and Clark. After the organization of Indiana as a state, the organization of counties was very rapid. During 1816-17 four counties were organized. During 1818 eight counties, Randolph being one of them. After 1818 the settlement of the state became much more rapid, as all of the great central and northern part of the state was opened to settlement during that year, having been purchased from the Indians October 6, 1818. From 1818 to 1822 seventeen counties were organized; 1823 to 1828, fourteen counties; 1830 to 1837, twenty-one counties; 1843 to 1871, thirteen counties; making in all the ninety-two counties of the state. The state early fixed a liberal policy for the organization of counties. After the Legislature had passed a bill, authorizing the organization of a new county, in which it would state definitely the boundary of said county, the governor would issue an order of election to some person in the new county, as sheriff, authorizing him to hold an election, in which there would be elected two associate judges of the circuit court, one clerk, one recorder, and three commissioners. Of course, one of the new needs of a county would be the county seat or seat of justice. On January 2, 1818, the Legislature passed an act fixing the seat of justices in all the new counties. The General Assembly would appoint five commissioners, who were non-residents, three of whom should be a quorum. These commissioners "shall proceed to fix in the most eligible and convenient place for the permanent seat of justice for each new county, taking into view the extent of the county, the quality of the land and the prospects of future as well as the weight of present population, together with the probability of future division; and it shall be the further duty of the said commissioners to receive donations in land from any person or persons owning land in the said county, and offering donations in land for the use of the same, and to fix on such place for the seat of justice, in said new county, as near as may be the center of that tract or district, which is likely to remain permanent after future divisions, as may best conserve to the interests of said county." The county commissioners should then appoint a county agent, whose duty it was to plot the ground so donated to the county, advertise for the sales of these plots, give deed to the purchasers, and in general act as business agent of the county. The money derived from the sales of these plots should be used, first, to pay the locating commissioners; second, to pay the purchase price if any land had been bought. This was not done, however, in Randolph county, as the land was all donated, of which we shall speak later. Third, to pay for public buildings, and fourth, if any funds then remained, they should be put in the general fund for the support of the county. But it will be seen that an exception to this law was made for a county library fund in Randolph county. Pursuant to and in harmony with these laws and upon a petition from people in the north end of Wayne county, the following act was approved January 10, 1818.

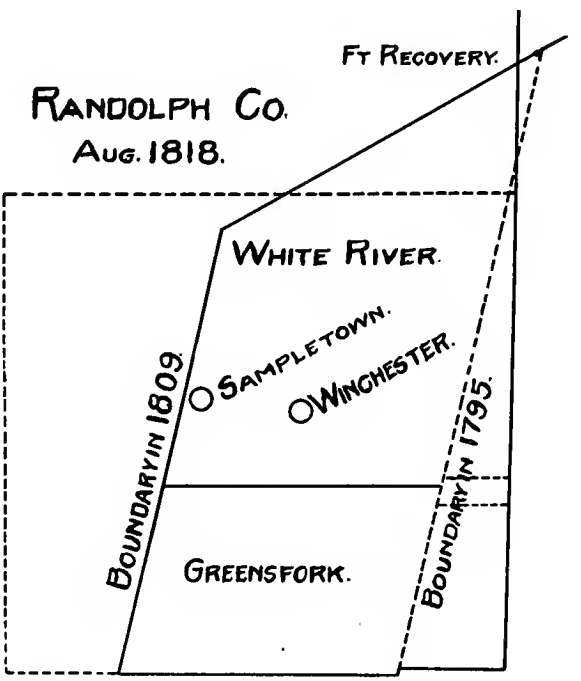
RANDOLPH COUNTY ORGANIZED.

An Act for the formation of a new county off the north end of Wayne.

Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That from and after the tenth day of August next, all that part of the county of Wayne, which is enclosed in the following bounds, shall form and constitute a new county (that is to say), Beginning at the state of Ohio line, where the line that divides the fifteenth and sixteenth townships strikes said Ohio line; thence west with said township line until it strikes the old boundary; thence westward with the center line of the 18th township in the new purchase until it strikes the Indian boundary; thence northward with said boundary line until it strikes the state of Ohio line; thence south with said line to the place of beginning.



Sec. 2. The said county shall, from and after the tenth day of August next, be known and designated by the name and style of the county of Randolph; and it shall enjoy all the rights, privileges and jurisdictions which to a separate county do or may properly belong.

Sec. 3. William Major, of Dearborn county; Williamson Dunn, of Jefferson county; Stephen C. Stevens, James Brownlee and John Bryson, of Franklin county, be, and they are hereby appointed commissioners to designate the place for the permanent seat of justice of Randolph county, agreeably to an act, entitled "An Act for fixing the seats of justice in all new counties hereafter to be laid off." The commissioners above named shall convene at the house of Ephraim Overman, on the first Monday in September next, and then proceed to discharge the duties assigned them by law; and it shall be the duty of the sheriff of the county of Wayne to notify the said commissioners, either in person or by written notification, of their said appointment, at least ten days previous to the time appointed for the meeting of the said commissioners. And the said sheriff shall be allowed a reasonable compensation for his services out of the first monies in the treasury of said county of Randolph, to be allowed and paid as other county claims are.

Sec. 4. The board of commissioners of said new county shall, within six mouths after the permanent seat of justice shall be established, proceed to erect the necessary buildings thereon.

Sec. 5. Until suitable accommodations can be had, in the opinion of the circuit court, at the seat of justice of said new county, all the courts of justice shall be holden at the house of William Way, or such place to which the court shall adjourn, in said county; after which time the circuit court and all courts necessary to be held at the county seat, shall be adjourned to the same.

Sec. 6. Whenever the seat of justice within the county of Randolph shall have been established, the person or persons authorized to dispose of and sell the lots at the seat of justice, shall reserve ten per centum on the net proceeds of the whole sale, for the use of a county library in said county; which sum or sums of money shall be paid over to such person or persons as may be authorized to receive the same, in such manner and in such installments as shall be authorized by law.

Sec. 7. All that part of Randolph county which was formerly the county of Wayne shall constitute to form a part of the Wayne district for the purpose of electing senators and representatives to the General Assembly, until otherwise authorized by law.

This act to take effect and be in force from and after the tenth day of August next.

In accordance with the laws then in force, Governor Jennings appointed David Wright, sheriff, to organize the county. He did so, by making two precincts, Greensfork and White river, the chief settlements being on these two streams. An election was held in August, 1818 (the exact day not being known), to choose associate judges, sheriff, clerk, recorder and three county commissioners, which officers were chosen as follows: William Edwards and John Wright, associate judges; David Wright, sheriff; Charles Conway, clerk and recorder; Eli Overman, Benjamin Cox and John James, commissioners. Mr. Tucker, in his history, speaks of a coroner having been elected, and that Solomon Wright was elected to this office, but we have failed to find any such mention made in the records. To control the organizations of counties and townships and the election of officers in same, the legislature has passed the following act:

An Act to provide for the election of county and township officers.

Sec. 3. The county commissioners of each county, at their first meeting after being elected, shall lay off their counties respectively into a suitable number of townships, describing the bounds thereof, which they shall cause to be fairly recorded, and shall, from time to time thereafter, make such alterations and additional townships as they may think proper: Provided, however, no new township shall be laid off without an application from at least thirty citizens residing within the bounds of such intended new township by petition; said petitioners or some one of them having published such intention of applying for a new township, by setting up a written notice thereof in three of the most public places within such bounds, thirty days before such application is to be made: Provided, that the board of county commissioners of the several counties in this state shall not lay off more than eight townships in their respective counties; and provided, also, that not more than twenty justices of the peace shall be elected or commissioned for any one county.

Sec. 4. After the board of commissioners shall have laid off their counties, respectively, into a suitable number of townships as above directed, they shall order an election in each, on such day as they may direct, for such number of justices of the peace, not exceeding three, as shall be assigned by them to each township; which election shall be held and conducted in all respects according to the laws of this state regulating elections, and the person having the highest number of votes (to the number to be elected in such township) shall be elected; the returns of which election shall be made to the clerk's office of the circuit court, in the same manner that returns of the general elections are made.

COUNTY ORGANIZED.

Pursuant to this act, the three commissioners, Eli Overman, Benjamin Cox and John James, met in early August, presumably the 10th, in the cabin of Benjamin Cox, and organized Randolph County into townships. The cabin of Mr. Cox stood near the river east of what is known as the White River Church, on the southeast quarter of Section 15, Township 20, Range 14. This land had been entered by Mr. Cox, September 11, 1817.

What a wonderful and interesting thing that was surrounded by an unbroken wilderness, and with nothing for precedence or guidance they were entrusted with the organization of what was to become one of the greatest counties of their commonwealth. They were men, however, of unusual ability, excellence of character, sincerity of purpose, and actuated by lofty ideals of citizenship.

Mr. Cox was born in North Carolina, in the year 1785 and moved to Ohio in 1806, and to White River, east of Winchester, the fall of 1816. He married Ann Rhodes and had eight children, all of whom were married and had families. He entered land on White River, and lived there until he died in about 1852, sixty-seven years of age. He was a minister among Friends and his work was acceptable and useful. While upon a religious mission, in North Carolina, his wife died in her sixty-third year. Mr. Cox was not only a minister, but taught school, having taught school in the settlement, probably about 1820. Mr. Cox was especially fitted for the work of organization and was the only one of the three commissioners who was buried in the county which he had helped to organize.

Eli Overman, the second commissioner, was also a member of the Friends church. We have heard of his having been a minister in the church, but he was a teacher and taught the first school in the settlement near Arba, having taught there in 1820, probably the same time that Cox was teaching near White River. Mr. Overman afterward moved to Grant County and died there. Mr. James also lived near Arba, having settled there about 1816 to 1818, having bought the land that was entered by John Thomas. Mr. James was a Baptist minister, and, like Mr. Overman, removed to Grant County, where he died.

It will be seen that Randolph county was the most northern county organized in the state, and that the territory had been obtained from three sources. The land beginning at the old Indiana boundary line of 1795 was obtained from the Indians in the treaty of Greenville, 1795. The remainder of the county was the northern part of what is sometimes called the Twelve Mile Purchase or the Cession of 1809. This strip of land is twelve miles wide and its western boundary is parallel to the treaty line of 1795, and was obtained by a treaty of September 30, 1809, at Fort Wayne with the Miami, Delaware and Potawatamie tribes.

The western boundary of Randolph county at this time is known in the record of the New Indian Boundary Line, although recent map makers of the county have persisted in the error of calling it the "Old Indian Boundary Line." The Old Indian Boundary line is the line of 1795, and it starts in Greensfork township and crosses the county to the corner of Jackson. The remainder of the land in Randolph county at this time (1914) was obtained from the Miami Indians, October 16, 1818, and is usually known as the New Purchase.

As we have said before, Randolph county was organized in early August, 1818, in the cabin of Benjamin Cox, with Eli Overman, Benjamin Cox, John James, as commissioners, and Charles Conway as clerk. Upon that memorable day they proceeded to organize the county as directed by law, and the first article written is an account of their meeting.

. . . . It shall be our endeavor to give all these records of organization and to quote exactly the records as found in the minutes of the meetings of the commissioners. These records are well preserved, and with the exception of those from 1820 to November, 1826, are all to be found in the court house at Winchester.

Mr. Conway, the clerk, held that office for a number of years, and all these records were made by him, and they certainly show the ability of this man to act in this capacity.

The first item placed in these records is as follows: "Beginning on the new boundary line one mile South of the Tweenteeth Township and in the nineteenth township, thence East With Said Section line to the old Boundry line, then South to Where the section line Between Section twenty-two and Section twenty-seven Intersect the same, thence East with said line to the State line between the State of Indiana and the State of Ohio, all that part of Randolph County south of the above Discribed line to be Known by the name of Greensfork Township and all that part of said County North of said line to be Known by the name of Whiteriver Township.

Ordered that an Election be held at the house of William Wright in Whiteriver Township on the Twenty-ninth day of August, 1818, to Elect two Justices of the Peace and two Constables in said Township for the time Limited by Law and appointed John Wright Inspector of Elections in said Township for one year." There was evidently a mistake in these records because if they ran to the old boundary line and then south, they could not have gone between sections 22 and 27, for this was north of the east and west line. In the map of Randolph county of August, 1818, two dotted lines will be seen on the upper right hand part of Greensfork township. The upper line indicates the line betwen sections 22 and 27, the lower line indicates where it would be had they gone south. We think the latter is the right one, as will be shown in the organization of Jackson township later on. It is no wonder, however, that they should make such a slight error, because the surveys were not very well known at that time.

Section three of the act for the formation of Randolph county provided that William Major, of Dearborn county; Williamson Dunn, of Jefferson county; Stephen C. Stevens, James Brownlee and John Bryson, of Franklin county, be, and they are hereby appointed commissioners to designate a place for the county seat of justice of Randolph county. They were to convene at the house of Ephraim Overman, on the first Monday in September, and then to proceed to describe the duties assigned them by law. It is scarcely probable that all these men met at that time; in fact, the only record indicates that only two of them were present, for in the November term of 1818 we find that it was "Ordered that the treasurer pay unto Daniel Petty for accounts Produced from Williamson Dunn and John Bryson two of the State Commissioners for Establishing the seat of Justice in Randolph County By the said Petty the sum of Ninetyseven Dollars." Just who Mr. Petty was, and why he should have the account is not known.

It is said that the commissioners were in doubt as to the best place to put the seat of justice. One of them favored putting it at Sampleton, located in section 22. The others favored Winchester. Mr. Sample and other residents of that community would not donate any land, however, for the use of the county and this became the deciding factor, for by establishing the county seat at Winchester, these commissioners received and procured for the county donations of land as follows: Charles Conway, 60 acres; John Wright, 50 acres; David Wright, 10 acres; David Stout, 18 acres; Daniel Petty, 20 acres. One hundred and fifty-eight acres in all is certainly a splendid donation to the county. This land is all located in sections 20 and 21, township 20 north, range 14, in and around the town of Winchester. These commissioners decided, as they had a right to do, to locate the seat of justice upon this land. It is said that when they decided to put the court yard where it is, that Eli Overman, who was a school teacher, and for that reason was acquainted with the ceremonies that Columbus went through taking San Salvador, and the demonstrations that Balboa made in taking the Pacific for the King and Queen of Spain, took the Jacob staff and stuck it in the ground with a solemn declaration, "Here shall be the northeast corner of the public square." Whether Mr. Overman was in jest or in earnest, of course, is not known, but it does show the importance which he placed to the act that had been done that day. Paul Way was appointed county agent, at what time is not known, but it was before the May term in 1819, however, as Mr. Way made a report at that session. Mr. Way was a surveyor and laid off the gifts of land in town lots, of which more will be said later on. The commissioners proceeded at once to arrange for public buildings, but these will be discussed at another time.

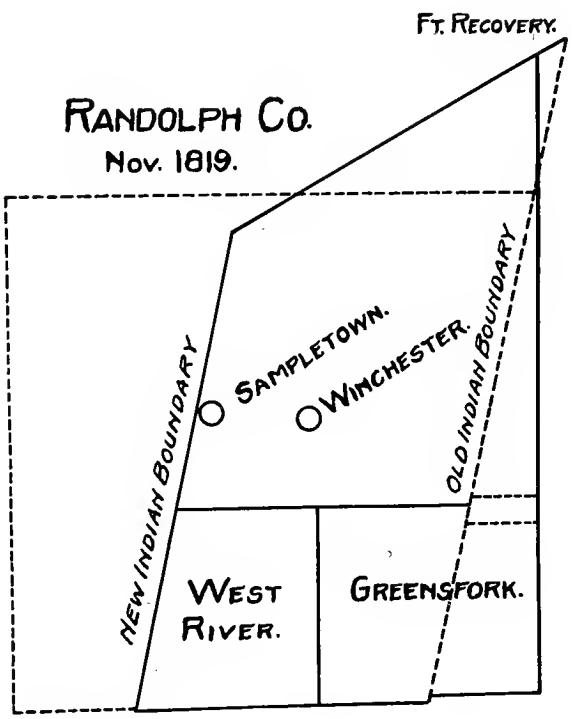
At this time we shall trace the development of township organization, until the present or permanent form of the county was obtained. As has been said, the county was organized into two townships in August, 1818, as shown by the map of the county at that time. The settlement of the county was rapid and as the number increased the demand for new townships also increased. It is interesting to note that as the population in any part of the county would increase, the demand for a new township would be made in that part of the county.



WEST RIVER TOWNSHIP.

West River township, as shown by the map of November, 1819, was petitioned for in the November session as follows: "Recd the petition of sundry Inhabitants of the West Part of Greensfork Township Praying that a new Township may be laid off Beginning on the line of Wayne County at the West line of Section Sixteen in Township Eighteen and Range fourteen thence with Said line to the line of Whiteriver Township. Ordered that all that Part of Greensfork Township West of the above described line be and the same is hereby stricken off into a new Township to be Known by the name of Westriver Township. All Elections in said Township are to be held at the house of Jess Cox. William Smith is hereby appointed Inspector of Elections in Westriver Township. Ordered that an Election in Westriver Township on the first Saturday in December next for the Purpose of Electing Two Justices of the Peace in said Township." Great changes were made in the county in 1820.

WAYNE TOWNSHIP.

In 1818 the new purchase of the cession with the Miami Indians had been made and all the central and northern parts of Indiana were opened to settlement. The surveys were made, and dispositions were made of the land in 1820. It must be remembered that Randolph county was the most northern county organized at that time, and on January 20th of that year, the following law was approved: Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, that all that part of the New Purchase, recently acquired from the Indians, which lies east of a due north line, drawn from the northwest corner of Randolph county, and north of said Randolph county, be, and the same is hereby attached to the said county of Randolph county and from henceforth shall be held and considered an integral part of Randolph county. The northwest corner of the county at that time was where a boundary line of 1809 left the parallel direction to the old boundary line and went directly to Fort Recovery, Ohio. It is about one mile southwest of where Ridgeville now is. This extended Randolph county to the Michigan line and it became necessary to organize this portion into a township. The commissioners did this in their August term of that year, when it was "Ordered that part of the New Purchase Which was added to the County of Randolph by a late act of Assembly into a new Township to be Known and Designated by the name of Wayne Township and that all the Elections to be held in Wayne Township be held at the house of Dr. William Turner. Ordered that Ezra Taylor be Inspector of Elections in Wayne Township for and During the term of one year. Ordered that an Election be held in Wayne Township on the last Saturday in November Next for the Purpose of Electing two Justices of the Peace and one Constable in said Township." The Dr. William Turner, in whose house the election was to be held, lived in Fort Wayne, as did the inspector, Mr. Ezra Taylor. The treasurer's record shows that Mr. Taylor received seventy-five cents for bringing the election returns from Fort Wayne to Winchester. He certainly earned his seventy-five cents. This Wayne township should not be confused with the present township of Wayne.

WARD TOWNSHIP.

On the next day, August 15, the commissioners proceeded to organize Ward township, as follows: "Ordered that all that part of Whiteriver Township North of an East and west line Dividing the twentyeth and twentyfirst Congressional Township be stricken off into a new Township to be Known and Designated by the name of Ward Township. Ordered that all Elections in Ward Township be held at the house of James Massey and that James Massey be Inspector of Elections in Ward for one year. Ordered that an Election in Ward Township on the second Satturday in September Next for the Purpose of Electing two Justices of the Peace and one Constable in said Township."

The county retained these boundaries until the 23d of December, 1822, when the following act was approved: Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, that all that part of the New Purchase, lately acquired from the Indians contained in the following boundaries, to-wit: "Beginning at the southwest corner of Randolph County, thence west four miles, thence due north until it strikes the northern boundary of Indiana, shall from henceforth form and constitute a part of the County of Randolph, in as full and complete a manner as though it had been attached to and formed a part of said county at the beginning of its formation." This made the boundary line, in December 23, 1820, about three-fourths of a mile east of where our present (1914) western boundary is. At this same time Randolph county was given control over Delaware county, which comprised all the northwestern part of the state east of the second meridian not included in Randolph county. By an act relative to county boundaries, approved January 31, 1824, Randolph county was defined as follows: "Sec. 8. That all the territory included within the following boundaries shall form and constitute the county of Randolph, to-wit: Beginning at the Ohio state line, where the line dividing townships fifteen and sixteen strikes the same; thence west with said township line, until it strikes the old Indian boundary; thence to, and with the center line of township eighteen, to the northwest corner of section twenty, in township eighteen, and range twelve east of the second principal meridian; thence north to the line dividing townships twenty-one and twenty-two; thence east to the Ohio state line, and thence with said state line to the place of beginning."

The records of the county from February, 1821, to November, 1825, having been lost, it is not known just what disposition the commissioners made of the new part added to Randolph county. It is presumed that Ward township, White River township and West River were extended to the new county line.

We must remember that Randolph county had control over Delaware county and some time during the year 1825 Liberty township, in Delaware county, was organized. The only record we have of it is in Jere Smith's reminiscences, in which he says:

LIBERTY TOWNSHIP (DELAWARE COUNTY).

"In the May term of 1825, David Rowe was allowed $1.50 for making return of the election of two justices of Liberty township. From this and from my recollection, I can say that in January, 1825, either the whole or the east part of Delaware county was made into Liberty township. The township containing Smithfield is still called Liberty. And as Daniel Stout had been county commissioner in Randolph and had moved to what is now Delaware county, built a mill and laid out Smithfield, I presume he had that county erected into Liberty township. There were but few inhabitants in that region, and David Rowe, who brought the election returns, lived pretty well up on Prairie creek, at least six miles from Smithfield. Also, May, 1826, John J. Deeds, who had settled on White river and built a mill above Smithfield, was appointed supervisor on the west fork of White river from the mouth of Cabin creek to Mont-see-town, as the Indians called it. Hence 'Mont-see-town' was then (May, 1826) in Liberty township and in Randolph county as well."

Some corroborative evidence of this is that in the January term, 1826, David Vestal was appointed assessor in Liberty township for the year 1826, and Aaron Richardson was appointed inspector of elections in Liberty township for one year. John Coon and John H. Myers were appointed fence viewers in Liberty township for one year. Then, in the May term of 1826, "William Vanmeter is appointed supervisor on the state road from the post Numbered 39 to the post Numbered 44 ordered that all the hands in Liberty Township North and South between the last numbered posts do work on said road and also on the west fork of White river from Moncey town to the line Dividing Ranges 7 & 8 East." Thus it will be seen there can be no doubt that Liberty township was organized, and not very long before January, 1826.

STONEY CREEK TOWNSHIP.

Settlement was now being made very rapidly along the west fork of White river and Stoney Creek and West river, which is evident by the change in township made in the next few years. In 1827, July 2d, Stoney Creek was organized as follows: "Ordered that Congressional Townships 19 & 20 and 21 in Range 12 East be stricken off into a Township to be known by the name of Stoney Creek Township Except such part as are included in the bounds of Delaware County. Ordered that an Election be held in Stoney Creek Township on the third monday in July (instant) for the purpose of Electing one Justice of the peace in said Township. Ordered that all Elections in Stoney Creek Township be held at the house of Joseph Thornburgh. Samuel Vestal is appointed inspector of Elections in Stoney Creek Township for one year."

Two things concerning this organization are not clear: First, why should they omit the half of township 18, included in Randolph county; and second, why should they "except such part as are included in the bounds of Delaware county," when none of the townships 19 or 20 and 21 of range 12 were in the county of Delaware? It is quite possible that the petitioners and even the commissioners were not very familiar with the survey at that time.

The next changes were made in 1831. One new township, Washington, was organized and the boundaries of each of the other organized townships were changed. The townships at that time being White River, Greensfork, Ward, West River and Stoney Creek. Washington township was organized as follows: "Be it Known that hereafter all that part of Greensfork and West River Townships described as follows to wit Beginning on the Wayne County line at the Section corner between Sections 14 & 15 in Range 14 thence N. 8 miles thence West 7 miles thence S. 8 miles to the line of Wayne County thence to the beginning Shall be known by the Name of Washington Township with the East half of Section 10 Township 18 of Range 14. Ordered that all Elections in Washington Township shell be held at the house of Joatham Beeson in the Town of Blooming Port."

It seems strange that an exception of the east half of section 10, township 18 of range 14, should be made and is not included in Washington township. That this was done, however, there can be no doubt, because in the March term of 1832 the following is found: "Be it remembered that the East line of Washington Township is hereby so altered as to begin at the Wayne County line at the corner between Sections 14 and 15 in Range 14 thence North as formerly including the east half of Section 10 in Township 18 & Range 14 E. in Washington Township." It is easily explained, however, when we consider that Paul Beard owned the east half of Section 10 and the west half of Section 11. Mr. Beard was an unusual man. He had an indomitable will and exceedingly great force of character. Being a physician, his influence was unlimited. His buildings were located in section 11, and he, not wanting to own land in two townships, persuaded the commissioners to make an exception of the east half of section 10.

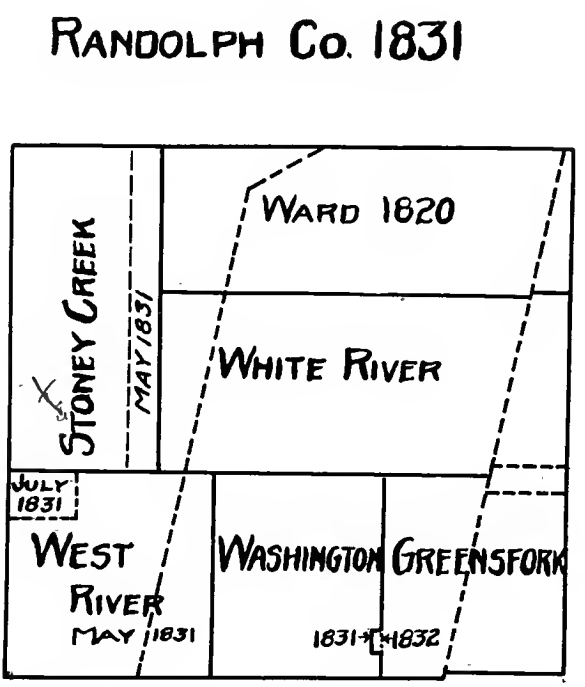
Verily, there were political bosses even in that day. The time never has been when we were without political bosses, the time never will be, when we shall not have them. The only question to decide is: What shall be the character of the bosses or leaders? May they always be as upright and honorable as was Paul Beard.

On the same day that Washington township was organized, West River township was changed as follows: "And West river Township shall contain the following bounds (hereafter) towit beginning at the Wayne County line on the line dividing Sections 15 & 16 in Range 13 thence N. 8 miles thence west 8 miles to the Delaware County line thence direct to the South west corner of Randolph County thence direct to the beginning. Ordered that all Elections hereafter in West river Township shall be held at the house of Wm. Smith."

Evidently the people of Stoney Creek township felt this to be a discrimination against them, as they lost quite a little of their territory. The commissioners in this same session equalized the matter somewhat, when it was "Ordered that one mile of off the west end of Whiteriver & Ward Townships be added to Stoney Creek Township and ordered that all Elections in said Township hereafter shall be held at the house of Wm. Moore Junior." This evidently didn't yet satisfy the people of Stoney Creek township. It is impossible to know at this time just what local forces were acting in the matter, but another change was made in the July term, when it was "Ordered that two miles & a half & forty poles from the west County line and 2 miles South be taken from the N west corner of west river Township and added to Stoney Creek Township." These changes are shown in the map of 1831.

JACKSON TOWNSHIP.

In the meantime, settlement had been very rapid along the Mississinewa. Ward township, especially in and about Deerfield, was becoming one of the most populated parts of the county. This influence spread east, until there was a sufficient number of people who desired a new township to be organized. This the commissioners did on the 4th day of November,



1833, when it was "Ordered that the following bounds be Known hereafter by the name of Jackson Township to wit Beginning at the State line at the Section line between Sections 25 and 36 in Town 17 Range one west thence west to the old boundary thence to and with the Section line between Sections 8 & 17 of Town 19 Range 15 East to the Range line between Ranges 14 & 15 thence North with said Range line to the north line of the County thence East to the State line thence to the beginning And that all Elections in said Township be held at the house of Thomas Pettens Ordered that an Election be held in Jackson Township on the first Saturday in December next for the purpose of Electing two Justices of the peace in said Township. William Keennon is appointed inspector of Elections in Jackson Township until the next annual Election for Township officers."

ORGANIZATION.

Thus, it will be seen that the southern end of Jackson township is located upon the first section line south of the point on the Indian boundary line, reached in the first organization of the county. This is why we think they came south to this line, rather than north to the line between Sections 27 and 22, as indicated in the record of 1818.

GREEN TOWNSHIP.

The northwest corner of the county was also anxious to have a local township, and petitioned the commissioners to organize them into a new township, which they did on the 6th of January, 1834, when it was: "Ordered that the following Boundary be hereafter known by the name of Green Township to wit: begnning on the north line of the County at the corner between Sections 4 & 5 of Town 21 North of Range 13 E thence South 7 miles thence west 7 miles to the west line of the County thence with said line to the beginning."

"Ordered that an Election be held at the house of Thomas Brown Senr. in Green Township on the first Saturday in February next for the purpose of Electing a Justice of the peace in said Township.

John Merine is appointed inspector of Elections in Green Township untill the annuel Election for Township officers."

A change was also made in the line between Greensfork and Washington townships, in September, 1834, by the line being fixed where it is at the present time. This line had been a matter of contention since 1831, and continued to be for a number of years afterward. Just what influence was brought to bear to make the change of 1834 is not known, but on September 2, 1834, the following order was made: "Ordered that one half mile be Stricken off the west side of Greensfork Township and added to Washington Township and that the dividing line between said Townships hereafter, is to begin on the south line of the County at the middle of Section 14 Town 18 Range 14 and extend North paralel with the Section lines to the south line of White river Township."

It must be remembered that Randolph County had at this time control of the land north of it in what is now Jay County, although we had a northern boundary definitely fixed in 1824. The tax gatherer or collector of 1834 was Mr. Carey S. Goodrich. At that time taxes were collected by visiting the people and assessing and collecting the taxes at the same time. The people in what is now Jay County demurred to paying their taxes, claiming that they received no benefits whatever from it. Mr. Goodrich visited that territory and returned with the report that after seeing the country he didn't blame them very much. But this led to a dissatisfaction on the part of those people to the extent that the commissioners proceeded to organize them into separate townships.

SALAMANA AND MADISON TOWNSHIPS, JAY COUNTY.

In January, 1835, the commissioners ordered that, "All that part of Randolph County (being the Attached part) lying North of an East and west line dividing Townships 21 & 22 in Range fourteen is hereby Stricken off into a Township to be known by the Name of Salamana Township, and ordered that all Elections in said Township be held at the house of Daniel Farber. And ordered that an Election be held in said Township on the last Saturday of this Instant January, for the purpose of Electing one Justice of the peace in said Township. Obadiah Winters is appointed Inspector of Elections in Salamana Township until the next annuel Election for Township officers." "Salamana" Township evidently proved to be too large for the people to handle, consequently the township was divided in the May term of that same year, by the following order: "Ordered that hereafter all that part of Jay County (which is attached to this county) included in the following bounds constitute a new Township to be known by the name of Madison Township to wit: Beginning at the south East corner of Jay County, thence West along the County line to the south West corner of section 36 in Township 22 Range 14; thence north With the section line to the north line of Jay County; thence East with the County line to the State line; thence South with the State line to the place of beginning; and that all elections in said Township be held at the house of Benjamin Goldsmith.

"Abraham Lotz is appointed Inspector of Elections in Madison Township to serve until the next annual election for Township officers.

"Ordered that an election be held in Madison Township on the third Saturday in June next for the purpose of electing one Justice of the peace for said Township."

These elections were no doubt held, as in September, 1835, the county treasurer was ordered to pay "Daniel Farber $1.00 for making return of election in August 1835 from Salamony Township." On the same day an election was ordered to be held in Madison township on the second Saturday in October for the purpose of electing a justice of the peace for said township which election was held in due time.

The changes in the townships seem to have taken place in the corners of the county, which was no doubt, due to the fact that these parts were at this time being settled more rapidly than the center which had been settled previously to this time.

Another change was made in 1835 in the West River township region, when the following changes were ordered: "That hereafter the bounds of Westriver Township be as follows towit: Beginning on the line between Wayne and Randolph Counties at the corner of sections 14-15-22 and 23 in township 18 Range 13 thence North eight miles to the corner of sections 2-3-10 & 11 in Township 19 Range 13 thence west 4 miles to the Range line between Ranges 12 & 13 thence South 8 miles to the County line thence east to the place of Beginning and ordered that all Elections in said Township be held at the Town of Huntsville."

NETTLE CREEK TOWNSHIP.

"Ordered that the bounds of Nettle Creek Township be as follows to wit beginning at the County line between Wayne and Randolph Counties where the line between Ranges 12 & 13 meets the same thence North with said line 7 miles thence west to the west line of Randolph County thence to the South west corner of said County thence east to the place of beginning And ordered that all Election in said Township be held at the house of James Harty."

By a careful comparison of the maps of 1834 and 1835 it will be noticed that the north line of Nettle Creek township is one mile north of the southern line of Stoney Creek in 1834, and that sections 11 and 12 of township 19, 12 east, were not included in the order organizing Nettle Creek township. Just how and why these sections were placed in Stoney Creek, the records do not say, but they are there, and there they will no doubt stay, unless at some time the territory should be reorganized.

UNION TOWNSHIP.

The organization of townships necessarily depended largely upon local conditions. A striking example of this is in an attempt to organize a township with Unionsport as its center. Unionsport had been organized as a town in 1837, and by the spring of 1838 had begun to assume municipal airs. In March, 1838, they attempted to put their hopes and desires into realization by petitioning the commissioners to organize a new township at which time the commissioners, "Ordered that the following bounds shall Constitute and be Known by the name of Union Township to wit to commence at the North west corner of West river Township thence South two miles thence East to the line of said Township thence North four miles thence west four miles thence South to the beginning ordered that all elections in Union Township be held at the School house in district number two And Hiram Mendenhall is appointed Inspector of Elections in said Township of Union."

This, no doubt, brought about the storm of opposition which resulted in Miles Hunt and others remonstrating, record of which is made in the May term of 1838, as follows: "Recd. the Remonstrance of Miles Hunt & others against the Establishment of Union Township which was Publickly read and continued &c." No doubt this question received a great deal of attention in that community and caused the commissioners quite a little of concern, so much so, that the election provided for in the order was not held, and in January of 1839 it was, "Ordered that Union Township be disoled and rendered null & Void and that the Townships out of which the said Township was taken and formed have their former Bounds. And the Board Adjourned until tomorrow morning 9 Oclock. John Coats, George A. McNees and John L. Addington."

WAYNE TOWNSHIP.

The extreme length of Jackson Township made it necessary to organize a new township which was done in September, 1838, by the following order: "Ordered that all that part of Jackson Township lying South of the line dividing Townships 20 & 21 in Range 15 be and the same is hereby Stricken off and called Wayne Township and ordered that all Elections in Wayne Township be held at the house of Harper Poivel. And ordered that all Elections in Jackson Township be held at the house of Ezekiel Davis."

MONROE TOWNSHIP.

Thus the county remained for almost seven years, when Monroe township was organized February 18, 1846. Monroe township was an exception in its organization to the usual rule. Heretofore, townships had in the main been organized by the division of one township, but Monroe was made up of parts of White River, Green and Stoney Creek townships. The petition was received and the order made on the 18th day of February, 1846, as follows:

FORMATION OF A NEW TOWNSHIP FOR CIVIL PURPOSES.

"Received the petition of Sundry Citizens of White river Township and Green Township and Stony Creek Township in Said County praying the formation of a new Civil Township in Said County to be formed out of Territory belonging to the above named Civil Townships to be Known and designated by the name of Monroe Township.

It is therefore Ordered by the Board of Commissioners of said County at this their March term aforesaid that Monroe Township be and the Same is hereby formed out of and Compresid of the following Territory within the following meets and bounds, to wit: commencing at the South East Corner of Section Seventeen Township No. twenty North of Range No. thirteen East * * * Thence West on Said Section line to the County line Thence North along said County line to the center of Section twenty-nine Township No. 21 N. of Range No. 12 East thence East on the Said center Section line through the center of Sections twenty-nine Section twenty eight Section twenty seven Section Twenty six and Section tweny five of Township No. 21 N. of Range 12 E and Through the center of Section thirty and Section twenty nine in Township twenty one North of Range No. thirteen East to the north and South line dividing Sections twenty nine and twenty eight in Township and range last menioned thence South on Said Section line to the place of Beginning.

"Ordered by the Board of Commissioners that the School house known as Edward O. Haymond School House be and it is hereby made the place of holding Elections in Monroe Township."

"Ordered by the Board that Andrew Devoss be and he is hereby appointed inspector of Elections in Monroe Township to Serve until the Annual Township Election on the first Monday in April and until his Successor is elected and qualified."

WASHINGTON HAS TROUBLE WITH WEST RIVER AND GREENSFORK.

The organization of West River township in 1835 made it long and narrow, being four miles wide and eight miles long. This left Washington township six and a half miles wide and eight miles long, being two very unequal townships. An effort was made to adjust this difference in 1849, when the county commissioners, "Received the petition of Sundry Citizens of West River and Washington Townships presented by Miles Hunt their Attorney, praying for one mile of territory to be taken from the West Side of Washington township and attached to the east side of West River township." This, however, was not agreeable to all, for the same record says: "To which Thomas Philips by Wm. A. Peelle his attorney filed a remonstrance to said petition and the Board after hearing the argument of Counsel took case under advisement." Mr. Hunt lived in West River township and Mr. Philips in Washington, which might explain their positions in this matter. Neither, however, desisted in their intentions, for in the last term (December 7, 1849), they again attempted the same thing with the following result:

"Now here comes Miles Hunt and Divers others Citizens of West River and Washington Townships and present their petition which is in words and figures following towit: from which it appears that Said petitioners disire to have two miles detached off of and from the West Side of Washington Township & attached to West River Township—Also comes Thomas Philips and Divers other citizens of Washington Township and remonstrate against the prayer of said petition, whch Said Remonstrance is in the words & figures following to wit: (here insert)—Whereupon the board after due consideration and deliberate overrule the prayer of Said petition, & direct that the Township boundaries be undisturbed." (NOTE.—The original petitions and remonstrances are not to be found in the records.)

But the movement was not to be stopped, nor were the commissioners to be released from further attempts to change the boundaries of these townships. In the June term, 1850, on the morning of Friday, the 7th, "The Board met pursuant to adjournment present the Honorable Abraham Adamson, John M. Lucas and Emson Wright Esqrs. members of Said Board," and "Received the petition of Sundry Citizens of West River and Washington Townships praying that a certain portion of territory may be detached from Washington Township and attached to West River Township for Civil purposes.

"It is therefore Ordered by the Board that the following territory be and the same is hereby attached to the east side of West River township, to wit: Secs. 11, 14, 23, 26 & 35 all of T 19 N. of R 13 E and Secs. 2, 11 & 14 all of T 18 N. of R. 13 E all of which the Township officers and others Interest in the execution of the laws in West River and Washington township will Severally take notice."

Thus Washington township was to rest from "line troubles," until 1856, when the disease broke out in the east part of the township, at which time an attempt was made to organize a new township, by presenting the following petition:

"To the Honorable Board of County Commissioners of Randolph County:"

"Your petitioners, citizens, residents, householders, freeholders and voters of Washington and Greensfork Townships in Said Randolph County, would show to your honorable body that from the present size and Shape of the said Townships of Washington & Greensfork they labor under great inconvenience and are put to great trouble in the transaction of their township business, as well as to exceeding great inconvenience in the discharge of their duties, and in the exercise of their rights as voters. They therefore ask your honorable board to create for them a new township giving it Such name as you may See proper & conferring upon it all the corporate powers of and pertaining to civil townships under the laws of the State,—Said township to be created by detaching one Mile and a half off of the East side of Washington township, and Two Miles and a half off of the West Side of Greensfork township excepting as to the north end of Greensfork for one Mile North & South they only ask that one mile and a half be detached. From the territory so proposed to be detached as aforesaid (see the map accompanying petition) they respectfully ask that a civil township be organized as aforesaid &c." Signed by William Norton, Sr. and one hundred and thirty-five others, many of whom were prominent citizens in the county. "And thereupon Jeremiah Horn by James Brown his attorney, files a remonstrance against granting the prayer of said petition," said remonstrance being as follows:

"To The Honorable Bord of County Commissioners of Randolph County, Ind.:"

"Whereas a petition is about to be—presented to the Bord of County Commissioners praying for the formation of a New Township to be Stricken off of Washington & Greenfork Townships, Taking off of Washington Township one & one half miles & two & one half miles off of Greensfork Township, leaving Greensfork Township three & one quarter Miles wide and Seven Miles long Completely destroying the geographical form of the Township and deranging the School districts as they are now formed it will be attended with a Verry Considerable expense to the County now and hereafter, will anually take from the School & Township fund the amount paid a new Sett of Township officers Therefore we the undersigned Citizens and Voters of Greensfork Township remonstrate against any Such division of the Township as set forth in the Petition, Considering it unnecessary & uncalled for seeing no local Matter to Warrant any such divission We therefore pray that your Honorable Bord will not grant the prayer of Said Petioners." Signed by Thos. Hough and one hundred ninety-four other citizens.

A similar remonstrance was received from the citizens of Washington township, signed by Strother Brumfield and twenty-two others. Evidently almost all of the voters and freeholders of the district affected had signed either the petitions or remonstrances, and it must have been a relief to the commissioners to have been able to make the following entry:

"In the case of the petition of Sundry citizens of Washington Township and Grens-Fork Township. The Board after receiving Sundry remonstrants against granting the prayer of said petition for establishing a certain Township therein prayed for. The Board by the agreement of all parties continue the case until the next term of this Board. And the Board Adjourned until to morrow morning 9 O clock." This matter was evidently dropped on the part of both petitioners and remonstrators, as no other action was ever taken by the Board of Commissioners.

This attempt however, was not to be the last one on the part of the citizens of these two townships to change the boundary line. The inconvenience of having a township line within half a mile of the principal town of another township are too great to go unnoticed and as late as May 22, 1889, an attempt was made to change the line by having the County Commissioners act upon the following petition which recites excellent reasons for the change desired and let us predict here that the time will yet come when such a change will be made and made for the reasons recited in this petition:

"To the Hon. Board of Commissioners for the County of Randolph:

We the undersigned voters and free holders owners of the land affected by the granting this petition do most respectfully pray and ask to have the township line dividing Greensfork and Washington townships moved one-half (½) mile east of the present line dividing said Greensfork and Washington townships it being a section line. By said township line being located where it now is we suffer great inconvenience thereby many having to attach to Washington township for school purposes and on election days have to travel from four to six miles otherwise we would have to go the short distance of one half to two miles and believing it would not cause any hurtful damage to either Greensfork or Washington townships in their social or geographical territory all this we ask your Honorable body to consider and grant.

Names: Isaac Hollingsworth, Wright M. Turner, Jesse Pierson, Paul Beard, Wm. Bond, Philip Capper, S. Y. Miles, Henry Rich, Thos. E. Farmer, James R. Davis, Fred Davis, Silvester Tillson, Charlie G. Stidham, Gideon A. Bird, George W. Lewis, Abel Hinshaw, W. A. Hinshaw, L. D. Shafer, C. K. Karnes, Ed Mann, Emerson Pickett, Joseph A. Brown, James Brown, Levi Wenner, J. R. Rhoades, James St. Myers, Thomas Tharp, Labe Tharp, Ed. I. Brown, B. H. Platt, L. C. Boon, F. A. Tillson, L. C. Moody, Ira E. Quigg, James Price."

In June, however, of the same year this petition was "dismissed for want of being signed by majority of the interested voters of the townships affected. June term, 1889. John R. Phillips, P. B."

FRANKLIN TOWNSHIP.

The next and last change to be made in the county, was the organization of Franklin Township, off the west end of Ward, when Robert Starbuck and one hundred and fifty other citizens of Ward township presented the following petition to the county commissioners:

"To The Honorable the Board of Commissioners of Randolph County and State of Indiana:"

"We the Undersigned Residents And voters of Ward Township In Said County Would Respectfully Show your honors, that owing to the Erronnous Length of Said Township East & West Bounded as it now is that we Labour Under Inconveniences in Many Respects And therefore Ask your honors for a Dicision of Said Township Believing that it would greatly facilite the Interests And Convenience of a Majority of the Citizens of Said

Township. we ask for Said Division to Commence at the North East Corner of Section one in Township No. 21 of Range No. 13. East on the Township and Range line of Said Congressional Township Runing thence Southe on Said line to the Southern line of Ward Township as it now is Bounded.

we ask your honors to Locate and Establish Said Division And as in Duty Bound your Petitioners will Every Pray &C."

This petition was acted upon June 5, 1859, when the following record was made:

"Notice of said petition having been given according to law & the subject having been duly considered thereupon the Board granted the prayer of the petitioners, & Ordered that Ward Township Randolph County Indiana be divided as follows (to wit) commencing at the North East corner of Section one, in township No. 21 of Range No. 13 East, on the township & range line of said congressional township, running thence South on said line to the southern line of Ward township as it is now bounded. The western end of said division to be known & designated as Franklin township & No. 12. And it is further ordered that such division shall not take effect till on the first Monday in April 1860."

No doubt, the time for its taking effect was made for April, 1860, so as to allow the officers of Ward township time to adjust the financial matters between the two townships. This was done in the spring of 1860 and on March 9, it was "Ordered by the Board that two Justices of the Peace for Franklin Township be elected at the April Election 1860, & such other Township officers as may be required by law." This was the last change in the civil townships of Randolph County. As our townships stand today, Ward is the only civil township that coincides with a congressional township, it being Township 21, Range 14 East.

It may be as many more years before any changes will be made, but the writer of this article predicts that at sometime the following changes will be made: White River township will be divided into two townships by a line north and south somewhere near the center, east and west. The West River township line will be pushed east at least one-half mile, perhaps one mile. The Washington township line will be pushed east one and one-half miles.

Our purpose in giving the records and details accompanied by the maps as found in this chapter, has been to show not only the exact origin of our townships as they are today, but to show the people of the present and future generations that our fathers wrestled with many local problems and met them as well as seemingly could have been done, although were the county to be redistricted today, a much better organization could be made. Conditions have arisen that even the most fanciful dreamer of a few years ago could not have thought. Modern times have brought about conditions that will make the township problem with its schools and its roads, a more serious one in the future than it ever has been in the past. Men equal to the problems of the past have always arisen, and no doubt, the people of the future will find their solution by men of equal ability.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

As has been noted before, one of the duties of the newly elected county commissioners of a new county, was to provide public buildings to be paid for out of the sale of lands donated to that county for that and other purposes specified. Agreeably to this, the commissioners of Randolph county early set to work to provide for the building of a court house, jail and a stray pen. This court house and jail were to be put upon a square selected by the state commissioners. These commissioners having established the seat of justice in what is now known as Winchester, no doubt advised with the county commissioners as to the exact location of these buildings. The plans and specifications for the court house and jail are to be found in the first record of the county and are as follows:

DECEMBER TERM, 1818.

"At a special meeting of the Board of Commissioners in the Town of Winchester for the purpose of the Letting to the lowest Bidder the Building of a Court house Jail and Stray Pen in said town The Court house to be of the following Description towit 24 feet Long 18 feet wide two stories High Covered with Joint shingles made of Walnut or Popler two floors to be made of Good seasoned plank 1¼ inches thick sills and sleepers made of Oak an Walnut the Wall to be of hewn timber to face at Least 12 inches hewn to 9 inches thick Both floors to be Tounged and Grooved the underside of the upper floor to be made Smoothe 7 joist in Each story. Albert Banta Became the undertaker to Build said Jail for the sum of $1.25 dollars and give his Bond to have the same finished according to the above Description in 18 months from this Date."

No doubt a stray-pen was built as well as a court house and jail, but no record is made of such for some time. There may, however, have been but little need of the stray-pen because there were only a few settlers. Practically all stock ran at large and no one would stop to take the time or trouble to "pen" a pig, horse or cow.

The court house and jail were crude affairs but served their purpose and served it well. The men who built them had plenty of time and no doubt did their work well as is seen by the report of acceptance at a special term, June 6, 1820, just eighteen months to a day from the time the contract was let and the exact time that the buildings were to be done. At that time the following report was made:

JUNE 6, 1820.

"State of Indiana, Randolph County, Board of Commissioners, June 6, 1820:

A Special Meeting of the Board of Commissioners in the towne of Winchester for the purpose of Receveing the Public Buildings in said town. Present Eli Overman Benjamin Cox and John James.

It is agreed upon by the Commissioners that they the Court house and Jail in said town of Winchester and ordered that the treasurer pay Albert Banta the sum of one hundred and twenty Eight Dollars and twenty Cents in full of his Contract for building Jail and also Ordered that the treasurer pay Abner Overman the sum of two hundred and fifty nine Dollars and thirty Cents for Building Court house in said town of Winchester."

It will be noted that Mr. Overman received the munificent sum of $4.80 extra upon the building of this court house, which was certainly a record for even so early a time and only equaled by that of Mr. Banta, the undertaker of the jail, who received $3.20 extra for his services in the construction of the "County Bastile."

The "oldest inhabitants" differ as to the exact location of the court house, some saying that it was on the present court house square, others that it was on the north side of Washington street. No doubt the first opinion is the correct one. It could hardly have stood in the center of the court house square, as the new one which was built in 1826, is known to have stood in the center of the yard and at various times during its construction, the records make mention of the meetings and the elections held in the court house which would necessarily have been torn away for the construction of the new building.

The jail was situated near the southwest corner of the court yard, just east of the box-elder trees now growing at that corner of the yard. There are many people now living who remember having seen this jail and all who remember it agree that it was a log jail as specified, with the corners interlocked and no opening in the lower room except the window as described in the specifications. The entrance to this room was made by a trap door in the floor of the upper room. No provision was made for any heat which certainly must have made "thirty days" a very unpleasant sojourn in the winter. The stairway leading to the second story was what is commonly known as the "Mill stairs," and instead of running up the side of the building as outside stairs usually do, it is built leaning to the building very much as a ladder would stand.

The court house stood for only a short time as we find on May 2, 1826 it was ordered that:

MAY TERM, 1826.

"John Coats, David Frazier, and Samuel D. Woodworth are appointed a committee to form the plan of a courthouse in the County of Randolph and make an Estimate of the probable Expense and Report the same to the Board of Justices at July term 1826."

No doubt this was the result of much agitation all over the county.

There are two important conditions to keep in mind at this time, one is that the county did not have county commissioners, the law creating the office of county commissioners having been repealed, but the business was transacted by a board of justices. This board of justices was composed of all the justices of the peace to be found in this county. This would put a man of authority in practically every neighborhood of the county, as every township had from one to three justices and frequently the meetings were attended by ten to twelve of these men. Another important factor in all public work at that time, was the county agent, a man elected by the commissioners or justices and whose duties were to look after public affairs in a general way. Paul W. Way, of Winchester, was elected near the beginning of the county's organization and served for a great many years and was in office at the time of the building of the second court house and upon him fell largely the responsibilities of its engineering, both as to the building and the raising of the funds with which it was to be built. To show that the question was discussed thoroughly and that opinions were frequently exchanged, we give the transcript of the records concerning this building as follows:

JULY TERM, 1826.

"At a Randolph Board of Justices began and held at the courthouse in Winchester on monday the 3rd day of July, 1826 present the honorable John Coats president & William Massey, John Odle, Isaac Barnes, Samuel D. Woodworth, William N. Rowe, George Reitenour Esq's members.

Bond and approved Security will be required of the undertakers."

JULY 29, 1826.

At a called session of the board of justices began and held at the court house in Winchester on Saturday the 29th day of July, 1826 presents the honorable John Coats president and David Frazier and Joseph Hale Esquires members.

"Ordered that the following be the conditions of the Brick work of a court house in the Town of Winchester in County of Randolph to wit, the wall of said house to commence one foot under the Surfice of the Earth, the wall to be 27 inches thick, till it rises one foot above the Surfice of the Earth to be made of good sound well burned Brick no Salmon Brick in the first 2 feet. W. corner of the Same description, with Straight arches over the doors and windows in a workmanlike manner, the Brick to be laid in mortar of Equal parts of Sand, lime, and clay, the work to be done in a workmanlike manner and to be completed by the first of November 1827 and the undertaker will be Entitled to one half of his pay, on the first of January next, the balance on or before the 1st of November 1827 if sd. work should be then completed, if not, when sd. work is completed the undertaker will be required to give Bond with approved Security in double the sum of his contract.

"Ordered that the following be the description of the carpenters work on the before mentioned court house to wit: There are to be 1 Summer across Sufficiently Supported by pillars of Stone, to bear up the Sleepers and all the weight that may come on the same, 2 Summers to cross the house at Each Story Supported by two Sound Posts under Each, well Supported at the bottom, and Sufficiently large to Support all the weight of the two upper floors, and Roof, Summers to be oak and at least 12 inches Square, and C. 3 Joice 4 by 12 inches in the Second floor, and C. 3 Joice 3 by 8 in the upper floor, with a four Square Roof made in a form to receive a cupolo at a future day to be covered with Joint Shingles not more than 18 inches long or 4 inches broad five Eights thick at the but end not to Show more than one third the length, Shingles to be poplar, one Door frame in the center of the South side of sd. House 5 by 7 feet one in the East end 4 by 7 feet 9 window frames to be put in the under Story of a Size Sufficient to take 24 lights in Each, 10 by 12 and 10 window frames in the upper Story Sufficient to take 20 lights in Each 10 by 12, the door and window frames to be finished in order to receive the Sash and Shutters, and plain Solid wood cornish around said house, with tin conductors at Each corner to convey the water from said house the cornish to be of yellow poplar all the work to be of good durable timber, and to be performed in a complete, Strong workmanlike manner, so as to bear the inspection of good workmen, the work to be carried on and put in at Such time, or times, as the mason may call for the same so as to hinder the mason as little as the nature of the case may require the work to be completed on or before the first of January 1828.

The undertaker will be required to give Bond and Security in double the amount of his contract and will be entitled to Receive one half the amt. of his contract on the first day of January next and the balance when the work is completed.

And the Board adjourned until Board in course.

JOHN COATS Presd."

Evidently a contract (which was not recorded), was made and entered into between the county and David Wysong, to build the walls of the court house. This is shown by the order made by the commissioners September 4, 1826, when they made the following entry:

SEPTEMBER TERM, 1826.

"The Board of Justices agree to give David Wysong who heretofore became the contractor to build the wall of the courthouse in Winchester the sum of two hundred and twenty-five dollars in addition to his former contract and the said David agrees on his part to make the foundation of said house of rock dimensions to be the same towit: two feet high 27 inches thick one half of said $225 dollars in six months after his former contract becomes due and the balence in six months after.

JOHN COATS, P. of the Board."

Mr. Wysong evidently began on the building immediately as he began to receive his pay as early as January, 1827, when it was "Ordered that the county treasurer pay David Wysong $292.50 in part for building courthouse." Again in January, 1828, Mr. Wysong was paid $292.50 "in part for building the Courthouse."

In September, 1828, it was "Ordered that the County treasurer Pay David Wysong the sum of one hundred and twelve dollars and fifty cents with legal interest until paid." It was also "Ordered that the County treasurer pay David Wysong the sum of $2.25 interest on contract for laying foundation of the courthouse."

In March, 1831, it was, "Ordered that the county treasurer pay David Wysong $127.12½ in part and Balance of principal and interest for laying foundation of the court house."

Thus it will be seen that Mr. Wysong had to literally "build the court house on time," as he is said to have said.

Paul W Way, who was a carpenter, had the contract or a part of it at least for the carpenter's work, as on May 8, 1827, it was "Ordered that the county treasurer pay Paul W. Way the sum of one hundred and ninetyeight dollars and fifty cents in part for doing the carpenters work on the court house." Mr. Way's duties as we have said, were many and he was practically the moving spirit in all the business. This is shown by an entry of the same day just mentioned, when it was, dollars for 2 days spent in going to Centerville &C to advertize Sale of courthouse and 2 dollars paid to Scott & Buxton for advertizing 2 dollars for writing Conditions of Sale one dollar for crying Sale 2 dollars for spirits writing 4 bonds to close the Sale 1 dollar total amt.—$11.00."

Mr. Way, no doubt, employed men to work on the building up until the contract was let for the carpenter's work in March, 1828, as we find in July, 1827, it was "Ordered that the county treasurer pay John Maxwell three dollars and fifty cents for putting an Extra Summer in the lower Storey of the courthouse as soon as the same is done and completed in a workmanlike manner." The real contract for the carpenter's work was made in March, 1828, as follows:

MARCH TERM, 1828.

COPY OF CONTRACT.

"Ordered that the lower floor in the courthouse be laid so far back as the south summer to be laid of oak plank not Exceeding 6 inches in width and at least 1¼ inches thick to be tongued and grooved and laid down broken Jointed well nailed down on oak Sleepers at least 12 inches in diameter and the bark taken off and not to exceed 2.1 feet from centre to centre.

The County Agent is ordered and directed to advertise and Sell to the lowest bidder the above named work in two seperate contracts—the doors and windows in one contract and the balance in another. Said Sale to be on the 24th day of this instant at the courthouse door in the Town of Winchester bond with approved Security will be required of the undertaker the undertaker shall receive one half of his pay on the first day of January next and the balance in one year from that date."

This contract was amended in the May term as follows:

MAY TERM, 1828.

"Ordered that the agent have the upper floor in the courthouse laid of poplar plank not Exceeding eight inches broad, the Stairs to Start as before ordered and run within four feet of the South summer then to turn East, the under floor to be completed by the second monday in August next and the balance to be completed by the Second monday in February next.

The door and window Shutters to be made of white walnut yellow poplar plank. the sash to be made of white walnut or yellow poplar plank the undertaker will have till the second monday in February next to put in the sash and glass March 24 1828."

There seems to have been some difficulty concerning the settlement for the work, as we find in July, that "Abel Lomax and John Irvin are chosen to adjudge the Carpenters work of the Courthouse in Winchester Randolph County and report whether said work is done according to contract, and if not done agreeable to contract to assess the damages, said arbitrators to meet in Winchester on the first monday in September next.

"Ordered that the County Agent contract with some Suitable person to pitch and paint the Cornish on the Courthouse as soon as possible."

The above committee on adjustments made the following report in the September term of 1828:

SEPTEMBER TERM, 1828.

"Whereas at the July term of This Board in the year of 1828 Abel Lomax Esq. and John Irvin were appointed as referees to adjudge the carpenters work of the courthouse in Winchester Randolph County and report whether said work was done according to contract and if not done agreeable to contract to assess the damages said Arbitrators to meet in Winchester on the first monday in September 1828 and on the day and year last aforesaid the said Abel Lomax appeared and the said John Irvin not appearing, David Haworth is chosen in place of said John Irvin, and the said Abel Lomax and David Haworth after being duly affirmed proceeded to discharge the trust confided to them who after some time return their award as follows (towit) that Paul W. Way the contractor for said work give Bond with security to the satisfaction of the Board of Justices that he will Warrant said roof and Every part thereof to Stand good for and during the term of five years from and after this date and assess four dollars damages in consequence of the corners of the roof not being made in a workmanlike manner and five dollars damages for three of the sound posts in the lower Story."

In January, 1829, Solomon Wright was paid $112.50 "in part for work done on the courthouse in 1828." David Heaston was paid on the same day, $109.67 "for work done on the courthouse." George Burkett was paid $2.50 for extra work done on the doors of the court house.

On the 4th of May, 1829, we find the following: "This day the Board of Justices have examined and received the work done by David Heaston on the courthouse agreeable to his contract."

Another evidence that Mr. Way hired the work done by the piece and that difficulties of all kind arose, was found in the November term of 1829, as follows:

"The Board now takes into consideration the work done on the court house by Thomas Wright and consider the same as it Respects the doors and windows not finished in a workmanlike manner and leave it to the choice of said Wright to get a painter to inspect said work and if it is Judged by said painter to be done in a workmanlike manner the county is to pay the cost of said inspection if not said Wright is to pay the cost of inspection and finish the work in the manner in which it ought to be done, and if it is deceded by a painter that the work is now done accoidg to contrack by a Report from said painter to Charles Conway he as Clerk of said Board is hereby authorized to issue an order in favour of said Wright for the amount of his contract, if not considered by a painter to be finished when said Wright does finish the work he is to notify five of the Justices of the peace living nearest to the town of Winchester to attend and Exmonin the same and report to the next term of this Board."

What painter was selected to inspect the work is not known, but at least a portion of the work was found satisfactory and in January, 1830, "The Board of Justices having inspected the painting done on the doors and windows of the courthouse receive the same And order the county treasurer to pay Thomas Wright the sum of $150.00 for painting done on the court house."

It is a pretty hard matter to know just when any part of the building was finished and made ready for occupancy. It would seem that a building begun in 1826 could have been made ready long before this evidently was.

In 1829, Joseph Crown was "allowed to work at his trade in the west room of the courthouse until next Board of Justices prived he takes the necessary care of the courthouse and suffers nothing to be injured therein."

In January, 1830, Mr. Way was allowed "fifty cents for cleaning the shavings out of the lower floor of the courthouse."

The peculiar manner of contracting public work in vogue at that early day is shown by the contract made with Joel Ward in March, 1831, as follows:

"The Board of Justices hereby contract with Joel Ward to proceed to Erect a Bench, Bar and suitable small benches table &c in the court house according to the plan proposed or any better plan in any part of said work that said Ward may think proper and said Ward is to have said work completed against February term of the circuit court 1832 and when said work is done said Ward is to make his charge for the same and if his charge is not agreed to by the Board doing County business then to be valued by workmen at the expense of the county and they do hereby agree that said Ward draw on the county at any time hereafter for the sum of fifty dollars." It is peculiar that men transacting public business should make such a contract, and the only excuse to offer for it, is the confidence the board had in Mr. Ward.

Mr. Ward was unable to complete his work in the specified time and in March, 1832, was allowed "further time until the February term of the circuit court in the year of 1833, to finish his contract heretofore entered into to erect a Bar, Bench &c in the courthouse."

When the time for settlement came in September, 1833, it was, "Ordered that the County treasury pay Joel Ward $125 in part for making Bar, Bench & Seats in the Courthouse." They could not agree upon the remainder of the bill. Mr. Ward was claiming $150 for the entire work and as seen above, they paid him $125 and made the following entry:

"As the Board of Commissioners and Joel Ward, the contractor to make a Bar, Bench Seats &c in the Court house cannot agree upon the price of said work, it is agreed between the contracting parties that Henry Sybowl and Thomas N. Davis value said work and report to the next term of this Board." Let us state here that Mr. Ward held the esteem of the commissioners, because he was this same day appointed by them, a trustee of the county library and also on this day, filed his report as overseer of a public road.

In November, 1833, the following entry was made, "It is further agreed between the County commissioners and Joel Ward that Thomas N. Davis and Henry Sybowl or Abel Lomax, Shall Value the Bar, Bench & seats made in the courthouse by the said Joel Ward & make report of their decision to the next term of this Board." Evidently they had some trouble in doing this, as in the January term of 1834, we find that "the settlement between the County and Joel Ward in Regard to the work done on the Bar &c in the courthouse is continued until the next term." In March, 1834, it is noted that "a settlement between the county commissioners and Joel Ward in regard to making the Bar, Bench and Seats in the Courthouse is continued to the next term of this Board."

Mr. Ward's contention had been for only a little over $50.00, so it is easy to imagine his gratification when the following report was made by the committee, November, 1834: "The honorable Board of County commissioners for Randolph County November term 1834 we your referees who were appointed by said Board to take into consideration the Value of certain work done on the courthouse in Randolph County by Joel Ward according to a certain contract of the Board doing County business in Randolph County at their March term 1831 with the aforesaid Joel Ward, now report that we have discharged that duty having taken the whole of the work item by item into consideration it is our opinion that it is worth $188.00 & 88 cents November 1st, 1834 Thomas N. Davis, Abel Lomax."

Another evidence in the patch work is that in September, 1835, it was, "Ordered that Charles Conway employ a workman either to seal or lath and plaster the Northeast Room in the Court house over head as soon as convenient."

In the September term of 1836, there are two items a little hard to explain, but we give them for what they are worth. "The filling up of the south side of the court-house floor and laying the same with brick heretofore undertaken by Jehu Robinson is this day examined By the commissioners, approved and received," and "Ordered that the County treasurer pay Jehu Robinson $22.00 for laying the south side of the Court-house floor." This would indicate that all of the lower story had not been used up to that time.

The final work of completing the court house was started March 6, 1839, when it was "Ordered by the Board of Commissioners that Paul W. Way County Agent sell to the lowest bidder the finishing of the Courthouse in Winchester work to be completed on or before the first day of March 1840," and "Moorman Way is appointed to Superintend the finishing of the Courthouse in Winchester."

Mr. Way procured the plans and specifications of Mr. Thomas Best and proceeded to advertise and sell the contract, report of which was made at the opening of the May term, 1839, as follows:

"To the Board of Commissioners of Randolph County, Indiana, at their May Term, 1839."

"Pursuant to your order of last session I proceeded to advertise and sell to the lowest bidder the finishing of the courthouse in this Town after the order of the draft produced by Mr. Thos. Best, which draft and Book of explanation is herewith produced the Sale took place on the 30th day of March 1839 in this Town at which time and place the Conditions of the said Contract was fully made Known by me. David Heaston having become the lowest and best bidder the said contract was cried of to David Heaston at two thousand dollars and the said David Heaston having been called on by me to execute his Bond for his performance agreeable to the conditions of sd. sale refuseth to execute the same Winchester May 6th, 1839. Paul W. Way C. Agent."

Whereupon the commissioners again took action in the matter by paying Mr. Best $10.00 "for drawing the draft and making a description of the work to be done on the courthouse," and again proceeded in the matter by making the following order on May 9, 1839:

"The Board of County Commissioners of Randolph County order that Paul W Way, County Agent, advertise and resell on Saturday the fifteenth day of June next to the lowest bidder the finishing of the court house in said County agreeable to the drafts and descriptions made and deposited with said Agent, by Thomas Best, by order of said Board Except the Plastering of the walls on the outside instead of which the walls are to be painted and Penciled, the floor and wood-work of the first Story and the roof and Cupola to be completed by the third monday in October next, and the remainder of the work to be completed within twelve months from that time the undertaker will be entitled to one-half of his pay on the first monday in March next and the residue twelve months from that time provided the work is done according to agreement The use of the court house is reserved for all Conty Courts at their respective Terms. And Moorman Way is appointed to Superinted the said work and report when called on."

Mr. Way (Paul W.) performed this work and reported to the commissioners in November, 1839, as follows:

"Report of Paul W. Way County Agent To the Honorable the Board of Commissioners of Randolph County, Indiana.

"Pursuant to your order issued at your May Term 1839, I have resold the finishing of the Court house in this Town on the 15th of June A. D. 1839. At which sale MichaelAKer of this Town become the Undertaker at $2480.½ of which Sum is to be paid on or before the 1st Monday of March 1840 & the balance at twelve months from that date provided the said work is completed and recd. by that date, and the said Michael AKer having entered into Bond with surety as required (which Bond is herewith submitted) Winchester Sept. 2nd, 1839. Paul W. Way C Agent."

Mr. Way was paid with the following order: "Ordered that the County Treasurer pay Paul W. Way County Agent for advertising crying sale preparing Bond and Report of the first sale of the Court house four dollars also four Dollars for second sale, two Dollars also for having sale advertised in Polladium and keeping court house Shut making in all ten Dollars."

Mr. Aker completed the work, received his full pay, and on September 1, 1841, it was "Ordered that the Job of repairing and finishing the Course house he received and that Michall Aker and Andrw AKern be released from any further responsibility relative to said job And the Bonn given by the Said AKers be cancelled."

In the meantime another office building had been constructed, for the use of the clerk and recorder. In March, 1836, we find "Jeremiah Smith is appointed a Special commissioner to let the Building of a Clerk & Recorders office and enclosing the public Buildings in the Townsh of Winchester according to the plan of the Board of Commissioners."

Mr. Smith performed that duty and on the 3d of May, 1836, the following entry was made: "Recd. the Report of Jeremiah Smith the commissioners heretofore appointed to let out the building of a circuit clerk and Recorders office, Privy, and enclosing Estray pen, and the Court-house, Stating that he had performed that duty and produced the Bonds executed by the contractors for said work, which is approved and said report and Bonds are ordered to be filed in the clerk's office of this Board, which is done accordingly And ordered that said commissioners so alter the contract for fencing the Square that the south line of the fence be even with the South side of the Jail door and drawn in as far on the west side as will be necessary to make that line of the Square and to go north and East so as to make the fence ten rods Square making the small gates opposite the doors of the court-hous and omitting to make the large gate if the contractor will agree to discount one third of the amount he is to receive for his contract to wit $50.00 said fence to be made of Walnut or poplar plank, which alteration in said contract is agreed to by Paul W. Way said contractor. And ordered that Robinson McIntire be and he is hereby appointed to Superintend the buildings in the place of Jeremiah Smith, who has resigned said Superintendance."

This building was a two-room, one-story brick, situated in front of and a little to the south of the east entrance of the present court house. The contract excepting the office rooms was let to Paul W Way. For some reason the board became dissatisfied with Mr. Way, or his contract, and in September, 1836, declared "The contract heretofore made with Paul W. Way in Regard to enclosing the court-house and Estray-pen is by agreement between the said Paul W. Way and the County commissioners disannulled and made entirely Void and of none effect." (This contract was certainly cancelled.) The contract for the construction of the building was let to David Heaston for $587.50.

Mr. Heaston for some reason was unable to complete the building in the required time and in November, 1836, it was "Ordered by the Board that David Heaston have further time until the next Term of this Board to finish the Building of the Clerk and Recorders office by him heretofore undertaken." The building, however, was completed and paid for in full in the September term of 1837. A man by the name of Samuel Schaggs made the "Batten window-shutters."

These two rooms proved to be too much space at first, so it was "Ordered that Paul W. Way County Agent rent the East Room or Recorders office to the highest bidder for a office untill the First Monday in August Next and Repport to the Next Term of this Board."

In January, 1839, Mr. Way made the following report: "Pursuant to your orders I have advertised and Sold to the highest bidder the recorders office in this Town till the 4th day of August next to be occupied as an office Doctor Hosea D. Searls become the purchaser at $23.10. November 10th, 1838. PAUL W. WAY C. Agent."

It is interesting to note that on the same day of the acceptance of the completion of the court house, September 1, 1841, that it was "Ordered that the Auditor & Treasurer be authorized to rent a house for their respective Offices of Elias Kizer One Door West of Goodrich & Brothers Store at three dollars per month for both at the Expense of the County from One year from this date. Ordered that Elias Kizer be allowed Eighteen Dollars for rent of Offices for the Auditor and Treasurer for Six Months." This, however, did not prove to be very satisfactory, at least to the commissioners.

It would be interesting to know the exact inside workings of a change that was made February 20, 1846, when it was "Ordered by the Board that the Auditor and Treasurer of said County occupy the East room of the Brick Building on the public Square Known formerly as the Recorders office as the room for their respective offices and to remove all fixtures and other apparatus Building to their respective offices from the rooms now occupied by said Auditor and Treasurer," and it was further "Ordered that Willis C. Wilmore be allowed to move the Book of Record into the west end of the Brick building occupied now as the Clerk office which shall be occupied by both Clerk and Recorder And Court Adjourned till Court in Course. Read and Signed in open court.

HENRY LEEKA,
ABRAHAM ADAMSON,
NATHANIEL KEMP."

It is strange, indeed, that the commissioners would put four such important offices as the auditor, treasurer, clerk and recorder's in the two small rooms; perhaps it was a "fit of economy."

The recorder occupied this room until April 18, 1853, when he was ordered to "occupy the Room up Stairs in the courthouse known as the Sons of Temperance Room as his office for the purpose of Recording Deeds &C and all other instruments required to be recorded in said Recorder's office in the County of Randolph."

The crowding of these four important offices into two small rooms and the general feeling that prevailed at that time that the court house was not safe led to the agitation of the building of a new set of office rooms in 1856, when it became known that the county would build a two story brick building on the north side of the court house the Odd Fellows conceived the idea of building a third story to it. This was considered by the commissioner to be an economical plan for the county and we find that on the 22nd day of January, 1856, the following agreement was entered into:

"It is agreed by the Board of County Commissioners now in session and Harry H. Neff, Silas Colgrove, Martin A. Needer and William A. Peele a committee appointed by the Winchester lodge No. 121 of the I. O. O. F. that the said lodge (upon the Second story of the public building now in contemplation of being built on the public square in the town of Winchester) be permitted at the entire expenses of said lodge to furnish and carry up the wall for a third story and in every respect as to said Story to furnish steps and make floor for said third Story and in every respect as to said third story to furnish and finish the same Excepting the roof and materials for the same and the cornish thereof. the lodge agrees to defray one third the expense of roof & cornish. It is also agreed that the said commissioners secure in some proper way the quiet and uninterrupted enjoyment of said third story for a Lodge room for said order so long as the order may desire it and free ingress and egress to the same.

Read and signed in open Court.

And the Board adjourned till the 1st Monday in March.

GEORGE W. VANDERBURGH,
NATHANIEL KEMP,
THOMAS AKER."

With this agreement between the county commissioners and the trustees of the I. O. O. F., the county commissioners advertised for the letting of the contract to build said building and on Saturday, March 8, 1856:

"The Board of County Commissioners proceeded to let the building of the public offices and received sealed proposes according to the advertisement and the building of the brick work was awarded to Benedict Feathers at the sum of $1,316.00; the carpenters and joiners work was let to Thomas Best & Co., for the sum of $744.00 and the plastering of the offices was let to Micaijh Puckett for the sum of $210.00 and bond was given by these parties to faithfully perform the work."

April 15, 1856, it was: "Ordered by the Board that Moorman Way, Esquire, be and he is hereby appointed the Special Agent for Randolph County to visit Dayton, Cleveland, and Cincinnati, Ohio (if necessary) and there to contract for Stone, Iron and Iron Doors and fixtures necessary to the erection of the County offices of said County, now under contract for building. Said Moorman Way is empowered by this, his said appointment, to make all the purchases of said material, which said material shall be paid for out of the County Treasury of said County in cash on the 1st monday in June, 1856."

At this time the commissioners also located the building as follows:

"Now, at this time the Board of County Commissioners located the site for the County offices on the following described portion of the public Square, towit: to be set 30 feet from the north wall of the Court House the east side of said offices to be in line with the east wall of the Court House and to be laid out and built north of said first line towards Washington Street and to front to the east."

On May 19th, however, the commissioners changed their mind and it was ordered:

"That the edifice about to be erected on the public square for the County offices be erected on the north side of the public square, commencing forty feet north of the north wall of the Court House to front with the east front of the court house and run north forty feet towards Washington street."

On this same day: "The Board of County Commissioners sold to George Monks the present edifice occupied for offices of Auditor, Treasurer and Clerk for the sum of $100.00, payable in six months from date; the Board excepting the stone forming the foundation of said building and a book case in the east side of the Clerk's office."

It was evidently the intention of Mr. Monks to use the material of the old building in the new building but something must have gone wrong as in December of the same year the Commissioners ordered:

"That Carey S. Goodrich be and he is hereby authorized to have and take possession of the edifice known as the old Clerk and Auditors office on the public square except the east case in said office and such pigeon holes as are not affixed to said building for the sum of $50.00 said edifice to be removed by the 15th of May next and that George Monks be released from his said contract heretofore made with the County Board pertaining to said edifice."

But the building of the new office rooms north of the court house did not yet provide adequate room for the various offices of the county. It would have been enough had the old court house been secure. It seems that this building was never considered safe. The recorder was ordered to take the "Sons of Temperance Room" in 1853 and that organization was required to move. Tom Brown rented the grand jury room in 1851 and various other rooms were rented in the old building but the people generally seemed to be somewhat afraid of it.

In 1864 the county commissioners rented McKews hall for the purpose of holding the Common Pleas Court. They also rented a room of Moorman Way in which to hold the Circuit Court. Court was held in McKews hall until the 8th of January, 1866, when:

"It is hereby Ordered by the Board, that the Room known and designated as Locke's Hall in the third story of the building situated on the Northeast corner of Washington and Meridian Streets in the town of Winchester, be and the same is hereby furnished to the County for all the uses and purposes of a Court Room, in lieu of the 'Old Court House' this day sold to the said John Ross by said Board."

Concerning the purchase of the "old court house" the following entry is made:

"The Board proceed to offer the said Court House & Privy for sale to the highest bidder and John Ross did then and there bid for the same the sum of three hundred and forty dollars and the said sum of $340 being the highest and best price bid for said property the same is openly struck of and sold to the said John Ross for said sum:. And he the said purchaser is to remove from off the Public Square said buildings and all the rubbish of same, taking care not to injure any of the public property of the County in the removal of said buildings or rubbish. He is also required to give his note with approved security waiving valuation and appraisement laws, to secure the payment when it becomes due of the above price. He the said John Ross thereupon makes and executes his promissory note, to secure the above sum which note is in the words and figures following—towit:

$340.00 Winchester, Ind., January 8, 1866.

Twelve months after date we or either of us promise to pay to W. E. Murray, Auditor of Randolph County, Indiana, the sum of Three hundred and forty dollars, for value received, waiving valuation and appraisement laws. This note is given to secure the payment of the price of the Court House and privy. Signed,

JOHN ROSS,
WM. DAUGHERTY,
JOHN B. ROBERTS.

Filed with Trust Fund notes.

Which said note and security is approved by the Board, and the said Board Order and direct that said old buildings be removed together with the rubbish from off the Public Square by the first day of July, 1866, to which the said purchaser agrees."

As will be seen by this entry John Ross had purchased the old court house that day. This old building was torn down and the material used to build the present three-story brick building on the northeast corner of Franklin and Main streets.

Another contract was made in this location of the court room, March 13, 1867, when the commissioners entered into an agreement for "Bradbury's Hall for Use of Courts"; on this day Mr. Bradbury leased to Randolph county for the term of three years the third story of the building situated on the west part of lot No. 9, north front, town of Winchester, county and state aforesaid, and for the sum of $200.00 per annum, commencing on the 1st day of November 1866 and bound himself to provide said room with sufficient seats for court purposes:

Said room not to be used for other than Court, Agricultural, Religious and Political purposes."

It will be noted that "McKews," "Locke's" and "Bradbury's" Halls is the same room. This hall was afterwards known as "Stone's Hall," and we find that March 10, 1869:

"It is ordered by the Board that A. Stone is allowed one hundred fifty dollars in full of amount due and owing to him for rent of his Hall for Court room, and he by agreement releases the said Board of Commissioners from any further liability for rent for said room under the provisions of a contract with D. M. Bradbury made March 13, 1867. (See Comrs. Rec. No. 3 p. 563.)"

This contract was cancelled with Mr. Stone because the commissioners had on the 21st of December, 1868, purchased of George McAdams: "His undivided half in value of the property on the north side of the public square, Lots No. 8 and 9 in the north front known as the City Hall in the town of Winchester." The commissioners paid Mr. McAdams the sum of $4,000.00 and received a warranty deed for said property and made the following entry concerning it:

"And it is hereby ordered by the Board that said Hall or room known as "City Hall" situate on Lot Number Eight (8) (West part) and east part of Lot No. (9) Nine in the North Front of the town of Winchester in said County be and the same is hereby declared to be for the use of said County of Randolph for the purposes of a Court House in which to hold the Circuit and Common Pleas Court of said County, and for all other purposes for which a Court House is required."

This room was used for court purposes until the present court house was occupied in 1876.

On April 1, 1876, Mr. W. D. Kizer, county auditor, sold the "city hall" to Mr. Chas. E. Magee for the sum of $3,075.00, "reserving the right to use and occupy the front room in the second story of the building on said real estate for one year free of rent, and the right to use and occupy the residue of said second story of the building on said real estate during the sessions of circuit court for one year free of rent."

It had been evident for some time that it would be necessary to build a new court house and provisions were begun for the same by levying a tax as early as 1870. It was the policy to accumulate a fund for that purpose so that the rate of taxation would not be so high when the building was actually constructed. Quite a sum of money, something like $35,000.00, had been accumulated for that purpose and in 1875 the county commissioners were short sighted enough to refuse to make a levy for county purposes thus exhausting all the surplus and leaving the county without any funds whatever when it became necessary to build the new court house. It is said the commissioners took this unwise step largely through personal reasons.

April 8, 1875, the county commissioners held a special session, the following of which are the minutes:

"A special session of the Board of Commissioners of Randolph County, Indiana, was begun and held at the Auditors office of said County on Thursday April 8th, A. D., 1875, in pursuance to a summons duly issued on the 8th day of April 1875 by Wm. D. Kizer Auditor of said County, and Served by W. A. Daly, Sheriff. due return whereof was made on said 8th day of April 1875, by which it is shown that due service thereof was made. Present Philip Barger, F. G. Morgan and Thomas Clevenger, members of said Board. Wm. D. Kizer Auditor of said County, and Ex-Officio Clerk of said Board, and Wm. A. W. Daly, Sheriff of said County. The Board having under consideration the propriety of building a Court House for said County, and having duly deliberated thereon, adopt certain Plans and Specifications and order notice to contractors to be published, which is as follows, viz:

NOTICE TO CONTRACTORS AND BUILDERS.

Auditors Office, Randolph County, Indiana.

Winchester, April 8, 1875.

Notice is hereby given that sealed proposals will be received by the Board of Commissioners of Randolph County Indiana, for the building of a county Court House, until June (16th) Sixteenth 1875, at 12 o'clock M. noon, when the bids will be opened. The Commissioners reserve the right to reject any or all bids if considered for the best interest of the County.

A bond signed by two responsible parties will be required to accompany the bid in the sum of Five Thousand Dollars that the bidder will enter into a contract and furnish sufficient and satisfactory bail if said contract is awarded him. Two setts of Plans and Specifications prepared by J. C. Johnson Archt, Fremont Ohio can be seen at the Auditors office in Winchester Randolph County, from April 14th, 1875, until the day of letting. The building to be commenced July 1st, 1875, the foundation to be completed by November 1st, 1875, the building to be completed by April 1st, 1877. All of the plans will be on file from and after June 1st, 1875."

Mr. J. C. Johnson was selected as architect and on June 16th, 1875, the following bids on plan No. 1 were received and bonded:

On plan No. 1, entire building except steam heating were received and bonded.

G. W. Webster, $79,000.00 and $2,800.00.
Christian Boseker, $73,231.31 and $4,100.00.
G. W. Myers and M. A. Reeder, $80,000.00 and $3,444.00.
J. W. Hinkley, $79,500.00 and $3,500.00.
M. T. Lewman and W. W. Blankenship, $83,666.00 and $3,400.00.
F. L. Farmer & Co., $88,295.00 and $4,500.00.
A. G. Campfield, $73,000.00 and $4,300.00.
Marcus Bossler, $81,807.00 and $3,878.00.
Beaver & Butts, $76,065.00 and $3,330.00.
Wm. Ballard for W. H. Ballard, $83,000.00.
Miller Frayer & Sheets, $82,853.00 and $4,766.00.

The contract was given to Aaron G. Campfield to build and erect said court house at the sum of $73,000.00. Mr. Campfield entered into contract with the commissioners on the 2nd day of June, 1875, and proceeded immediately to the erection of the court house, which was built according to specifications and completed and accepted by the county commissioners April 1, 1877, at which time Mr. George Ennis was appointed janitor at a salary of $425.00 per year. Mr. Ennis continued in this position faithfully until his death on the 2nd day of August, 1912, at which time Charles Puckett was appointed, serving until January 1, 1914, when James A. Davis received the appointment.

It no doubt seemed to the county commissioners that the present court house was sufficiently large to accommodate the public for an indefinite period but it is now entirely too small and inadequate to meet the needs of public business. It seems strange that a building costing the amount that this one did should be built and no protection made against fire of any of the public records and up to date no commissioners or county council has ever had the "back-bone" to provide the protection against so serious a loss.

The attic of the present building is a mass of pine timber of the most inflammable kind, needing only a small start of flame to completely destroy the building.

At this time, 1914, the question of remodeling the building is being agitated and it is to be hoped that such a splendid thing will in the very near future be accomplished.

Were the records of the county to be destroyed the loss from such destruction could not be estimated in dollars and cents. The cost of repair of the court house would be a bagatelle in comparison to such loss.

JAIL.

It has been noted in the earlier part of this chapter that the first jail built in the county was begun in 1818 and completed in 1820. This jail is said to have had inter-locking corners and some of the people now living who remember seeing it say that it was a double wall but the records give no evidence of any such construction. Memory is a very treacherous affair and for that reason we are inclined to think that the specifications were followed literally and that it was to have had a wall made of logs hewn to 13 inches square.

This building stood on the southwest corner of the present court house square east of the box-elder tree now growing there. This jail served its purpose well for many years and many desperate characters have been securely kept in it, but like all materials the logs in time began to give way through age and decay until at last it is said that three prisoners escaped by digging their way through the rotten logs. This building stood until some time after December term of 1857 in which it was:

"Ordered by the Board that William W. Smith be and he hereby is authorized to remove the old log County Jail off of the public square from where it now stands and to sell the iron now attached to said Jail and to pay the proceeds of said sale into the County Treasury and make report of his doing in the premises to the next term of this Board."

The jail was removed by Mr. Smith to a lot just back of the present site of the Winchester postoffice and was converted into a pig pen.

December 6, 1856, the commissioners had provided for a new jail and ordered that:

"Thomas Best and Moorman Way be and they are Hereby appointed by this Board to get up a plan and Specifications for a County Jail and for the purpose of enabling said Best and Way or either of them to give the best and most approved plan they or either of them are hereby authorized to visit the several prisons in the adjoining counties or adjoining state for the purpose of giving the most approved plan for said Building and make report of their proceedings in the premises to the next term of this Board."

The architects evidently did not get their plans and specifications as soon as the commissioners expected, but April 14, 1857, the following entry was made:

"Now at this time the Board of County Comrs. had selected the site for, and on which to build a County Jail and Sheriff residence which building is to be set south of the Court House, and in line with the Court House and public offices, and to set forty feet south of the Court House and the east line or east front of said building to be set in line with the east line or east front of said Court House and public offices. The North east corner of said building to set forty feet south of the southeast corner of the Court House and run south forty feet thence west thirty feet thence north forty feet thence east thirty feet to the place of beginning which building shall be two stories high with a permanent stone foundation. According to the specifications which may hereafter be adopted by the Board of Co Comrs."

At a special session held April 29th a very peculiar state of affairs is shown when it was:

"Ordered by the Board that Nathaniel Kemp and Thomas Aker be and they are hereby appointed and required to visit Dayton and Cincinnati for the purpose of employing a Mechanic and contracting with same for the building Iron Cells and the other necessary appendages to the County Jail And said Nathaniel Kemp and Thomas Aker report that they have attended to the same and make report of the following contract made and entered into by them with Cincinnati Mechanic at the following terms and prices, etc."

It will be observed that Mr. Kemp and Mr. Aker were two of the county commissioners at the time.

The records have three and a half pages blank following this, hence it was evident that they intended to fill in terms and prices at some later time. The contract spoken of was made with Jacobs & Co., of Dayton, Ohio.

It was not until the 2nd of May, 1857, that anything definite was done concerning the jail and we find at that time that it was:

"Ordered by the Board that Nathan Garrett. Auditor of said County, give the Notice to the Contractors for the Building of a County Jail and Sheriffs Residence as soon as the time can be fixed upon by Nathaniel Kemp & Moorman Way, said Notice to be given by Publication being made in the Randolph County Journal a weekly newspaper printed and published in Winchester."

The advertisement was properly written and published and on the 15th day of June: the "Board of County Commissioners proceeded to receive the proposals of several mechanics for the erection of the County jail to be together with the sheriffs residence on the south part of the public square and after examining the several proposals the brick work was let to Benedict Feathers for the sum of fourteen hundred dollars it is therefore ordered by the Board that the Brick work be and is hereby let to Benedict Feathers for the said sum of fourteen hundred dollars and that said Benedict Feathers be required to give bond in the penal sum of twenty eight hundred dollars with sufficient free hold security to the acceptance by the Board. And after examination of the several proposals, the Carpenters work was let to Martin A. Reeder for the sum of six hundred and twenty five dollars, and that said Martin A. Reeder be required to give bond in the penal sum of twelve hundred and fifty dollars with sufficient freehold security to the acceptance of the Board. And after examinations of the several proposals the plastering was let to A. D. and A. O. Neffs for the sum of one hundred and forty five dollars. It is therefore ordered by the Board that the plastering be and the same is hereby let to A. D. & A. O. Neff, for the sum of one hundred and forty five dollars and that said A. D. & A. O. Neff be required to give bond in the penal sum of two hundred and ninety dollars with sufficient freehold security to the acceptance of the Board."

This jail was completed in the spring of 1858. The commissioners were so well pleased with the work of Mr. Way that on March 3d of that year they passed the following resolutions and ordered it to be "spread" upon the records of this Court:

"Whereas, the County Buildings being nearly completed and the services of Architect and Superintendent being no longer indispensible, therefore:

Resolved, that the thanks of this Board be and hereby is tendered to Moorman Way Esqr for the faithful, efficient, and skillful manner in which he has discharged the trusts committed to him.

Resolved, that Mr. Way be requested to present his claims for services rendered, at his earliest convenience to the Board, that the same may be passed upon and allowed.

Resolved, that the Auditor be directed to present Mr. Way with a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions."

Final settlement was made for the contract for this building on June 17th, 1858.

For the first time in the history of the county the sheriff was provided with a residence in connection with the jail and the sheriffs from that time on have lived with their families in the jail.

This jail was peculiarly constructed in the interior. It had a walkaway around the cells. If prisoners were disposed to take advantage, they could make it very dangerous for the sheriff.

This walk way extended around a room known as the "Jail Entrance."

At one time three prisoners had planned to do violence to the deputy sheriff and inquired of Mrs. Ford, the sheriff's wife, if Mr. Ford was at home and upon being told that he was not, asked when he would return. Mrs. Ford answered that she did not know. This conversation did not in any way attract her attention, as such a conversation was usual, Mr. Ford being a popular man with the prisoners.

On the evening of May 29th, 187—, the day of the above conversation, Mr. Ford entered his room to put the prisoners in the cells and Mrs. Ford, as was the custom, stepped to the door to lock him in the "jail room," when, to her horror, she saw one of the prisoners, a man by the name of Dudley, strike Mr. Ford. Dudley was standing on this walk-way and had a small stick of wood attached to his string which was fastened around his wrist.

Mr. Ford lived until the first day of the following January, when he succumbed to the influence of the blow.

Prisoners were afterwards overheard to regret their action, as they had not intended to strike Mr. Ford, but had expected to strike the deputy. Being above him they could not tell which one was there.

So far as we are able to learn this is the only case where a sheriff or any attendant has ever been injured in any way.

At one time the jail itself was surrounded by a high board fence no doubt more to prevent prisoners seeing out and people seeing in than for any means of protection. It seems to have been a common playground for the children of Winchester at that time, as we have been told by a number of citizens of their playing in this enclosure and especially of being able to crawl under the building in playing hide and seek.

At one time when some prisoners had escaped it was thought that they were in hiding under the jail and the story is told that Mr. Eb. Hall, a man who is fearless, was the only one who would agree to crawl under the building and endeavor to find them, and much to his satisfaction and that of his friends, no prisoners were there.

It seems strange that in the records of the commissioner's court no mention has been made whatever concerning the Free and Accepted Masons, Winchester Lodge, No. 56, having built the third story of the building; however, the fact remains that the building, instead of being situated with the length way north and south, it was east and west and the Winchester Lodge No. 56 built the third story the same as the Odd Fellows built the third story of the north building.

The Masons occupied this room until the building was demolished, at which time, March 13, 1883, they sold their interest to the county for the sum of $500.

The condition of the old jail became so wretched from every point of view that the grand jury in 1880 investigated and censured the commissioners so severely for their allowing such a condition to exist in a civilized county that the commissioners took notice of it and at a special meeting of the board employed E. J. Hodgson, architect, January 1st, 1881. Mr. Hodgson was to receive the sum of $600.00 for his services. On the first day of February, 1881, notice was served to contractors and builders that the commissioners would receive sealed proposals in the auditor's office in the town of Winchester, Randolph county, Indiana, until 1 o'clock p. m., Monday, the 4th day of April, for furnishing material and labor required in the erection, construction and completion of a jail and sheriff's residence in the town of Winchester.

On April 1st two of the commissioners, Elias F. Halliday and William R. Coggeshall, met in the commissioner's office, with R. V. Murray, sheriff, and George N. Edger, auditor, and received and opened bids which were as follows:

William H. Meyers and Martin A. Reeder, for entire building	$39,106.00
J. W. Hinkley and James Noms, for entire building	37,500.00
B. F Haugh, for entire building	37,000.00
Aaron G. Campfield, for entire building	34,500.00

After inspecting and examining the bids they let the contract to Mr. Campfield, who entered into contract with the commissioners to faithfully perform the work in a skillful manner agreeable to the plans and specifications as filed in the auditor's office and gave bond for its completion, with Thomas M. Brown, D. E. Hoffman, C. E. Magee and Thomas Ward as bondsmen.

On the same day the commissioners entered into a contract with Martin A. Reeder for Lot No. seven (7) in the southeast square of the town of Winchester for the sum of $2,500.00.

The contracts for the inside work of finishing the jail were let to other parties. The contract for tile floor was let to the United States Encaustic Tile Company for $225.00. The plumbing to J. & F. Niel, $1,350.00. Heating and ventilating to H. M. Crane, Cincinnati, Ohio, for the sum of $1,156.00. The iron work to H. C. Hepburn and William Renschall, of Cleveland, Ohio, for $2,089.00.

The material furnished by Messrs. Hepburn and Renschall was very unsatisfactory. May 16th, 1887, the board met and inspected the plate iron furnished for the floor and decided it was not of the kind and quality as provided for in the contract and specifications and condemned and rejected it and ordered the company not to put any of this iron in the jail building, and Tuesday, May 24th, was set for the time of letting same, on which day they received but one bid, being that of William Fitzmaurice. Mr. Fitzmaurice's bid was for $3,100.00.

"And the board having seen and inspected said bid and after due consideration did reject said bid." Two days later, however, Mr. Fitzmaurice filed another bid, as follows:

"I, William Fitzmaurice, do hereby propose and offer to the board of commissioners of the county of Randolph to furnish all the material and labor and employments mentioned and described in the specifications as therein stated and required subject to all the conditions therein mentioned for the sum of $500.00, to be paid to me when same is done and accepted and approved by the board. Said work to be completed on or before July 1st, 1887." Which bid the commissioners accepted and promised to pay the same when the work was completed and accepted by the board.

The jail, however, was soon completed and was at that time one of the most modern structures in the state. It has since that time borne the test put upon such buildings and at this time, 1914, is satisfactory and a very good building. At different times grand juries have reported repairs of various kinds, which, for the most part, have been made by the county commissioners.

INFIRMARY.

To care for the poor, to relieve the distressed, to sustain the unfortunate, and to aid those who, by misfortune or otherwise, are no longer able to care for themselves, has been a duty of society since the organization of man. No nation has ever been more attentive to this class of unfortunates than the United States, and no state has ever done its part more willingly and heroically than Indiana, and we hope that no county has responded to the needs of its unfortunates with more willingness and a greater degree of consideration than has Randolph county. It is true this county has been governed by state laws and has had to stay within the limits of its means and has no doubt at times seemingly fallen short of what it might otherwise have done, yet the records of the county are clear as to their having always responded to the needs of the poor.

In the organization of the county a building was provided for the courts and offices. The jail was built to care for the criminals, and even a stray pen was maintained to care for the stock that had wandered away from its rightful domain, but no such provision was made for the poor.

Each township had two overseers of the poor appointed and it was the duty of these men to look after the unfortunates in their respective townships in the early history, there being few people, the needs of the people being small and easily furnished, provisions being somewhat plentiful, being charitable and hospitable and generous to a fault, the poor were cared for without any appeal to the public.

The first recorded appointments of the overseers of the poor were made on June 6th, 1820, when we find:

"Richard Beason and Mashack Luallen appointed overseers of the poor in Ward township.

George Whitehouse and Captain Mackley appointed overseers of the poor in Wayne Township for one year.

James Wright and John Balanger appointed overseers of the poor in White River Township for one year.

Ephraim Overman and John Cammack appointed overseers of the poor in Greensfork township for one year.

William Hunt and Jehue Jackson appointed overseers of the poor in West river township for one year."

It is improbable that any appointments had been made previous to this time, as the machinery of government was only just starting at this time.

Most of the people helped at this time lived in Greensfork and White River townships. This can easily be explained because most of the people lived in these townships. When it became necessary to care for an unfortunate person they were farmed out. The first entry we have of this is in the November term of 1826, when it was:

"Ordered that the County Treasurer pay Curtis Clenney the sum of three dollars and 75 cents for five days attending as overseer of the poor to farming out Levi Halle, a pauper in greensfork Township, and George T. Wilson $1.50 for two days attending to the same."

It was further: "Ordered that the County treasurer pay Joseph Halle the sum of six dollars in part for Keeping and maintaining Levi Halle a pauper."

The records have a great many such instances as this where people were farmed out and where people were paid for keeping their own relatives. The county has had a few cases where people were kept by the county for a great many years. The Levi Halle spoken of was kept until he died, February 22, 1830, when it was:

"Ordered that the County treasurer pay Abraham Reins the sum of $2.50 for making a coffin to inter Levi Halle a pauper, who deceased February 22nd, 1830."

Mr. Halle was, we take it, an average pauper of that time and we find that in May, 1829, he was "farmed out at $39.84 to Joseph Halle for the ensuing year."

The bids were taken on paupers and the prices varied from $12.00 or $14.00 a year up to as high as $41.00 or $42.00, depending of course on the amount of help the pauper would be to the man bidding for him.

Another noted case was that of Thomas Morris who was farmed out May 5, 1829, at $17.25 to Stanton Bailey for the ensuing year by Curtis Clenney and Travis Adcock overseers of the poor of Greensfork township. Mr. Morris is still found on the list in 1837 as having been farmed out at $60.00. How much longer he remained we do not know.

A man by the name of James Bailey was put on the list as early as 1827. He was farmed out for the sum of $8.00 to Nancy Bailey, his wife. This was simply a way of keeping a man and his wife and the less decrepit of the two was given the contract of keeping the other, however, in later years, she was also paid for keeping a husband and a son. These people lived in West River township and were kept by the county for a great many years, in fact, in 1854 when the paupers were gathered from over the county and placed in the county infirmary we find, "paupers from West River township are Nancy Bailey, Hiram Bailey and James Bailey." In June these same people were re-committed to their township which was Nettle Creek and were farmed out to Hugh Bailey for the sum of $150.00 per year. We do not know how long they remained dependents on the county but we find that in September, 1859, they were returned to the poor asylum from Nettle Creek township.

We mention these cases, not with the idea of exploiting the unfortunate condition of any special one but to show the great lengths of time from which the county has at time extended this class of protection. In fact, there is a man living in the county today, 1914, who has been receiving public aid since 1855 or for a period of almost sixty years. The county, however, is only doing its duty, and it is well that the county is able to so well take care of its unfortunates. Conditions in some parts of the state were such that the legislature was moved to pass a law in 1848 compelling counties to provide public places wherein the unfortunate poor might have care and with this end in view, December 6th, 1850, it was:

"Ordered by the Board that Robert Irvin Abraham Adams and Peter S. Miller be and they are hereby appointed Special Comrs to select and purchase a farm as near the County seat as can be procured taking into consideration price and quality, etc., the said farm so procured shall be kept and dedicated to the support of the poor of said County. Said Commissioners shall make report of their proceedings in the premises to the next term of this Board."

March 7, 1851, it was: "Ordered by the Board that William A. Peele and David Heaston be and they are hereby appointed Trustees to Superintend and farm out the poor farm of the County to some suitable person and to see that the Paupers are Received on the said farm on the 1st monday in may next & properly provided for and make report of their proceeding in the premises to next term of their Board."

March 28th Messrs. Peele and Heaston were authorized to procure horses and wagon and necessary stock and utensils for farming the poor farm of said county, as was always the case were to make report at the next meeting. This they proceeded to do by buying a "horse beast" of Acil Stone for $50.00, a "horse beast" of Samuel Ludy for $59.93, a "waggon" of Henry Lipp for $65.00, "goods, wares and merchandise" of Best & Way, $46.76, the same of Thos. Ward, $32.58, the same of D. J. Cottom, $8.76, "goods" of Zimri Moffett $3.46, plow of Pleasant Diggs, $10.50, harness of Sol Yunker, $7.12, "single trees" John Way $2.75, chairs, Lewis Walker $10.00, harrow, Thomas Butterworth $1.75, oats, James Forsythe $4.00, tinware James O. Dormer

$2.48, potatoe plants David Wysong, 75 cents, bed steads William Allen $47.50, necessary articles William H. Fitzgerald $90.17 and so the poor farm was started and equipped.

William Fitzgerald was selected as the first keeper and his term was to expire March 1, 1852.

At this time an inventory was made of the property when it was found that the county had property to the value of $1,813.10. We are inclined to think, however, that some of the property was appraised rather high as we find one table, $10.00; three tubs, $4.50, and other things in proportion.

At the end of that year Mr. Fitzgerald reports having thirteen inmates and "here further reports that none of said paupers are able to perform labor, being all very old, very young, weak minded or diseased and that he has realized nothing from their industry." He further reports that expenses for maintaining his own family and said paupers to be $214.72½.

There was no building of any consequence on this farm. The commissioners met on the 10th day of July, 1852, for the purpose of receiving specifications and bids for the building of a poor house for the accommodation of the paupers when the following order was made:

"Ordered by the Board that the following plan be and the same is hereby adopted by the Board for the Building of a House on the poor Asylum of said County for the accommodation of the paupers at said Asylum. The house shall be sixty feet long and forty feet wide and twelve feet high. A main Hall ten feet wide and sixty feet long through the center of the building And a second hall through the center of the building from east to west six feet wide and forty feet long, etc. And it is therefore further ordered by the Board that Thomas Best or Asahel Stone be and they are hereby appointed to draw the draft and furnish specifications for the erection of said building and furnish the same to this Board on Saturday the 17th instant by 12 O'clock."

Mr. Stone made the plans and was paid $10.62½ for the same.

In March, 1853, the building was built by a Joseph Johnson and was accepted by the commissioners December 20, 1852, at which time, however, they reserved $50.00 until the "painting and whitewashing" is completed.

In 1853 Mr. Fitzgerald reports having sixteen inmates, to wit: 7 white males, 3 white females, 2 black males, 4 black females. He further reports that: "all said paupers in said asylum are either from age, infirmity or youth unable to perform much manual labor."

The first loss of the county by fire occurred on the 25th of January, 1854, when the "poor asylum" was destroyed. The commissioners found "that the paupers of said County are in a destitute condition" and ordered that the township overseers of the poor be instructed to care for the paupers from the several townships. White River and Greensfork townships were the only townships having inmates in the asylum at this time. For some reason the commissioners ordered: "that the personal property appertaining to the poor asylum and belonging to said County be exposed to public sale to the highest bidder on the 3rd day of March, next, on the poor farm of said County" and the business of the county infirmary was practically closed for a year. They, however, proceeded, immediately, to the construction of a new building and March 11, 1854, Thomas Best was "employed to make a draft and specifications for the Building an Asylum on the poor farm." Mr. Best was authorized to visit several asylums and to "adopt a Most Convenient plan for the accommodation of the inmates and for the family of the Superintendant." The auditor was instructed to advertise for sealed proposals at the next term of the commissioners' court on said building. This duty was performed and on April 17th the commissioners received sealed proposals for the building and let the contract to Joseph Johnson for the sum of $5,950.00 upon condition that the building be completed by May 1, 1855. Mr. Johnson, evidently, did not succeed very well in his building as on May 7, 1855, the commissioners met in a special meeting: "visiting the poor asylum of said County and receiving said asylum and superintending the reception of the paupers from several townships in said County and to do and transact such other and further business as the interests of the said County may require. Present, the Honorable Andrew Devoss, George W. Vanderburg and Nathaniel Kemp, Esqs., members of said Board and after visiting the said asylum they find the same unfinished and do not receive the same."

The matter continued with more or less quibbling for almost a year and finally Ernestus Strohm was "appointed to furnish material to complete the County asylum of said County as near as can be done on the original plan and to be governed by the specifications if they can be obtained." Mr. Strohm completed the work.

Final settlement was made with Mr. Johnson September 6, 1856. The following entry concerning which is made:

"Now at this time the Board of County Comrs. settle with Joseph Johnson and it is approved by and between the Board of County Comrs and the said Joseph Johnson that in consequence of said Joseph Johnson indemnifying said Board with bond and security approved by said Board to hold said County harmless of supposed leins filed against said Johnsons dues or claims against said County, and said Bond being by said Johnson given with Jere Smith his security the Board Order the Auditor to Issue to said Johnson, Orders to the amount of two hundred and eighty six dollars and thirty four cents, the Balance due said Johnson after deducting the amount necessary to finish the said Johnson undertaking with said County," etc.

This building served its purpose with more or less efficiency for a number of years but as the population of the county increased the needs of a better equipment at the poor farm correspondingly increased. Matters went on in their usual way with more inmates being committed from year to year and no additional accommodations being provided for.

During the administration of Mr. Hall matters became such that it attracted the attention of the public and grand jury after grand jury reported after having visited the institution that the needs were wholly inadequate to the necessity. Public pressure finally became so strong that in 1899 the commissioners, William Horn, Adam Slonaker and Thomas H. Clark, contracted with W. F. Kaufman, architect, Richmond, Indiana, January 19, 1899, "to furnish a complete set of drawings, specifications and all detail drawing requisite and necessary to erect a County Infirmary on the present infirmary farm in Randolph County, State of Indiana." Mr. Kaufman was also to act as the superintendent of the erection of such building. Mr. Kaufman furnished the plans and specifications which were adopted by the board and left in the auditor's office for the use of persons bidding on said proposed work which was to be completed on or before October 1, 1899. Mr. Kaufman evidently finished his plans as he was paid $600.00 on the same on March 9, 1899. Just why all bids were not received sooner and contract let is not known but it remains a fact that they were not received and opened until March 19, at which time the following bids were received: Joseph Shetterly, $34,373.00; J. M. Hagerman, $36,290.00; A. G. Campfield, $34,900.00, and W. H. Kreep, $34,950.00. The bid of Mr. Shetterly was considered best and was accepted and contract was awarded to him. The time of completion was extended to November 1, 1899.

Much dissatisfaction arose during the construction of the building as to the quality of the material and the work that was allowed to be put into the building. Many additional items of expense were also added, making the final cost of the building somewhere near $40,000.00. The building is, however, splendidly arranged and with the additions and conveniences, that have, in recent years, been added, it is now considered a model infirmary.

It should no longer be called a "poor farm" but should rather be called "home for the poor." With the character of the superintendent and matron of recent years it has indeed been a home for the unfortunates who have found it necessary to be there. It would be a shame for it to be otherwise in such a county as ours with its wealth, intelligence and high degree of society.

In the meantime, January 15, 1855, Mr. Simon Gray had been appointed to succeed Mr. Fitzgerald as the superintendent of the asylum.

It is interesting to know at this time that bids were taken and that the position of Superintendent of the poor asylum was let to the bidder, usually the lowest, who suited the commissioners best. Mr. Gray took the place on the following conditions:

"I do hereby agree to superintend and take care of the poor asylum of Randolph County for one year for four hundred dollars, Furnish 2 horses and A wagon and gears and Six cows, Myself and Wife and one girl ten years old and one other woman part of the time, board ourselves and stock till the first of May, 3 beds, 6 chairs, dishes sufficient for our own use and other apparatus too tedious to mention." Signed, Simon Gray.

Whereupon the commissioners entered into contract with Mr. Gray. He giving bond in the sum of fifteen hundred dollars for his faithful performance as such superintendent. January 21, 1856, Mr. Gray submitted two propositions to the county commissioners, the first being:

I do hereby agree to take care of the Randolph County poor asylum for one year and furnish three horses and gears, one waggon, 5 milk cows, Myself and wife and one girl eleven years old for $400.00, furnish our own bedding and "clothes and the increase of all stock to be mine." The second was: "I will furnish three horses and gears and one Waggon 5 milk cows and 12 or 15 head of sheep and let you (the County) have all the increase and profits of all the Stock and furnish labor as before for the sum of $450.00." The last proposition was accepted by the Commissioners. Mr. Gray entered into contract, giving bond as before, with Thomas W. Coats as his security.

The next year the Commissioners employed Jeremiah Cox as superintendent after they had examined several bids which were submittd. Mr. Cox submitted the following proposal: "to render his aid and wife and four children, two boys, oldest 10 years, youngest nine, two girls, oldest seven years, youngest five years old and to find clothing and bedding for the comfort of his family and to furnish the use of two work horses. Harness and a two horse Waggon, One two horse plow, one Shovel plow, and the use of four milk cows with the increase to be left on the farm and the use of one cook stove with other cooking utensils all the above mentioned for the term of one year for the sum of $200.00, prosal made this 3 day of January, 1857." Signed, Jeremiah Cox.

The commissioners entered into a contract with Mr. Cox, he giving his bond for $1,000.00 with Silas Gray and Nathan Cox as security.

Evidently the commissioners begun to think the cost of the poor farm was unwarranted as in December, 1857, they ordered the auditor to make a report of "the whole cost of taking care of paupers of said County at the County asylum for the years A. D. 1855, 1856, 1857, including physicians salary, superintendents salary, and incedental expenses appertaining to this end." They further ordered the auditor: "Ordered by the Board that the Auditor be and he is hereby required to give notice by having publication made for three weeks successively in the Randolph County Journal of the letting of the County Asylum for the next in coming year to the lowest responsible bidder, which letting will be at the Court House in Winchester on Friday the 15th day of January A. D. 1858. The Board reserving the right to decide of the manner proposed, the amount each bidder will undertake to furnish, etc., etc., or perform the duties required of him according to his particular bid."

These bids were received January 15, 1858, and the commissioners entered into a contract with Mr. Thomas McConochy, Mr. McConochy giving bond with Elias Kizer having "appeared in open Court and offered himself as security for the performance of said Thomas McConochy." Mr. McConochy was to receive "the sum of two hundred dollars and seventy-five cents to do all the necessary labor in the house and on the farm, without any expense from the County, to furnish two horses and gears, and one wagon and one milk cow and furnish my beds and bedding for my own family my family in number is four, myself, Wife and two children, one boy eight years old and a girl eleven years old."

During the first year of Mr. McConochy's term an incident occurs which shows the spirit of the early Society of Friends. The minutes of this transaction are self-explanatory and show the spirit with which that society practiced the teachings of the Master.

"This Memorandum is to certify I, the undersigned, on behalf of the poor Committee of White Water Monthly meeting of the Society of Friends in the County of Wayne and State of Indiana do hereby Obligate myself to pay to Thomas McConochy Superintendent of Randolph County poor house on or before the 1st day of 2nd Mo. (February) 1859 The sum of Seventy Dollars, being for the purpose of assisting to keep and support Samuel Davidson who is now an inmate of said poor house for Two years past & which two years will expire at that time, and if said Davidson should not live to the end of the time above specified a deduction at the rate of thirty five dollars a year is to be made from this obligation for the unexpired time.

8 mo. 13th 1858. JEREMIAH HADLEY.

"And it is further agreed and confirmed between us that the said poor committee above referred to is to pay yearly for the same purpose to the superintendent of the above poor house the sum of thirty five dollars, to be paid on the 1st day of the 2nd month of each that said Davidson in said poor House after the expiration of the time above mentioned in the above obligation.

8th mo. 13, 1858. JEREMIAH HADLEY,
THOMAS MCCONOCHY Supt."

Mr. Davidson died during the year and Mr. Hadley paid $70.00 to Mr. McConochy who acknowledged the receipt of the same March 9, 1859.

Mr. McConochy was employed again January, 1860, for the period of one year. He was to receive $350.00 but in addition to his regular work agreed to "re-roof the barn, re-set all the fences on the farm that needs it & clear up a piece of ground in the south field on the west side of the State road, & put gates where they are needed and make a blind ditch eighteen rods long in the field east of the house."

December 6th, 1860, the commissioners received the proposition to superintend the poor asylum from Elias Kizer. Mr. Kizer had been a very prominent man in the history of the county for some years, having served as road supervisor, road viewer, juror and county commissioner seven years. That Mr. Kizer was "onto the game" and understood public pulse is shown by the character of the proposal that he submitted to the commissioners. Evidently Mr. Kizer knew some of the unfavorable conditions existing at the time which he hoped to rectify. His proposition upon which he was hired is such that we feel justified in giving it in full:

"Elias Kizer on proposition to Superintend Poor Asylum &c.

Winchester, Dec. 6th, 1860.

To the honorable board of County Commissioners:

I propose to undertake the Poor asylum & farm for the coming year in Randolph County Indiana. I will furnish team, wagon, plows, & hands sufficient to do all the work on the farm & in the house, & not keep any more hands than are really needed; the family shall be small so as to make the expenses light, as possible on the County. As for my extras on my table I will account for them to the County outside of what the paupers have to live on. I will be accountable for all neglect on my part. Likewise I will make all the shoes or have them made for the paupers, the County just paying for the leather, mending likewise, And I will keep the farm in good repair, & leave it in the same. This you may be the judges of yourselfes. I will do all the dealing that is necessary for the use of the paupers, & keep a correct account & report to you every three months if required. N. B. I will furnish my own beds and clothing.

This labor is worth five hundred dollars per year, but if you think it too much, anything between that & three hundred I will be satisfied with. I leave this with you for I think you to be reasonable men & know what is reasonable & wright, & if I don't perform the labor according to contract, I don't want anything for it. I do this for the good of the County.

N. B. I will give no meals victuals away, uless I charge myself with it at 25 cts per meal. Thiss I will account to the County for; this is wright and just.

This I submit to your honorable body.

(Signed) ELIAS KIZER.

We the Board of County Commissioners accept the proposition of Elias Kizer. He is therefore appointed to superintend the poor asylum & farm for one year commencing Feb. 1st 1861 and ending Jan. 21st 1869.

Read and signed in open court and the Board adjourned till Saturday morning. usual hour.

H. K. WRIGHT,
C. F. ALEXANDER."

Mr. Kizer made good and was again employed in 1862 under the proposition that, "I will superintend the whole matter that I have done for the sum of $500.00 for the year and of course do the best I can for the County. I will make the expenses as low as possible, doing the land justice, also the paupers." Mr. Kizer was again employed in 1863, this time for $550.00. The County to pay for medical attendance and medicine. Mr. Kizer was again employed in 1864 for the sum of $600.00. "The County to pay for all repairs and Smith work, furnish plows and farming implements, Kizer to pay the Doctors bills except in extreme cases and the County to pay for all medicine. The farm to be kept in as good order or better than it now is." Again in January, 1865, Mr. Kizer was employed for the year for the sum of $700.00. This time he went into the following agreement: "I will do the Very best for the County and the Paupers leaving all I Make on the Farm at the end of the Year Except What I take to the farm of my own property."

The Commissioners were called together January 8, 1866, to consider, among other things, "proposals to take charge of the poor asylum for the ensuing year." We do not know how many proposals were offered or by whom but the one accepted was made by Jonathan Edwards for the sum of $500.00. The county, "to pay the expenses of all necessary repairs Blacksmithing, making or re-setting fences, making rails, and necessary to protect crops, etc. Said Edwards to keep up all the repairs of his own property at his own expense." Mr. Edwards filed bond for $500.00 with Hamilton Edwards as security. Mr. Edwards was again employed in 1867 for $500.00.

Competition seems to have been lively for 1868 as proposals were received from Jonathan Edwards, James Shaw, John W Bragg, Nathan Fiddler, Wm. A. W. Daly, Andrew J. Aker, Daniel McConochy. The proposal of Jonathan Edwards was accepted after. "the Board having seen and inspected the several proposals." Mr. Edwards this year was to receive $500.00 the same as the year before. The special December term, December 30, 1868 proposals were received from Amos Hall, Joseph Kemp, Joseph Kelly, Nathan Fiddler, Daniel Barnes, David McConochy, Urias Davis, Sampson Summers and Charles M. Stine, the proposal of Mr. Hall was accepted.

Mr. Hall's contract was more liberal than any that had preceded and for the first time in the history of the county the county agreed to furnish the superintendent, "with the assistance of a Matron for said Asylum to assist in the management of affairs pretaining exclusively to the health and comfort of the paupers and the preparation of their food and who is to perform her duties under the direction of the Superintendent and to be included with, and considered as a member of his family." The last condition was one very easily met from the fact that the superintendent's wife serves as the matron as spoken of in the contract.

Mr. Hall served the county for a great many years. In 1873 he received the sum of $800.00 for one year from the 1st day of February, 1874, with the privilege of keeping the same for one year more on the same terms and conditions. Mr. Hall did this and in 1875 was hired outright for two years from the 1st day of February, 1876. Mrs. Hall again serving as matron and was to receive $130.00 a year.

In December, 1877, proposals were again submitted by Amos Hall, Madison Hill, Wm. Smith, H. T. Study, Lemuel Grimes, Marion Harter, Samuel Witter, C. M. Stine, James Edwards, Samuel Bright. The proposal of Mr. Hill was considered "the best and most satisfactory bid for such services and was accepted." He was to receive $650.00 for one year from the 1st day of February, 1878. Mrs. Hill also to serve as matron. Mr. Hill served for one year only when Mr. Hall was again employed for one year from the 1st day of February, 1879, with the privilege of keeping the same for one year more for $600.00 per year.

The commissioners at this time attempted to stop an abuse which had crept into the management of the poor farm when they put into Mr. Hall's agreement, "that in no case shall the paupers or inmates of said asylum be taken from the farm to perform labor for others." Mr. Hall entered into contract and gave Simon Ramsey and John R. Philips as security on his bond.

Mr. Hall was again chosen in December, 1880, for $700.00 per year from the 1st day of February, 1881 with the privilege of keeping the same one year more on the same terms. Mr. Hall again contracted in December, 1882, for $750.00 per year for one year with the privilege of keeping it two years. December 10, 1884, Mr. Hall again contracted at $800.00 for one year with the privilege of one year longer on the same terms. December, 1886, Mr. Hall contracted for $800.00 per year for one year with the privilege of continuing the contract for one year on the same terms. Mr. Hall again contracted January 8, 1889 for $800.00, payable quarterly for one year with the privilege of continuing one year longer or until February 1, 1891, at which time Mr. Hall is again employed under the same conditions as before for one year with the privilege of continuing until February 1, 1893.

On the 10th day of December, 1892, the commissioners received proposals from Henry T. Study, Amos Hall, Uriah Davis, Elisha Thompson and after due consideration accepted the bid of Henry T. Study and entered into contract with him for the sum of $800.00. Mr. Study was to "take possession of said poor asylum on the 1st day of February, 1893, and it was mutually agreed and understood that this contract shall begin and be in force from and after the 1st day of February, 1893, and shall continue in force until the first day of February, 1894." Mr. Study was also given the privilege of extending the time one year.

December 12, 1894, Messrs. Study and Hall again put bids before the commissioners, Mr. Hall's bid being accepted. Mr. Hall was again employed for $800.00 per annum for one year with the privilege of continuing one year and executed his bond with T. F. Moorman, J. W. Macy and Ed I. Brown security. Mr. Hall again contracted December 15, 1898, for $800.00 for one year with the privilege of continuing two, or until February 1, 1901. Mr. Hall, however, was not permitted to serve the entire time of his contract as death relieved him of his long service to the county and on the morning of February 15, 1900, the last respects were paid to him by his many friends and on that day the commissioners made the following entry: "No business was transacted to enter of record and the Board adjourned until tomorrow morning on account of the funeral services of Amos Hall, superintendent of the County Infirmary." Mr. Study was selected in Mr. Hall's place to take possession the 6th of March, 1900, and to continue until the 31st day of August, 1901.

Mr. Study was again employed June 18, 1901, for $978.00 for a period of two years, the contract to end the 31st day of August, 1903.

June 1, 1903, the commissioners began a new policy of no longer taking bids or proposals but elected otherwise. "The Board proceeded to the election of Superintendent of County Infirmary. Roy Ford receiving the majority of votes cast was declared elected as such Superintendent for a period of two years and that he received a sum of $978.00 per year for the services as such Superintendent and also the services of his wife as matron of said infirmary." Mr. Ford, however, remained but one term, as on the 4th of June, 1905, the commissioners entered into contract with Henry C. Hull for a period of two years beginning September 1, 1905, at $1,200.00 per year.

Mr. Hull continued as superintendent until March 1, 1914. Mr. Hull, it is said, is the only superintendent who has ever been able to make the poor farm self-sustaining.

March 1, 1914, Mr. Hull was succeeded by Henry Judy, who had been elected January 1, 1914, for a period of four years at the consideration of $1,500.00 per annum.

INFIRMARY.

The matter of medical aid for the poor of the county has been one that has attracted a great deal of attention and been given a great deal of serious thought throughout the entire history of the county.

In the earlier day bids were received on this the same as the other care of the poor and oftentimes it was not the skill or the success of the physician that determined the matter but rather the man that had the lowest bid. Too often the pauper has been considered a public care to be gotten rid of with the least possible attention and expense. Thanks to civilization that time has passed and today the unfortunates receive the same medical care as those of their more fortunate brothers.

One of the first contracts let in the county was in 1857 when Dr. George W. Bruce was "employed as a physician for the County Asylum and Physician for County Jail for the ensuing year at $25.00 per year as per contract. Said physician to find his own medicine and drugs."

In 1858 Mr. John E. Beverly was appointed "physician and surgeon" for county asylum and for county jail and the poor of White River Township for one year from this date, the said Beverly to furnish out of his own cost all medicine, ointment, drugs, oils, etc., for the sum of one hundred dollars for the term aforesaid.

In 1861 Dr. A. F. Teele was given the contract at $50.00 per year, he to furnish all medicine, drugs, etc.

Matters went on in this way until 1870, the law was changed whereby the paupers were to have the physician of their own choice which worried some of the county commissioners quite a little. It must be said, to the everlasting disgrace of some of these men, especially about 1876, that instead of considering the bill of physicians or any bill relative to the poor as they would any other bill the commissioners upon the insistence of one of their number would refuse to allow the bill of the physician. It is said on good authority that when a bill was presented these commissioners, this commissioner would say to the others, "now let's each one of us mark to see how much we shall pay," whereupon each would go into one corner of the room with his back towards the others, for fear they might watch him, and would mark some amount considerably below what the physicians had asked. This of course naturally led to abuses and people making claims would put their claims considerably higher than they otherwise would be because they knew of the unbusinesslike habits of the commissioners at that time. But this custom died with the expiration of this man's term of office and since that time this branch of the business has been conducted along business-like principles.

Some of the men who have acted in the capacity of county physicians have been: J. J. Evans, Bruce & Harrison, H. P. Franks, N. D. Berry, H. H. Yergin, J. S. Berry, David F. Orr, A. H. Farquhar, J. S. Blair, Pleasant Hunt, Aaron G. Rogers, W. A. Rickard, James V King, T. W. Botkin, G. W. Bruce, C. M. Kelley, Franks & Trent, E. T. Bailey, John F. Kinney, J. L. McShirley, R. Bosworth, G. C. Baldwin, N. E. Ross, J. L. Conti, Granville Reynard, Cyrus Cox, Amos R. Ballard, L. E. White, James K. White, D. M. Carter, W. D. Simmons, W. S. Shoemaker, A. F. Huddleston, G. C. Markle, J. H. Moroney and E. W. Rine.

Another interesting item concerning the care of the paupers has been the burial expenses; this expense has constantly increased. In 1843 coffins cost $2.50; 1847, $5.00; 1848, $6.50; 1857, $8.00 and so on until $30 at the present time.

ORPHANS' HOME.

The responsibility of caring for the unfortunate poor has been one of the greatest ever placed upon local government. This responsibility carries with it the caring for both adults and children. Adults being more or less able to care for themselves at least being past the formative period of life are not so difficult to care for as are the children. Indeed, the task of caring for and rearing the children of the unfortunate poor has been a Herculean one.

The state appreciated that it must be responsible for the intellectual and moral elements of the children as well as the mere physical. Children have been cared for by the state in two ways. First: By being bound out to serve as apprentices, which we shall speak of later on, and second: by being cared for until homes could be found for them. Formerly, these children were kept at the infirmary, under all the evil influences that would necessarily arise from associating with such an indiscriminate people as would naturally be found there. It must be expected that all classes of people would be found in the county infirmary. The county cared for these children the best they could under the circumstances but no one has ever claimed that any of the finer elements of society could possibly be inculcated in children under such circumstances.

The commissioners, during the course of years, recognized this and established a home for the children to which the children of indigent poor were taken. Mrs. John D. Howard was selected by them as the matron. This was a wonderful step in advance of what had been done prior to that time but it remained for a citizen of the county to present the final solution of the problem and strange to say the problem was solved by a man who had no immediate responsibilities toward childhood. This gentleman, Mr. James Moorman had, long before his death, determined to provide a home for children and wrote his will in accordance with that plan. Mr. Moorman became incapable for caring for his business affairs long before his death. The will was opened by the judge of the circuit court and the policy of Mr. Moorman anticipated. This led to the establishment of what is known as the James Moorman Orphans' Home, provided for in the following will:

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF JAMES MOORMAN.

"Item 1. I give and devise the North east Quarter of section twenty four (24) in Township Twenty (20) North, of Range thirteen. (13) east and all that part of the south east quarter of section thirteen (13) in said Township Twenty North of Range Thirteen (13) east which is south of the Indianapolis and Bellefontaine Railroad and west of the gravel pit owned by the town of Winchester Randolph County, Indiana said lands lying and being in Randolph County, Indiana to the Board of Directors of the Orphans' Home of Randolph County, Indiana in trust, however, for the purposes hereinafter set forth and I hereby appoint the following Board of Directors of the Orphan's Home to be located on lands above bequeathed, Nathan Cadwallader, of Union City, John A. Moorman, of Farmland, Davis Kitselman of Ridgeville, Clements F. Alexander of Spartansburg and Nathan Reed of Winchester and all of said Board of Randolph County and State of Indiana.

Said Orphan's Home to be under their care and management or the care management of their successors in office said Home being for the benefit of the Orphans of Randolph County that are under the age of fourteen years, children not born in the County being required to be two years a resident of the County before they can become an inmate of the Home and it is my will and I hereby direct that said Board of Directors or their successors in office retain said lands and premises intact as above described and that no part thereof be sold or otherwise disposed of and so improve and use the same as shall best secure the benefit of a Home thereon and a support and education therefrom to the Orphans of Randolph County under the age of fourteen years. I append further on in said Will certain general Rules for the government of said Home, leaving however to the above named Board of Directors, Nathan Cadwallader, John A. Moorman, Davis Kitselman, Clements F. Alexander and Nathan Reed on their organization the adoption of such special rules as do not conflict with General Rules.

Item 2. I further give devise and bequeath to the above named Board of Directors and their successors in office, as a Trust Fund to be used as hereinafter directed the sum of Ten Thousand ($10,000.00) Dollars. It is my will and I hereby direct that said sum of Ten Thousand ($10,000.00) Dollars be loaned on real estate secured by first mortgage on lands showing clear title by abstract said lands to be of three times the value of the loan secured thereby. Said money to be loaned on farms if possible but if in cities then only on business rooms, the ground value of which equals the loan and the borrower to have a Fire Insurance policy in a Company designated by said Board of Directors of the Home as their Mortgage Interest may appear the Interest on said loans to be paid semi-annually at such place as mortgagee designates to the Board of Directors or Treasurer thereof of their successors in office and it is my will that the Interest that may arise from the Ten Thousand Dollars be applied for the support and education of the Orphans of Randolph County under the age of fourteen years as hereinafter directed and it is my will that said lands as described in Item numbered One (1) be forever retained for the purposes and uses therein set forth and that said premises be held and known as the James Moorman Orphan's Home of Randolph County.

Item 3. I further give and bequeath to the Board of Directors of said Orphan's Home and their successors in office.—All judgments that I may own or hold against any person or persons or corporations at the time of my death, said judgments to be held collected and used under the same restrictions and regulations and for the same purposes as provided for in Item Two of this Will in regard to the loaning of the "Ten Thousand Dollar Fund."

Item 4. I give devise and bequeath to said Trustees or Board of Directors of the Orphans' Home and any successors in office all notes secured by Mortgage that I may own at the time of my death, said notes to be collected and such of the proceeds as in the judgment of said Board are necessary to furnish the furniture and outfit essential in rendering the Home comfortable for the orphans shall be so used to purchase said out-fit and such other portion of said funds as may not be used, I direct the same to be loaned on first mortgage & to be used in some manner and for same purposes as set forth in Item numbered Two of this Will providing however that when a school building is erected it be done from this fund.

Item 5. In case of a vacancy in said Board of Directors of the Orphans' Home said vacancy shall be filled by the remaining members of the Board provided there be more than one remaining member if there be but one remaining member he shall appoint two and the Judge of the Circuit Court of which Randolph County is a part shall appoint the remaining two if the (re) be no remaining member of the Board the Circuit Judge as aforesaid may appoint two members of the Board and they after duly qualifying shall fill the remaining vacancies.

Item 6. It is my desire and I hereby direct that said Board of Direcors of the Orphans' Home and their successors in office appoint a suitable man of known moral character & not addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors and Tobacco as Superintendent of said Home to rent the farm and care for the proceeds thereof and report the same to the Board of Directors, said proceeds to be used for the benefit of the Orphan's Home. The said Board of Directors shall have power to remove said Superintendent in case he prove incompetent or unfit otherwise for said position of Superintendent.

Item 7. It is my will and I hereby direct that the Orphans of said Home be put under the care and education of a prudent female of good character who shall reside on the premises and that said orphans be taught Reading, Writing, Arithmetic and Geography as also Music and I direct that a suitable building be erected for educational purposes, it being also understood that Physiology Drawing Book-keeping and other usefull branches are desirable if time and opportunity offers to add such branches to the list. I desire that said orphans be trained to habits of industry and strict morality and to that end desire that such light work as they may perform be assigned them when out of the school room and further desire and forbid that any one but those of good moral character be employed upon the farm or about the buildings and that as one who uses profane language or tobacco or intoxicating liquor shall be an inmate or employee on said premises.

Item 8. In case of applicants for the Benefit of the Orphans Home it is my Will and I hereby direct that the guardian or other person who may have legal custody of such orphans be required in legal form to release all care & control of uch orphans to the Board of Directors of the Orphans' Home until said orphan arrives at the age of fourteen years and it is hereby made the duty of the Superintendent under instructions from the Board of Directors to see that these provisions of this Will is complied with before the applicant is admitted.

Item 9. In the government of the orphan's Home it is my will that only kind and persuasive measures be used to restrain and reclaim offenders and when such measures shall fail of a reformatory effect that the matter be referred to the Board of Directors who may proceed by proper means to ascertain the truth of such charge as are brought against such offenders and dismiss said offenders or otherwise dispose of the case as the best interest of the home may require, it is my will and I hereby direct that no harsh or unkind measures be used in the management of said Orphans' Home, and if anyone connected with the management of said Home be guilty or suspected of improper conduct in the management of said Orphan's Home, I hereby direct that charges be preferred against such offender or suspected offender and that the Board of Directors proceed to a thorough investigation of the case and if charges are true that said offender or offenders be immediately dismissed and the vacancy supplied by other parties if the case be other wise to deal with the parties as the best interest of the Orphan's Home may require.

Item 10. It is my will that the Orphans at the Home be supplied with good and substantial food suited to the season and that they be supplied with good plain clothing and that in winter it be warm and adopted to the age and physical condition of the wearer but that in no case there shall be a uniform or peculiarity of dress that shall mark them as inmates of the Home or objects of charity for I would not that anyone have occasion by look or remark to "offend one of the least of these" little ones.

I further desire that every assistance be given the inmates to find good homes and suitable employments when they arrive at the age of fourteen years that the good influence of the home may not be lost when they come in contact with the outer world and that the orphans may at all times feel when sick or in need of advice that they have a friend in the Superintendent, Matron and Directors of the Home to whom they can with confidence appeal.

Item 11. It is my will and I hereby direct that no part of the ten thouand dollars made to the Board of Directors of the Orphans' Home in my second bequest be used except the interest thereon and that it be kept loaned at the highest legal rate of interest attainable. And should any other persons desire to add to this fund on the terms therein set forth or contribute to the aid of the home for any other good purpose it is my will that it be accepted and used as the donor may desire providing always that nothing be accepted except it comply with the standard of good morality.

Item 12. It is my will that said Board of Directors of the Orphans' Home so far as practicable in all cases make special written contracts with such persons as it shall be necessary to employ at and about said home and giving no more than a reasonable compensation for such services and in all cases where such services can be rendered by a female and suitable females can be employed it is my desire that such have the preference in the employ of the Home. I believe females to be more in sympathy and better calculated to care for and control the children and as this is a Labor of Love I shall expect the Board to serve without pay, trusting that the conscienceness of having done a good work will be to them sufficient remuneration and may the Blessed Master direct them in the work.

Item 13. I will and direct that if thought advisable that my bequest of Ten Thousand Dollars be paid to said Directors of the Orphans Home by the assignment by the Executors of my last Will and Testament to said Directors of the Orphans Home which mortgage notes belonging to my estate as may be acceptable to said Directors of the Orphans' Home."

"Item 21. I further give and devise to the Board of Directors of the Orphans' Home of Randolph County, in trust for the use of said Home, the sum of five thouand dollars, to be known as the "Orphans' Home Improvement Fund," said sum to be invested in mortgage loans of one year's duration and at such time or times as the demands of the institution may require more or larger buildings. It is my will that first the accrued interest on the said sum of five thousand dollars be used and after that such portion of the principal sum as may be deemed proper for the good of the Orphans' Home.

Item 24. I hereby give and bequeath to the Board of Directors of the Orphans' Home all stock or other interest that I may own in the First National Bank of Union City, Indiana, at time of my death and the proceeds thereof to be loaned on mortgage security, said fund to be known as the 'Orphans' Home Library Fund,' the interest only to be used to purchase such books, maps and scientific apparatus as the wisdom of the board may direct providing, however, that if there be an excess above the outlay for books, etc., at end of each year that said surplus may be added to the principal fund or the ($10,000) ten thousand dollars, as the board may select. I hereby grant to said board of directors the privilege in case said Home have sufficient accommodations therefor that when an orphan arrives at the age of fourteen that a contract, if desired by the orphan, be made, to remain until said orphan is sixteen years of age, upon such terms as may be agreed upon by said orphan and said board of directors.

CODICIL NO. 1.

Item No. 1. I give and bequeath to the Board of Directors of the Orphans' Home of Randolph County, Indiana, the further sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000.00) for the benefit of said home and to be invested as set forth in Item number two my will of October 19, 1881. Said sum of twenty thousand dollars to be divided to the different funds, as follows, to-wit: Ten thousand dollars to the permanent fund, Eight Thousand Dollars to the Building fund & Two Thousand Dollars to the Library Fund & each to be loaned and used as set forth in my last Will and Testament of October 19, 1881.

Item No. 3. Having re-affirmed my last will of October 19, 1881, I desire further to say that recent conveyances by me made of real estate for nominal sums having been criticised by beneficiaries of this will. It is my will and desire that if any beneficiaries of this will or codicil shall attempt or encourage anyone to attempt to set aside any conveyance of real estate heretofore or hereafter by me made,—such beneficiary shall receive from my estate the sum of One hundred Dollars in lieu of the benefit intended and their intendent benefit or inheritance shall be by my executors tranferred to the Directors of the Orphan's Home of Randolph Co., Ind. & to be added to the permanent fund of said Home.

CODICIL NO. 3.

Item Three (3). I desire to increase the number of Directors of Orphans' Home to seven instead of five and add the names of Joseph R. Jackson & Thomas F. Moorman as the new members."

Winchester, October 8th, 1888.

"Pursuant to the terms and certain items of the Will of James Moorman, deceased, establishing and endowing the James Moorman Orphans' Home Randolph County, Indiana, appointing a Board of Directors therefor. The following named persons, named in the said Will as such Board met in the Court House in Winchester, Indiana on Monday at 10 o'clock A. M. October 8th, 1888, towit: John A. Moorman, Davis S. Kitselman, Clement F. Alexander, Nathan Reed, Joseph R. Jackson and Thomas F. Moorman, and each of the above named persons thereupon took and subscribed to an oath to faithfully perform their duties as members of the Board of Directors of the James Moorman Orphans' Home according to the terms and conditions of the last Will of said James Moorman, deceased, and according to law.

Joseph R. Jackson was selected temporary Chairman and Joseph W. Thompson was selected temporary Secretary for the Board of Directors. Thomas F. Moorman moved that the Board proceed to permanent organization.

Whereupon the motion of John A. Moorman it was ordered that the Board proceed to the election of officers by ballot without nomination. These officers were to serve until September 31, 1899, and the following were elected: President, Joseph R. Jackson, first Vice-President Nathan Cadwallader, 2d Vice-President Thomas F. Moorman, Treasurer Nathan Reed, Secretary and Attorney, Joseph W. Thompson.

On motion John A. Moorman was appointed a Committee to make the following proposition to the Board of Commissioners of Randolph County, Indiana. That the said Board of Commissioners complete and pay for the building now in process of erection, this Board to take immediate charge of the farm and home set apart in the Will of said James Moorman and this Board to pay for the hay and corn contracted for by the said Commissioners and assume all contracts made with said Superintendent and manage and control said farm and home from this time on. Mr. Moorman reported that the proposition was accepted by the Board of Commissioners.

By-laws were adopted for the government of business of the Institution at its next meeting.

June 5th, 1889, it became apparent to the Board of Trustees that it would be impossible for them to maintain the home for a period of two years as the funds would not be available from the James Moorman estate. At a meeting of the Trustees on that day it was decided to abandon the home for a period of two years and "that the orphans and destitute children now in the care and custody of said Board of Directors of said Orphans' Home be returned to the Board of Commissioners of said Randolph County."

It was ordered that the Board of Directors rent and lease to the County Commissioners the farm to be run by them as an orphans' home until March 1st, 1892, the Directors reserving only the right to enter such premises in the interest of the Home. Mrs. John Howard was employed by the Commissioners as Matron of the Home, and continued until the Board again took charge two years later.

In 1890 the following officers were elected: President, C. F. Alexander, Vice-President, Nathan Reed, Treasurer, T. F. Moorman, Secretary, J. W. Thompson.

The Directors at once proceeded to the beautifying of the home and bought one hundred trees for that purpose. The orchard in connection with the Home was set out in 1891, at which time "Mr. and Mrs. John D. Summers donated to said Home one hundred apple trees, which were put out on the east side of said lane and north of woods in rows of ten trees each way, all trees set thirty feet apart each way. The last orchard to be known as the 'Summers Orchard.'"

The Treasurer's report of 1891 showed $43,445.67 in the hands of the Treasurer.

Dr. A. F. Huddleston was elected April 26th, 1892, to succeed Davis S. Kitselman, who had died a short time before.

In November, 1892, another member of the Board of Directors, C. F. Alexander died and Luther L. Moorman was elected to fill the vacancy.

Mr. John Howard was at this time Superintendent and Mrs. Howard matron of the Home.

March 1st, 1893, "the Board took an inventory of the property at the Home and farm and inspected the farm with reference to ditching, clearing, building, etc., ate voraciously of a bountiful dinner prepared by Mrs. Howard and viewed with interest the children at dinner. The farm and Home are now in a prosperous condition, the children, seventeen in number, seem to be well provided for, well clothed, properly instructed and happy and contented. The subject of a building was discussed and the ground looked over with a view of location."

April, 1893, the Board again contracted with J. W. Howard, Superintendent, for a period of one year.

W. E. Miller was elected to the Board February 3, 1893, to take the place of Nathan Reed, who died in his home at Winchester, January 26th, of that year.

The position of Joseph R. Jackson was declared vacant in September, 1893. Mr. Jackson had removed from the County and on October 3rd, 1893, A. C. Beeson was appointed in his stead.

In 1894 the Secretary J. W. Thompson was instructed to draft bill to be presented to the next Legislature giving the Board of Commissioners power to appropriate money to aid in building Orphans' Homes.

In 1895 the officers were Pres., Luther L. Moorman, Vice-President, W. E. Miller, Secretary J. W. Thompson, Treasurer T. F. Moorman.

January 1st, 1896, Mr. and Mrs. Howard were again contracted with for a period of two years.

December 13th, 1897, "W. E. Miller presented his written resignment of a member of this Board, which resignment was accepted," and John Howard was elected to fill Mr. Miller's place on the Board.

January 1898 "The Board was notified that John Howard Superintendent would not continue after March 1st." James M. Moorman submitted proposition to serve as Superintendent of the Home for $800.00 per year and on motion the proposition was accepted and Secretary ordered to draw contract for one year.

January 28th, 1898, the following resolutions were unanimously accepted: "Whereas the house as a Home on the farm owned by this Board is badly out of repair and is too small for use as a home and is old and unfit for an Orphans' Home,

And whereas, this Board feels necessity of building a new house suitable and convenient and commodious for the inmates, and,

Whereas, this Board now has first mortgage notes due the building fund,

Therefore resolutions that this Board proceed to build a suitable house and building on said farm for use as an Orphans' Home at a cost not to succeed ten thousand dollars providing notes of the building fund to the amount of ten thousand dollars can be sold and assigned without recourse at an amount not less than the sum due.

And the Treasurer is hereby authorized to report to this Board at its next meeting if such sale can be made."

This was the introduction to the present beautiful building located upon the Home farm at this time. Mr. W. S. Kaufman was selected to make the plans. The bids were let and the following were submitted: Borror & Dull, $9,160.00; George A. Mangas, $10,000.00; O. L. Pulse & Co., $11,150.00; W. E. Thompson, $10,332.00; J. L. Shetterly, $9,457.00; J. D. Babcock, $10,355.45; Hagerman & Peacock, $8,841.00; Norton & Eplis, $9,199.00; J. M. Shank, $11,136.00; Louck & Hill, $10,581.00; Marion Hathaway, $9,980.00. It was decided to have the building plastered with adamant and some of the bids were revised and cost added, which made the bid of Hagerman & Peacock $9,000. It being the lowest bid, contract was let to them for the said amount. The contract for plumbing, including a ram, was let to Hode F. Hobbick for $1,445.00.

Up to this time there had been no direct relation between the county commissioners and the board of trustees of the Home.

It became necessary, by statute, that the county commissioners remove all children from the County Infirmary and provide homes for them elsewhere. This being the case the Commissioners did the noble thing of entering into the following contract with the board of directors of the Home. This contract is still in force excepting the prices paid for the matron. These changes, however, are slight, and have been made in accordance with laws passed by the Legislature of the state subsequent to the time of this contract:

"ARTICLE OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS AND BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF JAMES MOORMAN'S ORPHAN'S HOME.

This agreement entered into by and between the Board of Commissioners of the County of Randolph, and State of Indiana, party of the first part, and the James Moorman's Orphans' Home, party of the second part. Witnesseth: that the said Board of Commissioners hereby agree to pay said Orphans' Home the sum of six thousand dollars for the support, care, education, control and protection of the dependent, neglected and abandoned children for which said County may be liable; and for in consideration of the performance of other stipulants herein contained. Of the above named amount of six thousand dollars, the sum of twenty-one hundred and eighty-eight dollars is to be paid in cash, for services heretofore rendered by said Orphan's Home, in the care of said children, as per verified bills now on file before said Board of Commissioners and the sum of three hundred and seventeen and 66-100 dollars for each quarter of a year, for twelve successive quarters beginning with December 1st, 1898, payable at the end of each quarter; Provided always that the verified bills filed before said Board of Commissioners for the support of such children as aforesaid, for which said Board of Commissioners shall be liable, shall be equal said sum of three hundred seventeen and 66-100 dollars for each quarter. In the event said verified claims shall not amount to the said sum of three hundred seventeen and 66-100 dollars each quarter, then said Board of Commissioners agree to pay said Orphans' Home the amount of claims filed for the care of such children as aforesaid, until the sum of such payments shall aggregate the said sum of six thousand dollars.

It is further agreed that said Board of Commissioners shall pay said Orphans' Home the legal rate for the care of all children for which said Orphans' Home can not care for under the provisions of James Moorman's Will under which it was established and is now operating. In consideration of the foregoing payments the said Orphans' Home hereby agrees to properly support, care for, educate, control and protect any and all children placed in said Orphans' Home and on and after the payment of said sum of six thousand dollars to care for all children free of cost that said County may be liable to keep, that said Orphans' Home can not keep under the provisions of said James Moorman's will; Provided, however, if the said James Moorman's Orphans' Home shall not have sufficient funds so that the net income arising therefrom, without the use of any part of the principal fund, to support all of said children which may be placed therein which can be supported thereby under the provision of said will after the payment of the said sum of six thousand dollars aforesaid, then said Orphans' Home shall be compelled to support only such number thereof as it can support with the net income of said funds without resorting to the use of any part of the principal so as to diminish the principal which may be on hands at the date of the final payment of the said sum of six thousand dollars.

It is further agreed that at least one joint meeting of the Commissioners and the Board of Trustees of the said Orphans' Home shall be held at the room of said Board of Commissioners at the Court House in the city of Winchester, Indiana at such times as may be agreed upon by them, during each quarterly session of said Board of Commissioners; at which meetings there shall be full, free and mutual consultation of all the business of said Orphans' Home, any and all matters in relation thereto and the wards of said County therein contained.

In witness whereof the said parties have hereunto set their hands and corporate seals this the 20th day of January, 1899.

WILLIAM HORN,
ADAM SLONAKER,
THOMAS H. CLARK,
County Commissioners.

The James Moorman Orphans' Home, by Luther L. Moorman Pres."

The salary of Superintendent and matron was raised to $900.00 for the year beginning March 1st, 1899, Mr. James Moorman and Carrie E. Moorman.

On the death of John A. Moorman, Elkanah Hill was elected to his place on the Board, April 3rd, 1899.

J. W. Thompson resigned August 28th, 1900, and B. F. Marsh was elected to succeed him.

John Howard resigned October, 1900, and Thomas H. Clark was elected to his place on the Board.

In 1901 the Board increased the salary of the Superintendent to one thousand dollars per year and also agreed to pay $2.00 per week on the expenses of one girl when the number of children in the Home was more than thirty.

In 1902 on the recommendation of Amos W. Butler, Superintendent of the State Board of Charities, who had visited the Home, the Board of Directors made application to the school of Feeble-minded Children, at Plymouth. This was certainly an excellent policy and it removed that class of children from association with the other children.

Up to this time the children of the home had attended school in the District School No. 14, of White River township. The question of their being put into a school by themselves was agitated by the patrons of that district. July 14, 1903, the Trustee of White River township attended one of the meetings and "proposed to equip suitable and furnished room in the Home for school purposes for an amount to the Treasurer for heating said room equal to the expense of heating a school room during the school period in said Township and to employ and pay a well qualified teacher during the school term in said Township." Mr. Moorman and Mr. Marsh were appointed to draft a contract between the Township and the Home for the establishment and maintainance of such school. The school was established in the Home in the fall of 1903 and maintained until 1909 when it was abandoned and transferred to the Lincoln. This was certainly a step in the right direction as these children have every right to association with other children and influence that come from mingling with other people other than themselves.

Mr. and Mrs. Moorman resigned in May, 1904, and the Board employed Elmer D. Nickey and his wife Ida H., as Superintendent and Matron of the Home from June 1st, 1904, for the sum of one thousand dollars per annum, payable quarterly with the privilege to terminate contract March 1st, 1905, and served until Mar. 1st, 1909.

Allen R. Hiatt and wife Emma E. were employed as Superintendent and Matron February 12th, 1909, and are still serving in that position. At this time, 1914, Mr. and Mrs. Hiatt have been excellent people for the place and have made a splendid record.

The services of James M. Moorman and his wife Carrie have been so valuable to the Home and appreciated by the inmates and officers of the Home to such a degree that in 1910, after Mr. and Mrs. Moorman had taken charge of the Whites' Institute at Wabash, the Trustees requested their picture to be hung upon the walls of the Home. Such a mark of distinction certainly was merited, as Mr. and Mrs. Moorman were of such disposition and character to make their influence felt for years to come.

A. L. Nichols was appointed a member of the Board, succeeding James M. Moorman, in November, 1910.

The members of the Board at the present time are: T. H. Clark, president; B. F. Marsh, secretary; T. F. Moorman, treasurer; A. L. Nichols, attorney; Dr. A. F. Huddleston, physician, and Elkanah Hill.

Mr. James Moorman, or "Uncle Jimmie," as he was commonly called, "had long conceived and often talked of his purpose of establishing a suitable and comfortable home for Orphans and destitute children. He also looked with horror upon the fact that little children who were orphans and destitute were crowded into the poor house with a vicious class of paupers who there seek refuge."

"It is not singular that when it came to writing his Will not only the greater part of it should be taken in providing rules for the Orphans' Home but the first item and first sentence of his Will should indicate the object and purpose of his life."

Mr. Moorman showed his keen insight into the future possibilities of such a home by the wisdom displayed in the provisions for that Home.

The rare judgment shown by him in selecting the Board that was to take the initiative in the establishment of that Home has only been equalled by the judgment of those who have selected the successors to the various members of the Board. No home, perhaps, in the state of Indiana has been conducted with better business judgment and the higher appreciation of the great function of such an institution than James Moorman Orphans' Home.

The honesty and sincerity at all times of the Board of Directors and a fitness of the Superintendent and Matron has indeed made this a HOME to the many children who have been placed in that institution.

It must also be said for the County Commissioners that they have stood by the Home, supporting it in every particular and meeting their obligations at all times.

That the children of the Home now enjoy the splendid educational facilities which they do, and are permitted to meet upon a common level all the other children of the community, take their place in good schools as an equal of every other child, a privilege which every free born child has a right to demand, is due largely to the conscientious and sincere love of childhood in the heart of G. Walter Hiatt, Trustee of White River township, through whose influence the children were taken to the Lincoln school.

BINDING OUT CHILDREN.

We referred heretofore to the policy of finding homes and occupations for children without placing them in either the County Infirmary or the Orphan's Home. This was done formerly and was transacted usually by the "over-seers of the poor" in each Township.

It was the custom also at that time for the parents to bind out their children as apprentices, sometimes because of better advantages that would be offered the child and sometimes because the parents were unable to support the child and for that reason we speak of this phase of the child life at this point and with this in view here insert the types of various contracts that were made in binding out children as apprentices.

No reflection is intended whatever upon the people who did this because it was done with the highest and best of motives and perhaps today if a certain class of boys and girls were compelled to work more and to acquire the means of providing for themselves, society would be much better off.

The indentures spoken of are as follows:

"This Indenture made this the first day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand Eight hundred and forty four between Philip Allen of the County of Randolph and State of Indiana by and with the consent of James Allen his son a minor age seventeen years old and Thomas Costlove of the State and County aforesaid Witnesseth that the said Philip Allen has put and placed and doth by these presents put and place the said James Allen as an Apprentice to the said Thomas Costlove to learn the trade and Mystery of Boot and Shoemaking Which he the said Thomas Costlove useth and the said Philip Allen doth covenant to and with the said Thomas Costlove as an apprentice from the date hereoff until the twentieth day of September in the year one thousand eight hundred and fortyseven at which time the James Will be nineteen years and eleven months age if living during all which time the said apprentice shall and will faithfully serve his said Master keep his secrets obey all his lawful command and shall do no damage to his said Master nor suffer none to be done which he can prevent he shall not play at any unlawful game nor frequent tipling houses or places of gambling nor at any time absent himself from the service of his said Master without his consent but shall in all things behave himself as a good and faithful apprentice during the time aforesaid and the said Costlove doth covenant to and with the said Philip Allen that he will teach the said James or cause him to be instructed in the art trade and Mistery of Boot and Shoemaking in the best manner he can and that during the time foresaid he will send him to school for the term of two months and that he will find and provide for the said apprentice good and sufficient meat drink and lodging and apparl during the said term and shall at the end thereof give to the said James Allen one entire new suit and one good and ful set of tools such as are given to Journeymen of such art and trade.

CHAPTER V.

EARLY SETTLERS.

A TALE OF THE AIRLY DAYS.

Oh! tell me a tale of the airly days—
Of the times as they ust to be;
"Piller of Fi-er" and "Shakespeare's Plays"
Is a' most too deep for me!
I want plane facts, and I want plane words,
Of the good old-fashioned ways,
When speech run free as the songs of birds
'Way back in the airly days.

Tell me a tale of the timber-lands—
Of the old-time pioneers;
Somepin' a pore man understands
With his feelin's well as ears.
Tell of the old log house,—about
The loft, and the puncheon flore—
The old fi-er-place, with the crane swung out,
And the latch-string through the door.

Tell of the things jest as they was—
They don't need no excuse!—
Don't tetch 'em up like the poets does,
Tel theyr all too fine fer use!—
Say they was 'leven in the fambily—
Two beds, and the chist, below,
And the trundle-beds that each helt three,
And the clock and the old bureau.

Then blow the horn at the old back door
Tel the echoes all halloo,
And the children gethers home onc't more,
Jest as they ust to do;
Blow for Pap tel he hears and comes,
With Tomps and Elias, too,
A-marchin' home, with the fife and drums
And the old Red, White and Blue!

Blow and blow tel the sound draps low
As the moan of the whipperwill,
And wake up Mother, and Ruth and Jo,
All sleepin' at Bethel Hill;
Blow and call tel the faces all
Shine out in the back-log's blaze,
And the shadders dance on the old hewed wall
As they did in the airly days.

Most of the early settlers of Randolph county came from North Carolina. Some of them settled in other parts after leaving Carolina before they came to this county, but most of them came directly from "The Old Dominion" to this state.

Thomas Parker, the first settler, John W. Thomas and Clarkson Wilcutts had left North Carolina in a party of five. Parker, with his wife and three children, selected his land near the present town of Arba and proceeded at once to build a cabin in which they lived for four weeks. John W. Thomas and Wilcutts afterward settled near Mr. Parker.

Mr. Ephraim Bowen, who came October 22, 1814, came from Maryland and settled on the north border of section eighteen, town sixteen, range one west. Mr. Bowen had visited this place and returned to his family in the east. Mrs. Bowen was not favorable to coming, but the glowing description which Mr. Bowen gave of this land induced her, after she had been earnestly solicited by the children, to come to the wilderness of Indiana. They arrived October 22, 1814. The children soon became very homesick. Their spirits were not raised any by the wailing and howling of the old dog, who was seemingly as homesick as they were. The children cried and wanted to return, but the mother answered them with the same pleading that they had used before they had started. "Oh, mother, do go." "Please, mother, do go." This soon stopped their being homesick.

The fifth family was Ephraim Overman, wife and five children, all boys. Mr. Overman also settled near the Parker, Wilcutts, Bowen company. Other Carolina settlers to come in 1815, or near that time, were David Bowles, Jesse Johnson, James Frazier, and James Hodson. They settled near Lynn. Some of the Smalls came at that time, also, as did Paul Beard, Daniel Shoemaker, David Kenworthy and James Frazier. Early in 1816 Paul W. Way, Henry W. Way, William Way, Jr., Robert Way and William Diggs came from South Carolina and located land four miles west of where Winchester now is.

Paul Way returned for his parents and his family. He returned to Randolph county with them, and several families besides, and arrived in March, 1817. The same fall John B. Wright, David Wright, William Wright and John Wright settled from Salt Creek west. In the summer of 1817 William Way returned on horseback, alone, to South Carolina to bring his father, William Way, Sr., to the new country, which purpose he successfully accomplished. With them came, among others, a Mrs. Beverly, and Moorman Way, then a lad of two years, who was to become one of the most influential and wealthy men in the history of the county.

As to settlements up to the close of 1818, Jere Smith says, in his "Civil History:" "In the year 1818, when Randolph county was erected, there were fifty or sixty families on White river and Salt and Sugar creeks; fifty or sixty families on Green's fork and Mud creek; thirty families on Nolan's fork, including Joshua Foster on the Griffis farm, near the state line; eight or ten families on Martindale's creek, and twelve or fifteen families on West river, above the Wayne county line." So that, by Mr. Smith's estimation, there were, at the time of the election in 1818, about 180 families in the present boundaries of Randolph county. Of course, at that time, the population was wholly east of the western boundary of the "twelve-mile strip," since the land west of that line was still Indian territory, on which white men were bound by treaty not to settle. In 1818 the tribes ceded those lands, and in eight or ten years the county west as well as east of the boundary was settled. In fact, that territory began settlement in 1821, but emigration was slow to push in for several years. It would be interesting to find the "election returns" for August, 1818, the first in Randolph county, to learn how many and who were, at that time, the free and independent electors here. Those returns, however, have not been discovered.

On West river, in August, 1817, there were eleven settlers, all living east of the boundary and on Sections 7, 8, 17 and 18, the first and the last being fractional sections against the boundary. William Blount (and his two sons-in-law) on Section 7; James Malcom, Section 17; Henry Shoemaker, Section 17; Samuel Sales, Section 17; Arny Hall, Section 17; David Jones, Section 17; Evan Shoemaker, Section 18; Griffin Davis, Section 18; William Smith, Sections 5 and 6; Isaac Barnes, Section 7, came in 1818; John E. Hodge, Section 8. came in 1818. The sections lie on both sides of West River, but on the east side of the boundary, and William Smith (father of Hon. Jere Smith) went highest of the river, taking land in Sections 5 and 6, the latter section having but a small fraction east of the boundary.

The early settlers of the north part of the county were a little late in arriving. Massix Lewellen came near Ridgeville in 1817. Joab Ward, Burgot Pierce, Thomas Pierce, Henry Kizer, David Connor, James Massey, Messrs. Kite, Jacobs, Canada, Reed and many others. These people were practically all from Carolina and had in a great degree very much in common, especially as to political and religious belief. Their places of settlement is shown directly by the descriptions of the land which they entered.

LAND ENTRIES.

So far as land-entries are concerned, a considerable amount of it was done in both 1814 and 1815. Land was often entered months and even years before the owners occupied it, and not seldom the patentee never personally took possession. And often, on the other hand, persons would live in the new country months, or even years, before they could succeed in entering land.

Many came with no money, and had to work and rent or live out, or do some other way to earn the money to pay for what they bought. The records of the land office show that the entries in the county, during 1814, were as follows in order of date: Clarkson Wilcutts, Greensfork, southeast quarter of Section 28, Town 16, Range 1, 160 acres, January 19, 1814. James Cammack, Greensfork, east half of Section —, Town 16, Range 1, 323.16 acres, January 22, 1814. Ephraim Bowen, Greensfork, northeast quarter of Section 28, Town 16, Range 1, 160 acres, April 13, 1814. Travis Adcock, Washington, northwest quarter of Section 14, Town 18, Range 14, 160 acres, May 14, 1814. John Thomas, Greensfork, northwest quarter of Section 33, Town 16, Range 1, 156.58 acres, July 21, 1814 (fractional). Thomas Parker, Greensfork, northwest quarter of Section 32, Town 16, Range 1, 156.88 acres, August 16, 1814. Ephraim Overman, Greensfork, northwest quarter of Section 27, Town 16, Range 1, 160 acres, October, 1814. Travis Adcock, Washington, southeast quarter of Section 10, Town 18, Range 14, 160 acres, October 19, 1814. Shubael Ellis, White River, northeast quarter of Section 18, Town 20, Range 14, 160 acres, November 30, 1814. Eli Overman, Greensfork, southeast quarter of Section 33, Town 16, Range 1, 156.58 acres, December 13, 1814. Thus there were in 1814 ten entries by nine persons, comprising about 1,750 acres. Seven were in Greensfork, with about 1,273 acres, two in Washington, with 320 acres, and one in White River, with 160 acres.

In 1815 there was in Greensfork only one entry, Nathan Overman, southwest quarter of Section 27, Town 16, Range 1, 159.50 acres, September 13, 1815. There was but one in White River, to-wit, George W. Kennon, southeast quarter of Section 26, Town 20, Range 13, 160 acres, September 10, 1815.

In 1815 there were in West River seven entries, as follows: William Blount, southwest quarter of Section 8, Town 18, Range 13, 160 acres, April 10, 1815. Lot Huddleston, northwest quarter of Section 17, Town 18, Range 13, 160 acres, May 3, 1815. John Jones, Town 18, Range 13, 325.68 acres, May 3, 1815. John E. Hodges, northwest quarter of Section 8, Town 18, Range 13, 160 acres, July 6, 1815. Isaac Barnes, Section 7, Town 18, Range 13, 186 acres, July 6, 1815. Arny Hall, east half southeast quarter of Section 17, Town 18, Range 13, 80 acres, October 12, 1815. Cornelius Shane, northeast quarter of Section 8, Town 18, Range 13, 160 acres, July 6, 1815. Seven entries, about 1,230 acres.

In 1815 there were, in Washington, entries as follows: Curtis Clenney, southwest quarter of Section 11, Town 18, Range 14, 160 acres, January 7, 1815. Obadiah Harris, southwest quarter of Section 10, Town 18, Range 14, 160 acres, May 8, 1815. John Ozbun, southeast quarter of Section 8, Town 18, Range 14, 160 acres, August 9, 1815. Paul Beard, northeast quarter of Section 10, Town 18, Range 14, 160 acres, August 9, 1815. Paul Beard, northwest quarter of Section 11, Town 18, Range 14, 160 acres, August 9, 1815. Obadiah Harris, northeast quarter of Section 15, Town 18, Range 14, 160 acres, October 14, 1815. George Frazier, northwest quarter of Section 9, Town 18, Range 14, 160 acres, October 17, 1815. Seven entries, equaling 1,120 acres. The total entries in Randolph county for 1815 were sixteen entries, and 2,669.50 acres, all but two being in Washington and West River townships. The entries in Washington were in Sections 8, 9, 10 and 11, of Township 18, Range 14. The entries in West River were in Sections 7, 8, 17 and 18, Township 18, Range 13. The total entries to the close of 1815 (1814, 1815) were twenty-six entries, with 4,420 acres, in four townships, Greensfork, Washington, White River and West River.

The year 1816 saw a great increase of entries, and of settlements also. The total for 1816 was 6,109 acres, in the following townships: Greensfork, four entries, 830 acres; Washington, thirteen entries, 2,080 acres; White River, eighteen entries, 2,880 acres; Ward, one entry, 640 acres; West River, three entries, 400 acres. The great rush that year seemed to be to Washington and White River; 1,600 acres were entered in the latter township in three days, December 4, 5 and 7; and in Washington six entries were made in October and four in November, or 1,600 acres in the two months. The years 1817 and 1818 saw a greatly stronger movement, in so much that the entries for the two years amounted to 25,200 acres, those for each year being somewhat nearly the same. The entries in 1817 were in Greensfork, Washington, White River, West River, Franklin, Ward and Wayne. Washington, eighteen entries, 3,439 acres; White River, thirty-five entries, 5,337 acres; Greensfork, seven entries, 1,178 acres; Ward, eight entries, 1,280 acres; West River, twelve entries, 1,832 acres; Wayne, five entries, 800 acres; Franklin, two entries, 360 acres. Entries, 87; 14,226 acres. The entries in 1818 were in the same townships. Washington, twenty-four entries, 3,060 acres; White River, forty-one entries, 8,437 acres; Greensfork, five entries, 437 acres; Ward, one entry, 160 acres; West River, nine entries, 1,440 acres; Wayne, seven entries, 1,280 acres; Franklin, one entry, 154 acres. Entries, 88; acres, 11,968. Total entries up to the close of 1818 were, in Washington, 64; White River, 96; Greensfork, 24; Ward, 10; West River, 31; Wayne, 12; Franklin, 3. 240 entries, with 36,729 acres. Emigration to Randolph after 1818 fell off greatly, so much so that during the nine years from 1820 to 1828, inclusive, a smaller quantity of land was entered than in 1817 alone.

The following statement will show the amounts of land entered year by year to 1840: 1812, 160 acres; 1814, 1,744; 1815, 2,512; 1816, 6,109; 1817, 14,226; 1818. 11,968; 1819, 3,623; 1820, 1,779; 1821, 1,654; 1822, 2,084; 1823, 1,496; 1824, 530; 1825, 789; 1826, 2,047; 1827, 882; 1828, 1,445; 1829, 2,477; 1830, 4,320; 1831, 10,890; 1832, 8,225; 1833, 16,833; 1834, 10,430; 1835, 10,909; 1836, 77,368; 1837, 48,308; 1838, 7,293; 1839, 894; 1840, 700.

Thus it appears that the rush of settlers to Randolph was at first in 1817 and 1818 and then again from 1833 to 1837, inclusive, especially the two years 1836 and 1837. The amount of land entered in these two years last named reached the amazing quantity of 125,676 acres, and, including 1833, 142,509, which is almost exactly half the area of the entire county. The land entered in 1836 and 1837 exceeded all the previous entries during thirty-five years, from 1812 to 1836, by some 8,000 acres.

By the close of 1838 almost all the land had been "taken up." Except the "school sections," little remained for original entry, and what was yet unentered lay in scattered parcels here and there throughout the county. By that time, therefore, Randolph had been bought of "Uncle Sam," and the public title was transferred to private hands.

"Speculators," however, here, as elsewhere, had extensively "got in their work," and in various localities vast tracts lay unoccupied for years because the speculator's title covered it. It has been said by some of the early pioneers that most of the land on both sides of the road between Winchester and Deerfield was owned by one man, and after his death that vast body of land remained still vacant for many years. As a specimen of the evil work of entering land for "speculation," a single person, residing at Cincinnati, appears to have "entered" many tracts in several different townships comprising we know not how many acres. Another, from Cincinnati, also engaged largely in the same speculative work. Still a third individual appears as having entered tract after tract, scattered here and there.

One of the first necessities of any community is a mill. "To live we must eat, and if we eat, bread must be prepared," is an old statement, as true today as it was at the time at which it was uttered. Many devices were made by which corn could be cracked or pounded into meal, but these could only supply a very small amount and machines or mills became a necessity. The primitive mill or corn cracker is described in some of the reminiscences given elsewhere. These mills had also a great function in society, that of becoming community centers, as it were, or the meeting places of men from various localities. In this way sentiment was disseminated, opinions were exchanged and the mill became the "Public Forum." They were the centers of travel and were made the objective points of many early roads. The first mills were nothing more or less than "corn-crackers," and had an output of but a few pounds per day. This was the best they could do and satisfied the needs of the community. However, the small output meant that more mills must be built to supply the demand, thus, each community had its own mill. Cabin Creek seems to have been a favorite location, as it is said at one time there were no less than nine mills in operation upon that stream alone.

MILLS, MACHINERY, ETC.

As to mills, etc., before 1820, we have not been able to gain any certain or exact information. There were some mills built on Nolan's and Greensforks (as, also, some horse-mill corn-crackers and hominy-pounders). William Smith, father of Hon. Jeremiah Smith, built a mill in 1819, on West river. Meshach Lewallyn built one at Ridgeville on Mississinewa, about the same time. Jere Cox erected one on White river, some miles east of Winchester, in 1825. Jessup had a mill on Greenville creek as soon as 1820 or before. Aaron Hill's father, as also a Mr. Hawkins, in the region of Arba, had hominy-pounders, and perhaps corn-crackers, run by horse-power, shortly after the first settlers came. However, Aaron Hill's father came to this county in 1831. Jesse Way says he thought the first water mill in the county was built by John Wright, on Salt creek, just north of Winchester, in 1818 or 1819. But to find exact dates, and to determine the locations of those early mills, is very difficult, and in many cases an impossible task. In the statement herein given, locality has been followed rather than priority of date; and no doubt many, after all the labor expended in the work, have been omitted.

WATER-MILLS.

A mill was built at (just below) Macksville by Robert Cox about thirty-two years ago (1848). It is now owned by Roberts and Goode. It is a good (grist) mill, and does a thriving business. At the mouth of Cabin creek Mr. Bunker built a saw-mill very early. Afterward John H. Bond rebuilt the saw-mill and added a grist-mill. William Roberts bought and rebuilt the mill soon after 1854. It was afterward owned by Dick & Cowgill. Up Cabin creek (three-quarters of a mile) is another grist-mill; Jacob Beals built one on that site very early. Afterward it was rebuilt by Peter S. Miller (from Bucks county, Pennsylvania), and again by William Marine (about) 1844. Mr. Marine was the grandfather of James Whitcomb Riley. It was owned by John H. Bond and Solomon Wright, and later by Henry Studebaker. Steam was used at one time but now water alone. A portable saw-mill was there once but it has been taken away. The mill now has a good reputation for work, and is the only country mill in the county. Just above that (also on Cabin creek), William Marine had built another mill (about) 1839. He at one time owned both these mills (called Marine's upper and lower mills). While Marine was running both these mills, Nathan Mendenhall undertook to build still another mill between Marine's upper dam and the lower mill connected with that dam. He built his dam, dug the race, got the timber on the ground but finally he stopped. Why, we do not know, for one would think a man might as well go clear through as to begin such a job as that. It is a pity he had not put to actual test the project of running a water-mill without water!

Two miles above (on Cabin creek still) stood Mendenhall's (lower) mill, built before 1840. It has been rebuilt once or twice, and was discontinued not long ago. The works were taken to Parker, and the mill is in operation there now. A mile above was Mendenhall's upper mill, built by Nathan Mendenhall (father of the one mentioned above), at a very early day. The mill was rebuilt by his son Hiram. It was changed into a woolen factory. It was at Unionsport, and is run by both water and steam.

A saw-mill was built by William Davison before 1829. It was running up to 1852, but was discontinued soon after. Thomas Gillum built a "corn-cracker" one-fourth of a mile south of Buena Vista, one of the first water-mills in the county. It was gone long ago. Below Macksville mill (on White river), Mr. Spillers built a saw-mill (about) 1850. It was rebuilt by David Harris. On Sparrow creek a saw-mill was erected (before the Macksville grist-mill was built) by Morgan Mills. He used to saw day and night. He would set his log and start the saw, and then lie down and take a nap. When the saw got through the log, the snapping of the trigger would wake him up, and he would set the log again. That mill went down sixty years or more ago. Robert Cox rebuilt the mill and used it to saw the lumber for the mill he built (at Macksville) on White river. Noah Johnson built a grist-mill on Sparrow creek at the crossing of the Huntsville and Sampletown road, southeast of Macksville, very early, about the same time as Gillum's mill on Cabin creek there was also a saw-mill. Both have been gone many years.

James Clayton built a saw-mill on "Eight Mile Creek" above Macksville. That mill quit sawing before 1830. Lewallyn's grist-mill on the Mississinewa near Ridgeville, was built (say) 1819 or 1820. It was afterward owned by William Addington, and then by his son, Joab Addington, afterward by Addington & House. Still again by Arthur McKew, and later by Whipple. Frederick Miller had a grist-mill and saw-mill on Bear creek, three miles southwest of Ridgeville, perhaps seventy-five years ago. They have been gone many years. On Bear creek, Josiah Bundy and Jacob Horn once had a saw-mill. The old Sampletown mill, between Macksville and Winchester, just east of the "twelve-mile boundary," was built very early, but has been gone a long time. Jere Cox built a grist-mill above Winchester on White river, in 1825. Joseph and Benjamin Pickett built a saw-mill, William Pickett in 1853 purchased the place and both mills. They were operated till about 1864, and were torn down in 1870. Mr. Pickett said there were five dry years (from 1864 to 1869), in which the water was so low that the mills could not run, and they were left to go to wreck, and were taken away in 1870. Parsons had a grist-mill on Mississinewa one-half mile below Deerfield before 1832. Jessup had a "corn-cracker" on Greenville creek, north of Spartanburg before 1820. A grist-mill used to stand on Greenville creek northwest of the Kennon farm in Wayne township. It was there in 1850, but has been gone many years. The timbers are there still.

A Mr. Hinchy had a saw-mill and grist-mill on the Mississinewa, east of Allensville, in the early settlement of Jackson township, which were somewhat important for several years. There were some mills (one or more), on Mississinewa, near Fairview. John Wright is said to have had a corn-cracker water-mill on Salt creek, north of Winchester, thought by some to have been the first water-mill in the county. Jesse Way said Wright's mill was built in 1818 or 1819.

Joshua Bond had an oil mill (perhaps the only one in the county), as, also, a grist-mill, both run by horse-power, near Winchester, very early—perhaps as long ago as 1820, or thereabouts. Joshua Bond settled near Winchester about 1818, and set up his mills soon after; and about 1835, or so, he removed to Jay county, building a horse mill there also, and running the same till a comparatively late day, dying there also about 1878, at the age of ninety-four. His mill in Jay county was noted, settlers coming from both far and near.

Old Paul Beard had a saw-mill on Greensfork, which was old in 1837. There was a mill site where a grist-mill had been, but had gone down in 1832, and a new mill by Levi Stout (same man) two miles lower down on Greensfork, a mile and a half north of west from Lynn, about 1838, which was still running in 1854.

Amos Ellis had a saw-mill in old times between these two mill sites, which was gone, however, in 1840. Aimbrough and Mendenhall built a mill on Cabin creek some time prior to 1836, but this mill ran only about four years.

George Ritenour built a mill near his residence west of Deerfield in 1838, but this mill lasted only a short time, as the mill at Deerfield was much larger and better. Robert W. Bunker built his mill on Cabin creek, 1839. Marsh mill, below Deerfield, was built in 1833. John Jackson's mill, on Cabin creek, was built in September, 1834. Hurst's and People's mill was built near Unionsport in 1841.

There were other mills built from time to time, particularly saw-mills, concerning which no information has been obtained. These early mills must not be reckoned to be like the great mills of the present day. They were, indeed, but small and insignificant affairs. It is related of one of the first mills in Jackson township, that the owner boasted that his whole "fixings" had cost him only $2.50.

Those old-time mills were very humble, unpretending establishments. Cox's mill, above Winchester, built eighty years ago, and eleven years after the first settlement of the county, bolted flour in a hand bolt. The "corn crackers," so called (Jessup's on Greenville creek, for instance), used to grind about a peck an hour. The stones employed in many of the first mills were simply the native boulders of the region, dressed to suit the purpose. Still they served the needs of the settlers in a small way for many years. Some half-dressed mill stones are lying beside the highways still. The grist would be sent on the back of a horse or a mule with a half-grown lad, and one by one these grists would be slowly, oh, how slowly, worked through the machinery of the mill. Men, however, who were able to command a wagon and team and enough grain to warrant the labor required, would take a trip to the more extensive and better appointed mills on the White Water, or the Stillwater, or even the Miami. In the earliest times boys have been sent on horseback twenty miles or more, from the Arba settlement to the mills on the White Water below Richmond, both to buy corn and to get it ground in one of the mills in that region.

The story told by the old settlers of nearly every one of the first mills in the whole region, though perhaps not an actual fact as to even a single one of them, is yet painfully suggestive of the more important real fact that the mills did actually grind so "awful slow" that everybody would naturally believe that a dog might "lick the meal by spirits," and lift up his head and howl between the "jets" for more. But let us not laugh at these small beginnings of things. The settlers used far more labor, and displayed much greater energy in undertaking what they were able to accomplish under such appalling difficulties than their posterity do in effecting the far greater results of the present day.

For years after the opening of the country for settlement, the use of steam power was unknown. To fit up a steam establishment required a large amount of money, more, in fact, than most could command. Still as the country grew, and the milling necessities began to surpass the capacities of the water-power, and the "corn cracker" and the hand-bolt mills of the region, men ventured to try how steam would answer the purpose, and one by one, mills were built away from the streams. The result has been that water-power has dwindled and almost grown out of use, and steam has nearly carried the day.

One of the first steam mills in the county, possibly the first, was built by Elias Kizer at Winchester, as early perhaps as 1835, on Salt creek on the north side of Washington street.

Mr. Roberts had a steam grist-mill at Winchester (in the west part of the city). It was running say in 1860, but its rumbling has been silent for some years. The brick mill and warehouse near the depot has been standing for some fifty years. It was built for a warehouse by John Mumma. Martin owned it awhile, then Heaston and Riley, then Colton and Bates, then Bates Brothers. It is an extensive mill, has a high reputation, performing good, thorough, reliable work, and a large amount of it, now owned and operated by C. Graft.

Deerfield steam mill was built by Jason Whipple eighty-nine years ago (1845). For many years it had a very large patronage. At one time it drew custom for thirty or forty miles in every direction. Customers had the privilege, by staying through the night, of having their grists ground in turn, and many availed themselves thereof. Sometimes a dozen or twenty teams would wait through the darkness of the night, rather than go home through the long and tedious journey and then be obliged to return at a future day. People came from Centerville, Wabash, Greenville, etc. It was owned by Willis Whipple, son of Jason Whipple. This mill was torn down in 1907.

The mill at Allensville was fixed so as to run by water or steam. It was built in about 1850, and ceased to be used about 1900. A saw-mill (water and steam) was built, and afterward a grist-mill, by McNeely before 1845. The establishment was rebuilt by Thomas Reece and Company. There was a steam saw-mill on Olive Branch, then it was made a grist-mill, and afterward the works were taken out and carried to Farmland. At Farmland, Dr. William Macy had a steam saw-mill, afterward belonging to Ford and Company, but it has been silent for sixty years. Stanley Brothers had a steam grist-mill at Farmland before 1860. Having been burned, it was rebuilt with new machinery by Hawkins. Another steam-mill at Farmland was built by Charles Stanley about 1870.

A steam-mill was built at Ridgeville on the railroad, by Arthur McKew. It was burned and rebuilt of brick. The mill is a good one, and does much work.

There was a steam-mill at Harrisville, built some years ago. A steam grist-mill was running for several years at Arba, but it burned down in 1877, and has not been rebuilt. There were two steam saw-mills at Spartanburg. One was built about 1852 by William Luker. The other was built by Wesley Locke about 1880. It had a corn-mill and planing-mill attached. A large steam grist-mill was erected at Union City, Indiana. It was owned by Converse & Company; had a capacity of 200 barrels per day.

A steam saw-mill has been in operation for several years on the State line pike, two miles south of Union City, but it was removed about 1881. Mr. Sheets set up a saw-mill west of Union City in 1852.

There was a saw-mill on Oak street, Union City, and John H. Cammack had a saw-mill in the Cammack neighborhood, some two miles east of Bartonia.

There was a saw-mill eight miles southwest of Farmland, and a steam grist-mill at Huntsville, also a saw-mill at Huntsville, owned by Peyton Johnson, and there was another saw-mill owned by Jere Hyatt. A saw-mill stood not far east of Deerfield, on the State road, from early times until about 1880, owned latterly by John H. Sipe. There was, for years, a saw-mill on the boundary, southwest of Spartanburg. A saw-mill was in operation for twenty years or more near Salem. When Union City began to need lumber for building, that mill, among others, helped much to supply the demand. A grist-mill and a saw-mill were formerly in operation north of Lynn, but one was burned (or both) and now there is neither.

Anthony McKinney built a saw-mill on Mississinewa, one and a quarter miles below Fairview, about 1839, put in a corn-cracker about 1840, and built a new and more extensive mill, putting in "wheat buhrs" about 1842. He had three run of buhrs—and a bolt carried by machinery. It was a good mill for a while. Mr. McKinney sold the mill to Samuel Zaner. He owned it about a year and sold to Abner Wolverton, about 1864, for wheat. Steam was put in in 1875, but has not been used for years.

Mr. Ward had a saw-mill on Mississinewa, below Ridgeville, which ran for several years. John Foust had a saw-mill and corn-cracker in about 1856, in Franklin township, just at the township line, on Mississinewa. Cyrus A.

Reed had a saw-mill one mile above Fairview. It was built about 1850, and stood perhaps ten years. There was a saw-mill at Shedville, run by steam.

Before 1825 Lemuel Vestal undertook to erect a mill on Stoney creek, near Windsor. Before completing it, he sold out to John Thornburg, who finished the grist-mill and also built a saw-mill. After four years he sold to Andrew G. Dye, and he to Moses Neely, and still again the mills were transferred to Thomas W. Reece, who built them anew. Their owners since have been Neely, Mark Pattis, Johnson & Dye, William A. Thornburg, Reece & Sons, Mahlon Clevenger, John Thornburg, Robert Cowgill and John Clevenger. Doubtless other mills have existed, of which no account has been obtained.

OTHER MACHINERY.

Peter Kabel had a carding machine, etc., in the west part of the county. At first Mr. Kabel had a little carding machine in the garret of John H. Bond's grist-mill. He was very poor, and got the use of Bond's "power." After awhile he bought a waste farm that was too wet for tillage. He ditched the prairie and drained the ponds, springs and swamps, and collected the water, and got enough to run a carding machine and woolen factory. For a long time it was a famous establishment, getting custom far and near, and Mr. Kabel made a fortune. His factory is gone now. There are pleasant anecdotes about Mr. Kabel and his mill. Somebody had at one time turned the water upon the wheel and made the mill run empty through the night. He was provoked, and on Saturday he sawed the foot-bridge over the fore-bay almost in two, and laid it in its place. Monday morning he came to start his mill, and, forgetting all about his "trap," he stepped upon the sawed plank and went, souse, into the fore-bay. He scrambled out just as Thomas Addington was going to the mill. He ran to meet Thomas, laughing and crying out: "O, Thomas, Thomas, I caught mine self, I caught mine self!" Mr. Kabel lived three miles south of Macksville. There was for some years a woolen factory at Unionsport. It had a good reputation, and its yarns were in great demand. There used to be a carding machine at Winchester, belonging to Elias Kizer, but it is not there now. The old county seminary, at Winchester, was fitted up and run as a woolen mill factory for several years. It was quite extensive and did much work, but it has been discontinued. There was, for many years, a carding machine and woolen factory at Deerfield. It was burned down and rebuilt, and burned again, and, since the last fire, has not been rebuilt.

It is told us, as a matter of curiosity, that Moorman Way once undertook to fit up a carding machine at Winchester, and run it by ox-power. The establishment did some work for awhile. A carding machine was built and operated in very early days, near Winchester. It is thought to have been the first in the county, but has been gone for many, many years. It belonged to Daniel Petty, and was operated by horse-power.

Mills and warehouses are now run in connection with each other. This has made it impossible to have a mill off the railroad. As we have said heretofore, there is but one mill running at this time, that is not located on a railroad. This mill does but very little business. The mills of today are to be found in Union City, Lynn, Modoc, Parker, Farmland, Ridgeville and Winchester. Warehouses are to be found in those places and in addition, in Crete, Carlos, Losantville, Deerfield and Harrisville.

EARLY ROADS.

The first roads of the county were mere trails or paths that led in and around the hills, or upon, crossing the streams at the most available point, so as to prevent the least possible difficulty. The trail which was blazed on trees or bush was often difficult to follow, even by the most experienced settler.

Even the roads established by law were very vague indeed, as will be seen in some of the entries. The first road was to run from Winchester between Jesse Johnson's and Paul Beard's. Another was laid out from the west end of Hezekiah Hockett's lane to the Wayne county line, at the southeast corner of Martindale's. A third was to go from Hockett's road three-quarters of a mile north of "gass" to an irregular direction to the State road at Vernon. This is the only reference made to the town of Vernon anywhere. Another road was to run from the southwest corner of Samuel Smith's fence to the crossing south of Jackson's, thence to new road at the north end of William Smith's lane. If following the roads was any worse than following the descriptions they must have had a sorry time, indeed.

When roads were finally established the right-of-way was cleared simply by cutting the trees and allowing the stumps to stand. It was often with great difficulty that a wagon could be drawn along these roads at all because of the stumps. As the roads became more and more traveled it became necessary to put them in better condition. This was done by filling up the holes with logs and making corduroy sometimes for rods after rods and even for miles.

But for many years travel in the spring of the year was almost impossible, and no very great distances could be gone at that time. Eventually, however, the roads were graded and straightened, but little attention being paid to hills or hollows. When the gravel road was suggested it seemed at first to be a wild dream.

In Cottman's History Pamphlets, No. X, p. 17, will be found the following description of traveling in early days:

"Most of the year a journey over the roads was simply a slow, laborious wallowing through mud; the bogs were passable only through the use of corduroy, and this corduroy of poles laid side by side for miles, not infrequently had to be weighted down with dirt to prevent it floating off when the swamp waters rose. * * * As one proceeded he must track to right and left, not to find the road, but to get out of it and find places where the mud was 'thick enough to bear.' * * * Innumerable stubs of saplings, sharpened like spears by being cut off obliquely, waited to impale the unlucky traveler who might be pitched out upon them, and the probability of such an accident was considerable, as the lurching wagon plunged over a succession of ruts and roots, describing an exhilarating seesaw with most astonishing alteration of plunge, creak and splash. Ever and anon the brimming streams had to be crossed, sometimes by unsafe fording and sometimes by rude ferries. In the latter case the ferry keeper was apt to be off at work somewhere in his clearing, and the traveler had to 'halloo to the ferry' till he could make himself heard."

At first the toll roads were private enterprises and people had to pay toll for traveling upon them. The toll-gate keeper lived at the cross-roads and kept the highway closed with the "pole and sweep," so that travelers might not pass when he was not present. But the toll road has long since been a thing of the past and first-class free roads are to be found today. James Whitcomb Riley represents an old pioneer talking reminiscently at an Old Settlers' Meeting. This old man would represent a period of about thirty years ago, when Mr. Riley has him say:

> When we had to go on horseback, and sometimes on 'shanks mare,'
> And 'blaze' a road fer them behind that had to travel there.
> "Of the times when we first settled here, and travel was so bad.

And now we go a-trottin' 'long a level gravel pike,
In a big two-hoss road-wagon, jest as easy as you like;
Two of us on the front seat, and our wimmen-folks behind,
A-settin' in theyr Winsor cheers in perfect peace of mind!"

—Riley, James Whitcomb, Neighborly Poems, page 23, Indianapolis, 1891.

But today the picture which Mr. Riley describes would attract as much attention as would have the automobile and motorcycle of today attracted at that period.

PIONEER SCHOOLS AND CHURCHES.

Much has been said of the pioneer schools in another chapter. These schools were conducted in a private cabin, or in rude houses constructed for schools alone. They were built of logs, puncheon floor, if any floor at all, a fire place filling one end of the room. For light, greased paper was used.

For a graphic description of a pioneer school, see Mr. Macy's article.

Churches were not built until after private homes had been used in a community long enough to justify a church association. These churches were crude affairs, but they served the people well and were the means of bringing a spirit of love, fellowship and communion into the community.

The ministers of that day preached upon texts taken from the Bible and paid no attention whatever to questions outside the church proper. The hymn would be announced, the minister would "line" it, the leader would pitch the tune, and, with the congregation, sing the song. These songs were sung with a fervor and spirit that carried enthusiasm and conviction to all who sang and heard. They may have lacked harmony but they did not lack in spirit.

They left an impression never to be forgotten, and many a man and woman of today looks back upon the singing in the old days as one of the most effective means of worship.

THE GOOD OLD HYMNS.

There's a lot of music in 'em—the hymns of long ago,
And when some gray-haired brother sings the ones I used to know,
I sorter want to take a hand. I think of days gone by,
"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand and cast a wistful eye!"

There's lots of music in 'em—those dear sweet hymns of old,
With visions bright of lands of light and shining streets of gold;
And I hear 'em ringing—singing, where mem'ry, dreaming, stands,
"From Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strands."

They seem to sing forever of holier, sweeter days,
When the lilies of the love of God bloomed white in all the ways;
And I want to hear their music from the old-time meetin's rise
Till "I can read my title clear to mansions in the skies."

We never needed singin' books in them old days—we knew
The words, the tunes, of every one—the dear old hymn book through!
We didn't have no trumpets then, no organs built for show,
We only sang to praise the Lord "from whom all blessings flow."

An' so I love the old hymns, and when my time shall come—
Before the light of day has left me, and my singing lips are dumb—
If I can hear 'em sing them then, I'll pass without a sigh
To "Canaan's fair and happy land where my possessions lie."

QUESTIONS AND MANNERS OF THE FIRST ESTABLISHED HOME.

Much of the material given here concerning this subject is the direct result of experience of those who gave it, many years ago. These people lived in the county and knew exactly the customs, manners and conditions of themselves at that time; and if they differ from what they are today we must remember that the conditions and environments were very much different from what we have it.

Their manners today would in a way seem crude, but nevertheless they were as earnest and sincere as we can possibly be today.

They did the best that could be done under very trying circumstances and met the conditions fairly and squarely. For the most part they were honest and upright people and enjoyed a good time in the crude way of their time.

Much of the following was gotten from Mr. Martin A. Reeder, an old pioneer of the county, and Mr. Joseph Hawkins, who lived in Jay county at the time of these interviews. Mr. Hawkins was very familiar with Randolph county.

MANNER OF LIVING.

Some articles have been furnished by Hon. Martin A. Reeder, who has been a resident of the county for about sixty years, the substance of which is given below, with also some additions from other sources:

BUILDINGS.

Many would put up a "camp," and live in that for some weeks or months, and wait to build a cabin until the large trees had been cleared from a place extensive enough to prevent danger from the tree trunks falling on the house. Others would put up their cabins in the dense woods, with perhaps a dozen trees near, any of which might, in a storm of wind, have crushed the dwelling and all its inmates. And yet, though scores of cabins were erected thus, it is not known that a solitary tree ever threw its huge trunk upon the roof of a single settler's dwelling.

CABINS.

Cabins were built of round logs from eight to ten inches through, and covered with clapboards. They were of all sizes;—some perhaps twelve by fourteen feet, and some eighteen by twenty-five feet, with one seven or eight feet story and a loft above in the roof. A small cabin would have one door and one window. A large one might, perhaps, possess two of each. The chimney and fire-place would be wholly outside, opening of course into the house.

At the "raising" the neighbors for miles around were expected to come and lend their aid (who at first, were not many), and they went. No "shirks" were there. "Help me and I will help you," was their motto, and the rule was faithfully practiced.

On the "raising day" the body of the house would be completed and the roof put on. Cutting out the door and window holes, and the opening for the fire-place, putting in the doors and windows, building the fire-place and chimney, laying the puncheon floors, chinking and daubing the cracks between the logs, laying the loft, etc., were done by the owner at his pleasure as he had opportunity. Barns and outhouses were raised from time to time, so as not to tax the settlers too heavily.

These cabins, though not elegant, were, when properly completed, solid and substantial, and warm to boot; and many, many years of happy, contented, prosperous life have been spent within their lowly walls. And many who lived all their youthful years in such a humble domicile but who have since become able to abide in stately mansions, can now truthfully declare that their happiest days were spent nevertheless beneath the shelter of those mighty, overshadowing forest trees, under the lowly roof of that old-time log-cabin. How true the words of the poet:

"'Tis not in titles, nor in rank,
'Tis not in wealth like London bank,
To make us truly blest."

Note.—Many of the early-built cabins had no windows at all. The door and the big, open-mouthed fire-place were the only avenues for light. It is within the knowledge of the writer of this sketch that families who emigrated from Carolina to Randolph county in 1847 had never seen any glass windows, and had no idea what they were for. Some houses dwelt in in 1846 had no windows.

The ideas of convenience then were not just like our own. In about 1850 the daughter of one of the earliest settlers said of a certain new house that she occupied (with her large family), "the room is so convenient [the house had but one room] we can set up six beds in it."

HOW TO BUILD A "CAMP"—BY JOSEPH HAWKINS.

"Have a big log, cut notches up and down the log fourteen feet apart, set double stakes fourteen feet out from the log, cut small logs six to eight inches thick, 'scafe' off the ends so as to fit the notches in the log, put one end in the notch and the other between the stakes; in the notch let the ends touch, but put blocks between the other ends, so as to make the upper one slant enough for the roof, put some logs atop of the big log and some across the front above; put on the roof, and stuff the cracks with moss.

Moss was plenty on the old logs, as thick as a cushion and as soft as a sheepskin; you could tear off a sheet as long as a bed-quilt if you wished. We often used sheets of moss for blankets to ride on instead of a saddle. The front of the camp was open six feet high, and logs were across above. A log heap fire was built in front on the ground. At first we left it unprotected, but the smoke would sweep into the camp and choke us so that we could not stay. Then we took puncheons and set them upright in a semi-circle around (outside of) the fire, leaving passages next the camp to go in and out at. This mended matters greatly. We lived in this camp from March until November, 1829. We cleared that summer nine acres—five for early corn and four for late corn, potatoes, turnips, etc.

The men had built three camps side by side against the same log, expecting to have three families. Only two came, and that left two camps for us. There were eight in our family, and the two older boys fixed a bed in the extra camp, and the rest of us slept (in three beds) in our own proper camp."

HOUSES.

The houses were made strong in this way. The loft was constructed of split logs, and the doors of split timbers three or four inches thick, with battens fastened across and hung on strong wooden hinges, having also a strong wooden bar across the door inside, fastened at each end by the fork of a tree put into the door casing by a hole bored with a large auger.

To break into such a house as that would be by no means easy, yet the dwellings were seldom locked. Such a thing as entering a house unlawfully, was well-nigh unknown.

FURNITURE.

This country lies far interior, away from all water-courses, those old-time channels of inter-communication. Emigrants could reach this county only by a long and tedious stretch of wagon road and forest trail. Hence, the settlers brought with them commonly only the most necessary things, and especially those for which no substitute could be found in the new land; kettles, ironware, etc., must be brought, since nothing could be found in the West to take their place. Bedsteads, chairs and tables were useful, but they were also heavy and bulky, and awkward to move, and substitutes could be found, and they were, in many cases, left behind.

Feather beds, bedding, pewter ware, cooking utensils, etc., were brought. But for bedsteads, the settlers made something which answered the purpose. Two rails with one end inserted in the side and end logs of the cabin, meeting in a post at the inner corner driven into the ground, with clapboards laid across from the side rail to a strip pinned upon the log, would do for a bedstead. One active young wife made one for herself by boring holes in some poles and making two benches, and laying eight large, thick clap-boards upon them, and lo! she had a bedstead; and on went her straw bed, all the bed she had, and her sheets and bed quilts; and she was never prouder of anything in her life than she was of her bedstead and her bed, nice and good and brand new.

Sometimes, for an extra nice "fixing," men would split out pieces from a straight-grained oak, and make bed rails, and prepare other pieces for the slats, boring auger holes in the side rail and in the side house log, and putting the slats in these, and that was good and solid. Four high posts would stand at the corners, and rods or wires be strung from top to top of the four posts, and curtains would be hung on the rods; and who could wish a neater curtained bed than that? Often two of these would be made for a single cabin, one in each farthest corner; one for the father and mother, and the other for company; and the children—why, they had to go into the loft, and sleep under the rafters to the music of the rain falling on the roof, or of the snow rattling on the clapboards. And that was a jolly place to sleep. And instead of chairs were made puncheon stools, and puncheon benches, which last were better than chairs or stools either, since half a dozen urchins could sit upon one. And as for chairs or stools at the table, they were not needed, inasmuch as all the half grown boys and girls had feet, and they stood up at the table, like folks at a modern Sunday-school celebration picnic dinner; and almost every article of convenience that settlers had they made for themselves. Door hinges and latches were made of wood, and a string sufficed to raise the latch; and to pull the string inside was better than a lock, because no false key could pick the lock or unbolt the door. A poking stick answered for tongs, and some stones on the hearth did instead of andirons; and, as for stoves, those articles had not been invented yet, or, if they had, it would cost so much to haul the bulky things of the sort which were called stoves in those days into these western wilds, that when here, the cost would be more than that of a forty-acre lot.

FOOD, COOKING, ETC.

The people of the present time will doubtless be glad to learn how the pioneers managed (not merely to raise or earn, but) to make their bread in those days when stoves and ranges, and all the modern paraphernalia of baking and cooking were not. Bread was made mostly of cornmeal, and in three forms, viz: "Dodgers," "Pone," and "Johnny Cake." To the people now all these three are reckoned as one; but to the pioneer, they were entirely distinct, yet all excellent of their kind, and either or all good enough to make "a pretty dish to set before the king."

"Dodgers" were made of meal with pure water and a little salt, mixed into a stiff dough, and molded with the hand into a kind of oval cake, and baked in a "bake-pan" or "Dutch-oven," viz., a round iron vessel as wide across as a half-bushel, or less, and six or eight inches deep, with legs, of course, and a lid with a raised rim to hold coals on the top. The coals were put in abundance underneath the "oven," and on the top as well; and when the bread was done there came out the "dodgers," as moist, as sweet, as nice as epicure ever saw.

"Pone" was made with meal, water and salt, with the addition of milk or cream and yeast, thinner than dodgers, and was baked in the same way.

"Johnny Cake" was made with lard and butter, water and salt of course, and baked in a loaf or cake, say six inches wide and an inch thick, upon a board perhaps two feet long set up before the fire. When one side was baked enough the other side of the cake was turned to the fire till it was done, and then you would have perhaps the sweetest and best corn bread ever made. Besides these there were grated corn, pounded hominy, lye hominy, green corn (roasting ears), etc. Corn has been well said to be the poor man's grain, and on account, among other things, of the ease with which it can be made into food, the variety of which it is capable, and the general excellence of the different kinds. Lye hominy and green corn, the two simplest forms of its preparation, are at the same time well-nigh the best and most delicious food that ever passed the lips of man.

After wheat had been raised, of course, some flour was used, but still for a long time corn was the chief source of bread. The mills were but poor, many of the first for grinding wheat having only hand bolts, and the flour would be none of the best. But you are not to think that the settlers were destitute of meat. On the contrary, they had abundance, and that of the best and rarest kinds. Deer, turkeys, pheasants and what not were plenty; and a good rifle would bring some of them down at almost any hour. To shoot turkeys standing in his cabin door was no uncommon exploit for the pioneer; and to bring down on an average, one deer a day, besides a full day's work, was what many a backwoods man succeeded in doing. Almost every settler (and settler's son) was a hunter as well, and those who did not care themselves to shoot deer could readily get all the venison they wished of their sportsman neighbors, and that almost for a song.

Then there were hogs, at first or very soon afterward. There were many "wild hogs," that were the offspring of such as had strayed from older settlements, or from the Indians, some of whom kept swine. These hogs were called "elm-peelers," and were long-legged, long-bodied, long-headed, sharp-snouted, with short, straight, pointed ears, and as nimble nearly as a wolf; and, when very wild, more savage than the bears themselves. They would make but a poor show (except as a curiosity) at one of our modern fairs, but at that time they were highly valued, even above the fat, unwieldly, helpless things called improved stock. When a "Yankee man" was trying to sell some improved breed to the western "hoosier" (or "sucker" it may be) and mentioned as an advantage that they could not run. "Can't run?" said the settler. "No," said the Yankee. "Don't want 'em," replied the "sucker." "My hogs have to get their own living and look out for themselves, and I would not give a snap for a hog that can't outrun a dog." So "improved stock" was then and there at a discount.

These woods-hogs would get fat only during "mast years," and sometimes the herds of hogs would get to be three or four years old and would become thoroughly wild and very savage, fleet of foot and almost as fierce as a tiger, so that hunters would be obliged to take to a tree to get beyond their reach. During the non-mast years these troops of swine would subsist upon roots, etc., such as hickory roots, sweet elm roots, slippery elm bark and such like. There was no hog-cholera then. Swine even now peel elm trees, eating the bark as high as they can get at it, and in such cases they seem clear of cholera. This habit of eating the bark from elm trees is what probably gave hogs in those days the name of "elm-peelers." When fatted on hickory and beech mast the meat was very sweet but oily, and would not make good bacon. Hunting wild hogs was grand sport, though somewhat dangerous withal.

Stock, especially hogs, ran wild in the woods and each man had his private stock mark. This mark was recorded in the recorder's office and became the way of marking one's stock. All other settlers must respect this mark under penalty of the law. There was a law at that time which said that if any one should mark a hog, shoat or pig, other than his own or change the mark on a hog, shoat or pig, other than his own, he should be fined in any sum not less than $—— and should have upon his or her bare back lashes not to exceed thirty-three in number. This penalty would indicate the opinion of the importance of stock protection at that time.

The first stock mark recorded in the county was by Christopher Baker. "This day Christopher Baker entered his stock mark as follows, towit: A smooth crop in the left ear and a slit in the same and an under bit in the right ear.

"May 31st, 1819. "C. CONWAY, Clerk."

Besides pork, as above described, and wild game, the streams abounded in fish; bass, salmon, pike, buffalo, red horse, white and black suckers, silver sides, catfish, etc., were plentiful in the streams, and men could have all they pleased to catch. Besides bread and meat, potatoes were soon raised, so as to furnish a full supply; as also pumpkins, squashes, cabbages, and other garden vegetables. But wheat, for several years, proved nearly a failure, so that flour, if used, had to be brought from the Miami or some other older settlement; and only a few could afford to take the trouble to get it, or cared to obtain it if they could.

But how was cooking (other than baking bread) done? This way: A stiff bar of iron-wood (or of iron itself) was fastened in the chimney lengthwise the fire-place, about midway from front to rear, and perhaps eight feet high, called the "lug-pole." On this bar were suspended several hooks of different lengths, made of small iron rods (or sometimes of wood). These hooks extended far enough downward so that the pots and kettles of various sizes would hang above the fire and close enough to it to receive the needful amount of heat. Thus, boiling of all kinds was done.

For roasting (or basting), a wooden pin was fastened over the fire-place, and from this pin the turkey, venison saddle, or what not, was hung by a string or a wire in front of the blazing fire-place. The side next the fire would soon be cooked, and, by turning it round and round, the whole would be done "to a turn," the gravy dripping out into a dish set below upon the hearth. Thus, with milk and butter in abundance after the first two or three years, with tree-sugar and molasses in profusion, with wild berries and plums, etc., with which the woods abounded, the settlers, after they once got started, had no lack. In fact, many things of which they had a plentiful supply, would now be reckoned (if they could be obtained at all) a wonderful luxury.

As to the supply of game and the readiness with which it could be gotten, it may be stated that one man has been known to kill nine deer in a single day, another has killed six. These are of course extreme cases, yet to kill a deer or two, half a dozen turkeys, and fifteen or twenty pheasants in a day was nothing uncommon for a single person.

To light the house, no gas nor kerosene, nor even tallow candles were needed. The huge fire-place would, for an ordinary purpose, give light enough. Some had a kind of contrivance consisting of a sort of dish or bowl with a nose or spout for the rag-wick to lie in. In the dish was melted tallow or lard, and the wick lay with one end in the melted lard, and the other up along the spout. This lamp would hang by a string in the middle of the room and well supplied the place of chandelier or astral. Sometimes a still simpler arrangement was employed, a broken saucer with some tallow or lard in it would have a piece of rag laid in as a wick, and your lamp was all complete. And for outdoor uses, the boys used to light themselves and their company to meetings or spelling schools, or to hunting sprees or "hoe down" parties, with torches, consisting of a handful of hickory bark. All that had to be done was to peel some bark as you went along, light the ends in the fire-place when about to start for home, and keep it whisking about as you went on. The more wind the better, though wind in those forest paths gave little trouble. A group of torches scattered along among the trees, flaring and dancing and flashing as they were waved hither and thither by their bearers, presented so picturesque a sight as in these artificial days can seldom be witnessed. A good torch-light was worth half a dozen lanterns any day (or any night rather).

CANDLES.

Candles were made by taking a wooden rod ten or twelve inches long, wrapping a line or cotton cloth around it, and covering it with tallow pressed around the stick with the hand.

Lamps were made by digging the inside from a large turnip, sticking up a stick in the center, about three inches long, with a strip of cloth around the stick, and turning melted lard, or deer's tallow, in until the rind was full. Often the great blazing fire-place gave light enough, and many an evening's work has been done with no other means of vision.

IMPLEMENTS.

The methods and means of work were simple enough. Trees were girdled and felled and cut into lengths with the ax. In fact the ax was to the settler the tool of all work. Without it he was helpless. With it he was a crowned king. With an ax and an augur and an old hand-saw he could make well-nigh anything. Rail-splitting was done with maul and wedge. Moving logs was done with a lever, or hand-spike, while one in a hundred or a thousand would boast a crow-bar. Clapboards were split out with a frow.

Puncheons were split with maul and wedge and shaped and smoothed with the ax, or with a large, long frow, suited to the purpose.

Flax was threshed by whipping the bundles on a barrel-head, or a block set endwise. It was spread and rotted and dried and "broke," and swingled (scutched), and hatcheled (hackled), the tow carded and the flax or the tow spun and reeled and spooled or quilled and warped and woven and colored and made up into garments.

Grain was hand-reaped or cradled and threshed with a flail or tramped on the ground with horses and cleaned with a sheet or a basket fan.

Hauling was done on a sled made out of "crooks" split from a tree-root. Plowing was done with a bar-share plow, which had only a wooden mold board. Hoes were huge, ungainly things, large enough to cut and dig "grubs" with.

Men traveled mostly on foot, or on horseback. Many a man went on foot to Fort Wayne or to Cincinnati to enter his land. One man entered three different forty-acre tracts and went on foot to Cincinnati for the purpose, several times except that one of the trips was made partly on horseback. Boys sixteen years old have tied up their money in a rag and gone on "Shank's mares" alone through the woods to make entry of land for father or mother or possibly for themselves.

Many a farm was tilled for years with a single horse, or even an ox. Not seldom a poor fellow's only horse would lie down and die and leave him in a "fix" indeed. However people were accommodating and a person could get help from his neighbors to the extent of their ability. Wagons were very scarce. To become the owner of a wagon was an event to reckon from as the beginning of a new era. One early settler says that in a space of two miles square, where resided perhaps thirty families, only two wagons were to be found. He says moreover, that the neighbors got up a milling expedition, taking a wagon with six horses and twelve bushels of grain. The horses were restive and wild and would not pull together and the wagon became fast in the mud and six men took a horse and a sack of grain apiece and "put out" for the mill, leaving the wagon in the mud-hole to be got out at some other time.

Thus our ancestors plodded on; slow and tedious and awkward their methods would now be reckoned, but honest, faithful, industrious, frugal, simple-hearted, sincere, hospitable and generous. They heroically accomplished the herculean tasks appointed to their lot and bore patiently and successfully the burdens which providence laid upon their shoulders. Let their posterity beware how they condemn the humble condition of their forefathers. Let this generation look back to those old-time scenes and to the worthy actors in them, not with a feeling of shame nor a sense of disgrace, but let them reckon it an honor to have sprung from a line of ancestry so noble, so excellent, so hardy and energetic, so worthy of sincere respect, nay, almost of reverence; and let them see to it that in methods of energetic labor and in heroic success in the employment of larger and better means of accomplishment, they prove themselves before the world to be worthy successors of their venerable progenitors.

CLOTHING.

Most of the settlers brought with them into the wilderness all they could afford to last them until more could be raised, at least to last for one year, and often for more than that. After a corn field and a truck patch must come a flax patch. When the flax became ripe it was pulled, threshed, spread, rotted, gathered up, broken, scutched, hackled, spun, woven and put on the back to wear. All the machinery needed for this work was a flax-brake, a scutching-board, a hackle, a spinning-wheel, a quill-wheel and winding blades, warping bars and loom, all of which were very simple and inexpensive and most of them could be made in the vicinity or even at home. And all the work, from sowing the seed to taking the last stitch upon the garment, was done upon the premises and much of it was performed as easily by the lads and the lassies as by the men and women themselves. The hackling of the flax produced tow. This tow was carded and spun, the flax was spun into "chain," and the tow into filling, and both were woven into "tow linen"; and out of this strong and not unsightly fabric many garments for summer wear were made, dresses for females being colored according to the taste and the males wearing theirs uncolored. For winter, people had sheep and took the wool, carding it by hand, spinning it on a "big wheel," and weaving it with linen or cotton warp (or chain) into "linsey-woolsey" or "jeans." The "linsey" was worn mostly by the women and the jeans by the men; sometimes the fabric was colored "butternut" and sometimes blue.

Cambrics, muslins, etc., were scarce and costly and rarely used. For outer garments men soon began to use deer-skins, making pantaloons and "hunting shirts." The latter was much like a modern sack coat and a very comfortable, though not especially handsome garment it proved itself. At first the buckskin was obtained ready dressed, of the Indians, but the settlers soon learned to prepare it themselves. The men had commenced to make and sew their own buckskin garments, the work being too hard for female fingers. The sewing was done with the sinews from the deer's legs or with a "whang," i. e., a thong or string cut from the deer hide, a shoemaker's awl, and a very large needle. These buckskin clothes were just the thing. They were within the reach of all, costing nothing but labor; they were very durable lasting for years; they were warm and as to looks, each man looked as well as his neighbor and what more is needed? And they were an almost perfect protection. The sting of the nettle, the scratch of the briers and even the bite of the rattlesnakes was harmless. The cockle-burs and the Spanish needles would not stick to them; they kept out the cold "like a charm," and, moreover, when properly dressed and neatly made, they presented by no means an unsightly appearance.

The garments were commonly made and worn large and free, which of course greatly added to their comfort and convenience. Sometimes, however, in standing near the fire a man would get his "breeches" hot and another in mischief would clap the hot buckskin to the flesh and the luckless wearer would jump with a yell and a bound clear across the room as though the great log fire was tumbling on him. Sometimes too they would get wet and if allowed to dry, the skin would become very hard and stiff and could not be used again till it had been softened by dampening and rubbing.

The Indians made moccasins and the settlers bought and wore them, being excellent for dry weather, winter or summer, but not for wet. For the wet season strong leather shoes were used, though many, especially the younger class, went much barefooted.

Upon the head the men wore in the winter chiefly a strong well-made, low crowned, broad-brimmed wool hat, somewhat like that which the older Quakers now wear. Sometimes a warm head-gear was made from a coon-skin. It was comfortable but looked wolfish. In summer home-made hats, braided from whole rye-straw grown for that purpose were in extensive use.

Women also made their bonnets out of straw, only each particular straw was split into five or six pieces by a "splitting machine."

This machine may be thus described: Narrow strips of tin were firmly set in a piece of wood an inch square and six inches long. The straw was spread open and drawn through these tin "teeth" and made into strips of equal width. Five of these strips (sometimes seven) were plaited into a braid, and the braid made long enough for a whole bonnet. The braid was ironed smooth (having been bleached if thought necessary), and nicely sewed into bonnets; and they looked equal in neatness (not to say taste) to the fashions of the present day.

Sun-bonnets were made much as at the present day, of calico, and pasteboard. The great object of a bonnet was at that time supposed to be to protect the face, head and neck from the sun, and the wind and the cold; and they were made accordingly. What a bonnet is for now is best known, perhaps, to the wearers; or, if they do not, how should anybody else be expected to know?

The fashions of that primitive time, doubtless, would seem awkward and uncouth at the present day; but the clothing answered the prime ends for which clothing is worn, decency and comfort, even better perhaps than the garments of the present day. And as to looks, folks were better satisfied with what they had then than people are now; and, if they were suited who had them to wear and to look at, surely we who are so far removed by two generations of time have no occasion to complain.

It can be truly affirmed that underneath those coats and hunting shirts, uncouth in looks and awkward in fit, dwelt souls brave and generous and hearts tender and kind, loyal, affectionate and true. God grant that the same may ever be truly declared of their children and their children's children while the ages roll. Fashions may come and fashions may go, but what matter, so the deep fountain of love and truth and faithfulness in the human soul remains pure, untarnished and perennial.

TRADING.

Money was scarce, little indeed, was needed, for, as has been shown, almost every necessity and luxury was produced at home. Some money, however, was necessary, chiefly to pay taxes and to buy iron and salt, powder and lead. Taxes indeed for many years were low. The first county tax levied in Randolph was "twenty-five cents upon each horse-beast." The first settlement of the treasurer showed as follows:

In May, 1819—

Receipts	$20.00
Expenditures	20.00
Balance	00.00

In November, $260.00 were the receipts and $259.75 the disbursements. In 1820 the county treasury boasted of $462.63, $309.63 of which were realized from the sale of lots, and $1 from a fine, leaving $152.00 as the avails of county taxation in a single county for a whole year. And up to 1829 the annual county taxes still fell short of $900.00. So "taxes" required but a small amount of the "needful." But iron and salt and powder and lead were indispensable and heavy and costly. They took money and abundance of it, or its equivalent.

As a specimen of the costliness of articles in those times, the statement is made that Benjamin Bond, who came to Wayne county in 1811, gave for nails twenty-five cents a pound and paid for them in cordwood cut upon his land just west of New Garden meeting-house in Wayne county at twenty-five cents a cord upon the ground, a cord of wood for a pound of nails!

Once in western Pennsylvania in the long, long ago, a horse was given for a barrel of salt, and at another time (in this region) eighteen dollars was given for a bushel. Money could be obtained, indeed, though not largely. Deer skins would bring fifty cents; raccoon skins, thirty-seven and a half cents and muskrats, twenty-five cents. The fur buyer when he came his annual round would pay cash, but the merchants paid only in trade. If the settler would wait for the fur buyer, he could have the cash, if not, he must "dicker" it out and let the merchant finger the cash himself.

Deer must be killed from May till November and raccoons and muskrats from December till April. So the hunter had his harvest all the year round, only, if he wanted money, he must store up till the fur-dealer came. But necessaries could be gotten at any time. And these were comparatively few, though somewhat expensive. A side of sole leather and of upper leather, a barrel of salt, powder and shot for hunting, some fish hooks and perhaps an ax would suffice for a whole year. For land buying some money was required of course and after the "specie-circular" in the spring of 1837, only silver (for gold was not then in circulation, being before the days of California, dear, and of course scarce, or more properly speaking, not in ordinary use as money at all) was available and hard work indeed it often was to obtain the needful.

One (now old) man tells of the strait he was put to at the time when that famous "specie circular" came in force. He was a lad of eighteen years. Having had his eye for a long time upon a fine sugar camp near his father's dwelling but without money enough for his purpose, he heard that another man intended to "enter" the tract. Hurrying to gather up funds for that and for some more land desired by his father, he set out on foot and alone, carrying his money tied in a knot in his pocket handkerchief most of the way in his hand, bound for the land office at Fort Wayne. The money was largely in paper and in just three days the "specie circular" was to come in force. He hoped to reach Fort Wayne by that time and struggled on. But he could not "make it." The third night found him at St. Mary's, a few miles short. The next day he entered the land office, not knowing what he could do, fearing the worst yet hoping the best. The receiver happened to be an acquaintance of his father's and agreed to take his "paper money." And so he made his point and got his land. And then afoot and alone he wended his way homeward again without money only as he borrowed two dollars of his friend, the receiver, but happy in possession of the certificate which would in due time bring for him a patent under the "Broad Seal" of the United States of America. The reason why he was found thus with no money to go home on was this: He supposed that the tract of land he wished to enter was an "80 acre" piece. It was 84, which would take exactly $5.00 extra, so the question came up, "Will you take all your money and get your land or will you save your money and not purchase?" He had come too far to go back with his object all unaccomplished, and the young hero decided that he would have the land and get home as he could. And have it he did and under the generous offer of his friend, the receiver, he accepted the loan of two dollars to pay his expenses homeward. It is a pleasant thing to note that, though this boy (and his father) were ardent Whigs of that olden time and the receiver was a Van Buren Democrat, he befriended the boy nevertheless like the frank and genial man that he was.

AMUSEMENTS.

Wherever there are human beings there will be amusements. Thousands of years ago a prophet foretold that Jerusalem should be rebuilt and that the streets "should be full of boys and girls playing in the midst thereof." Wherever there are boys and girls there will be playing and men and women are only grown-up children. The sports of the settlers were generally of the more active kind as jumping, wrestling, running races, with frequently a "hoe-down" at an evening merry-making, after a raising or a log-rolling, or a spinning bee or some other gathering for work and assistance.

An invitation would be given to the men and boys to come and help roll logs or to raise a building or something like that, and to the women to come and bring their spinning wheels. Both classes would go. The men would roll logs or what not and the women would spin. At nightfall supper would be served and then for a frolic by such as pleased to take part in it, which would doubtless be fast and furious, since those who participated were stalwart lads and buxom lasses and in sober truth "all went merry as a marriage bell." And not seldom the women would carry their spinning wheels as they went and returned on foot.

Applecuttings, husking-bees and spelling schools were also favorite pastimes. Applebutter was one of the staples of life and when the apples were ground and cider made young people would be invited to help "peel apples" and help prepare for the "picnic." The young people would gather from miles around and enjoy the evening as only young people in the bloom of life could enjoy themselves. After the work was done, the "hoe-down" or some other amusement, was indulged in until a late hour, when all would go home to meet at another place perhaps the next evening.

Corn was snapped, that is, pulled from the stalk, husks and all, and hauled to the barn to be husked later on. Neighbors would be invited to the husking-bees and all would have a time of merriment while performing this work. Fortunate indeed was the man who husked the red ear.

There have been indeed more harmful sports than these backwoods-balls, especially if they were kept free from the mischievous presence of and disturbing power of intoxicating drinks (which was not always the case), since they were for the most part simply lively methods of working off a superabundance of animal spirits, which mere hard work outdoors or indoors could not subdue.

Then for the boys hunting served the purpose both of hard work and high sport as well for to chase the bounding deer through the leafy woods or to wait and watch for his forest lordship as his kingly horns would come tossing proudly among the waving boughs and to bring his active form to the earth with the unerring shot of the faithful rifle amid the wild baying of the eager hounds as they gathered to be "in at the death,"—these wild and fiery hunts were for these rollicking boys the keenest of sports. And thus it was—

"Mid earnest work and furious play
The youngsters passed their lives away."

The spelling school was the great event of winter evenings. Spelling was indulged in by old and young and unfortunate indeed was the man who could not spell in these contests. Sometimes it was class against class, but more often one school against another. The interest taken in these spelling matches was very intense and the little old school house would be crowded to suffocation. If the contest was one school against another the members of each school would line themselves on opposite sides of the room. If it were not a contest between any particular communities, the leaders would be selected and these would choose alternately of all the people present; these would line up on either side of the house and the contest would begin.

The master or the squire or perhaps the minister, at least some one of influence, would pronounce words first to one side then to the other; if a word was misspelled it went to the opposite side and so on until spelled correctly. All those having missed it would be retired. And so the contests would continue until but one would remain on the floor. The master would frequently pronounce word after word and page after page and sometimes the entire spelling book before all the spellers would be "down." Under conditions of that kind a special list of words would be given, or perchance the dictionary would be resorted to. Spellers were so well acquainted with the books of the time that frequently they could spell page after page without the word even being pronounced.

The writer knows of two men who at one time spelled "McGuffy's" entire book without having a word pronounced. This seems an exaggerated story but many a man knows it is true, having heard it done.

The spelling school over, the young lads would line themselves up at the door ready to ask to see her home, fearful of getting "the mitten" and receiving the jeers of his companions. But more usually it was the case of "the longest way home is the nearest and best."

Visiting was indulged in a great deal of Sundays and evenings. There being no newspapers, the only method of communication was by meeting either at the church or school house or in the home. After the supper work was done, the husband would hitch the team to the sled and all would go over to neighbor Browns to spend the evening. Neighbor Brown and family were always glad to see them and a pleasant evening was enjoyed. Innocent games were indulged in by the younger people while the elders exchanged ideas of a more serious nature. The mother would take her knitting and spend an evening of usefulness as well as pleasure. The party would soon be divided, mutually, into groups.

"Soon was the game begun. In friendly contention the old men Laughed at each lucky hit, or unsuccessful manoeuvre, Laughed when a man was crowned, or a breach was made in the king-row."

For the children:

"Between the andiron's spraddling feet,
The mug of cider simmered slow,
The apples sputtered in a row,
And, close at hand, the basket stood
With nuts from brown October's wood."

They

"sped the time with stories old, Wrought puzzles out and riddles told."

While, perchance with the young folk:

"Meanwhile apart, in the twilight gloom of a window's embrasure, Sat the lovers and whispered together, beholding the moon rise."

The evening was soon past and only too soon was it necessary to make the return trip. Happy indeed were the people of those times, because they sought for real pleasure and found it at their own command.

RELIGION.

But not all even of the young spent their leisure hours in sport. For many, very many the religious exercises of those earliest days of primitive simplicity were more satisfying as they were certainly more profitable than any form of mere worldly pleasure could possibly be. Great numbers of the first settlers of Randolph were men and women of a strong and earnest religious faith and of a hearty, loving spirit, fearing God and delighting to do good to men.

The earliest religious meetings were probably of the Friends or the Methodists, possibly the former, though which ever may have been first, the other was not far behind.

Perhaps the earliest houses of worship through the county were built by the Friends, the one at Arba being the first, those at Lynn, Jericho, White River, Dunkirk, Cherry Grove and perhaps some others, following not long after in point of time. The Methodist meetings were held mostly at first in private houses, as Mr. Bowen's in Greensfork near Arba; Mr. McKim's at Spartanburg; Mr. Marshall's in Ward township; Mr. Hubbard's and Mr. Godwin's in Green township and so on. Other denominations also gathered congregations in various parts, as: The Disciples, the United Brethren, the Christians, the Protestant Methodists, the Baptists, the Presbyterians and in latter days the Anti-Slavery Friends, the Wesleyans, as also the African Methodist Episcopal church and perhaps others.

Some of the Methodist churches were built very early as the chapel west of Deerfield, the Prospect meeting house east of Deerfield, Macksville, etc.

In early times many protracted meetings were held and several camp-meetings at some of which remarkable seasons of religious awakening were witnessed and many souls were brought to repentance and forgiveness. Many preachers too have been prominent and successful in their labors for Christ. Protracted meetings are still employed (in addition to regular Sabbath and other stated work), as a powerful and efficient means for the spread of religious knowledge and the impression of the public mind with religious truth. Camp-meetings are also (though more rarely) held, since the altered condition of society renders them less a matter of necessity or convenience than formerly. Almost every neighborhood now has commodious churches, large enough to hold the congregations who desire to gather for Divine worship. There are indeed in various places in the county groves which have been furnished with seats, etc., for the convenience of meetings; and, during the pleasant Sabbaths of summer out-door meetings are occasionally held in them. But immense crowds now are rarely seen except upon very unusual occasions.

In the simple-heartedness of those early times the people are thought, by the aged veterans who can remember what took place forty, fifty or sixty years ago to have been more warm-hearted and whole-souled in their religious feelings and convictions than they are to-day. However that may be, religion, to those who then professed it was a serious business and they made thorough work of it. Women would take a babe in their arms and the husband a three-year-old child in his, while together they would go cheerfully on foot for miles to the place appointed for divine service. The daughter of the first settler of the county stated that she often when a "girl in her teens," walked from near Arba to Newport to Friends' meetings (at least six miles), and was not aware of having done anything worthy of especial mention. A young Friend at Cherry Grove would rise at 3 a. m. and work several hours in his field and then ride on horseback sixteen miles to week-day Friends' meeting. Children, ten, twelve, even sixteen years of age would go "barefoot" to church and young women and mothers would carry their shoes until near the church, when they would put them on and wear them until a short distance on their return, at which time they would take them off and go "barefoot" home. A Methodist circuit rider would go his round once a month, riding frequently hundreds of miles during the time and having an appointment every day and not seldom one at night besides. The preacher honored his calling then and to be a Methodist circuit rider meant to go to work at preaching and to have plenty of it to do; and to their honor it should be said that as a rule they performed a great amount of ministerial labor, and that, according to the full measure of their ability, they served the gracious Lord in His vineyard in their appointed lot. And those old-time ministers of Christ have, one by one, lain down to their final rest and their souls have gone home to receive the gracious welcome, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

And true it is that the simple-hearted worship offered and the instruction given in those rude and uncouth cabins was to the full as acceptable to the Great Father of all our mercies as is any now-a-days to be met within the grand and magnificent piles of brick and stone that pass for houses of worship in these later days. Linsey woolsey home- spun and deer-skin hunting shirts, calico sun bonnets and coon-skin head-gear were as pleasing to the eye of the Omniscient as can any rich and costly methods and fashions be which the descendants of that honest, sturdy, faithful race of sterling men and loving women feel themselves called upon now to indulge or to practice.

It is indeed a comfort to the pure and humble soul, in all ages and places, to know and feel the blessed truth, that while "man looketh upon the outward appearance, God looketh on the heart"; that the Good Shepherd knoweth His sheep and leadeth them in peace into the green pastures of His love.

It is an interesting reminiscence of those pioneer days that as late as 1840 this veteran mail carrier for nearly thirty years on the route north from Winchester used to take, on a horse led by his side, a heavy sack of silver money, sometimes to the amount of five thousand dollars to six thousand dollars at a time for payment at the Ft. Wayne land office for land entries at that point. He would camp out one night as he went, yet he was never molested and to the honor of the veteran who did this no man ever lost a cent by unfaithfulness of his. Night and day, summer and winter, through mud, snow and rain, whether sweltering in a July sun or shivering in a December snow storm, swimming the swollen streams faithfully and untiringly, heroically did that conservitor of the United States mail press onward from south to north and from north to south alternately, growing old but not rich in his countrys service and only leaving that department of work to enlist in the army at the commencement of the war of 1861.

One of his stopping places was at the residence of Edmund Edger in Deerfield. Mr. Connor would usually get to Mr. Edger's about dark and would take the money from the sack and put it under the house through a trap door. This trap door was in the floor and covered by a rag carpet. Mr. Connor or Mr. Edger never felt any uneasiness about the money being disturbed.

This not only indicates the honesty and faithfulness of such men as these but indicates the honesty of all the people among whom Mr. Connor had to stop or travel.

May the day be long deferred when such integrity, though found among the poor and lowly shall fail to receive its due honor in the hearty esteem of the public in whose behalf such untiring faithfulness has been done.

All honor to him through many long years of weariness and privations and toil faltered not in the path of public duty, heroically performing what was then so indispensable to the public welfare and for accomplishing which needed result no better and easier method had then been discovered.

The writer of this article was searching in the basement of the court house a few months ago, and among other old books, found a day book that had belonged to E. B. Goodrich who had come to this country in 1831. Mr. Goodrich had written a letter in this old book and evidently had forgotten to tear it out and mail it.

This reflects the experience and attitude of the early settlers so well that we shall quote it here:

"We arrived at our present place on White River, Randolph county, Indiana, on the _____ day of _____, after a long and tedious journey. We arrived here without any lives being lost or limbs broken and that is all we can say. If I was to tell you of the many difficulties we had to encounter in moving here, extreme cold weather, dangerous roads, in consequence of ice you would hardly believe me and therefore I shall say nothing about it. We are all in good health and spirits and are well pleased with the country as far as we have as yet seen."

This letter shows the spirit of thousands and thousands of the pioneers and all honor to the men and women who were willing to brave the dangers and hardships to make this country what it is.

Of the character of these first pioneers, no better portrayal can be made than in the eloquent tribute of Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones to the father of Abraham Lincoln.

"Only he who knows what it means to hew a home out of the forest; of what is involved in the task of replacing mighty trees with corn; only he who has watched the log house rising in the clearing and has witnessed the devotedness that gathers around the old log school house and the pathos of a grave in the wilderness can understand how sobriety, decency, aye, devoutness, beauty and power belong to the story of those who began the mighty continent. In pleading for a more just estimate of Thomas Lincoln, I do but plead for a higher appreciation of that stalwart race who pre-empted the Mississippi Valley to civilization, who planted the seed that has since grown school houses and churches unnumerable. They were men not only of great hearts, but of great heads, aye, women, too, with laughing eyes, willing hands and humble spirits."

REMINISCENCES.

Much of the following chapter on the Reminiscences of the Earliest Settlers, are the reminiscences actually taken from what is known as the Tucker history and to which we are indebted. These reminiscences were taken first hand by Mr. Tucker and as these pioneers have long since gone to their reward, the utterances will be all the more valuable. Their experiences, joys, pleasures, hardships and privations could only be known to them, and can only be appreciated when read in their own language, for they were indeed the only ones who could properly interpret the drama of their life. It is not attempted to give these in chronological order but rather as an expression of experiences as they came to the minds of those to whom we are under such a great obligation. In this country with our modern homes with all their conveniences, with well-improved farms and conveniences made possible by modern machinery and devices, with rapid transportation on highway and rail, with the present methods of communications by letter or by wire, it is utterly impossible for us to know the hardships and privations undergone by them. Their story is the story common in the great middle west. The experiences given here by a few only, reflect the experiences of thousands upon thousands of the early settlers and pioneers of this country. Their story is the story of all, their experiences, the experiences of all their labor, the labor common to all; their society, the society of all; their gift to posterity is the gift common from all, to those of the present generation. These reminiscences are given years after the events had occurred and perhaps time had changed their color. Repetitions had no doubt altered the story they had to tell, yet they portray truthfully the experiences of these people. Let us be slow to criticise, because we know little or nothing of what they had to undergo.

The following reminiscences by old and early settlers concerning their pioneer life in Randolph county and elsewhere, were written from their own lips, mostly in their own language. Care has been taken to have all the matter in these narratives fresh and unique, the same thing not being repeated, each pioneer's tale giving some fact or phase not found in any other.

Most of these sketches are from the original settlers, and from those who came when the land was heavily laden with dense, unbroken forests, and the country was still a wild and unpeopled waste.

Some of the "sketches" are arranged for the most part, though not entirely, in the order of time.

Some of the "sketches" contain incidents that occurred outside of Randolph county, yet in connection with persons who have been at some period residents thereof. This portion of the work might have been greatly enlarged.

JESSE PARKER, 1814.

son of Thomas W. Parker, first settler, April, 1814, and long of Bethel, Ind., but dying November, 1881, near Lynn, Randolph county.

"The Indians were thick all around us, but they were civil and peaceable and friendly. They would help the settlers raise cabins, bring us turkeys and venison, etc. Three wigwams were in sight of our cabin. We children had great sport with the young Indians, and they were then almost or quite our only playmates.

A squaw once scared me nearly to death. I had gone to drive a calf home to its pen. The calf was near one of the wigwams; I felt skittish (this was before I had became so familiar with them), but the calf had to be brought and I had to do it, for children had to mind in those days. So how about the calf? This way—I got around it and started it for the pen, and away we went, calf and boy, when, hallo! out popped a squaw full tilt after me! She had jumped behind a tree and stuck out what I took to be a gun, and as I came near she bounced after me. My legs flew, you may guess; I could keep up with the calf with the squaw after me. She chased me home, she was tickled well-nigh to death, and I was scared nearly out of my wits. I thought I could feel the ball hit me; but she had no gun, it was only a stick, and she was in fun. But there was no going around nettles then; they flew like sticks in a whirlwind, and she came rushing after me, parting the brush as she came! The Indians would often come slipping around watching for deer, and would carry the dead deer to their wigwams. The squaws would dress the venison and jerk the meat and dress the skins for leather.

The Indians wore paint and all their war equipments, which made them look frightful enough. But we soon got used to them, as they were very friendly. As the country settled up, they went farther back—Winchester, Macksville, Windsor—and then to Smithfield, Muncie and Anderson. They would pass back and forth on their trails, bringing moccasins, etc., to trade for iron, salt, corn, etc., for their use.

There were many rattlesnakes, yet but few people ever got bitten by them.

Father settled April, 1814; John W. Thomas and Clarkson Willcutts, farther north during the summer, and October 22, 1814, Ephraim Bowen drove up to father's door, and he went still farther up Nolan's Fork, and the farthest north of any. North and northwest was an endless wilderness, except a few soldiers at Fort Wayne and Fort Dearborn and Green Bay and Mackinaw.

At first it seemed lonely, but neighbors came gradually, and the blue smoke of their cabins could be seen curling up among the forest trees, as we followed the 'blazes' from hut to hut.

The settlers who had come in by 1819 were these: Thomas Parker, John W. Thomas, Clarkson Willcutts, Ephraim Bowen, Ephraim Overman, Eli Overman, John Schooly, Seth Burson, Nathan Overman, Joshua Small, George Bowles, Jesse Small, Jonathan Small, David Bowles, James Cammack, John Cammack, John Jay, Isaac Mann, John Mann, William Mann, Stephen Thomas, Elijah Thomas, Stephen Williams, etc., etc.

We settled near (east of) the old (Wayne's) boundary. Game was plenty—deer, opossum, coons, turkeys, crows, wildcats, catamounts, bears, wolves, etc. The wolves would come near the door at night to pick up the crumbs, though precious little they found to pick, except the bones. Stephen Williams built a wolf-pen. Sometimes a wolf would get caught, and there would be fun. They would put a dog into the pen, and the wolf would whip the dog quick enough. The wolves would howl till one could not sleep for their noise.

Our bedsteads had but one post, and they needed no more. The rails were bored into the logs of the house, and met in one post at the corner. But we slept first rate. The floor was puncheon, the door was one big puncheon, the loft was boards laid on poles, or often none at all. We would climb into the loft by a ladder, and slept under the roof to the music of the rain on the shingles. The fire-place was cut out six or eight feet long; the back and jambs were dirt beaten in and puncheons outside. the chimney was sticks and clay; the table was a puncheon upon poles laid on forks; the chairs were rough stools, or we had none, or sat on puncheon benches; yet we were happy and full of glee. Our diet was splendid—venison, turkey, roasted coon, fat possum, bear steak, roasted squash, sweet potatoes, pumpkins, corn bread baked on a hoe, or a lid, or a board, johnny-cake, or dodger bread, all good. Health and hunger make the best sauce, and we had them both. Then we had pounded hominy, and lye hominy fit to set before a king.

About my schooling: It was not much, picked up in the woods. The neighbors joined and put up a cabin for church and school, the first of the kind in the county. The first school was taught by Eli Overman, and I attended it and was there the first day. My first book was a primer, and my next (and my last) was Noah Webster (spelling book).

The house had a puncheon floor and door, a puncheon to write on, scalped off smooth with the 'pitching ax.' The benches were split poles with legs. Not a plank, nor a shingle, nor a brick, nor a nail, nor a pane of glass was in the whole house. The nails were pegs, the bricks were dirt, the planks were puncheons, the shingles were clapboards, the glass was greased paper over a crack for light, and the bigger boys got the wood for fuel. They had not far to go; the mighty giants stood huge, grim and frowning, stretching far and wide their monstrous arms as if to reach down and devour us. I tell you, the way the men and women (and the boys and girls, too) made the work hop around was a wonder—a sight to behold. Log-rolling would begin and keep on twenty or twenty-five days, people helping one another all around. Raising cabins, chopping trees, rolling logs, clearing land, splitting rails, making fences, plowing, planting and what not, kept folks busy enough for weeks and weeks the whole year through. People would go miles to help their neighbors; one could hear the ax ring or the maul go crack, crack, or the trees come crashing down, from morning till night, all over the woods. The loom and the wheel were heard in every cabin; the giant oaks, and the kingly sugar maples and the mighty beeches could be seen bowing their proud and stately heads, and coming heavily, helplessly down on every hand. The girls spun and the women wove and made the clothing, and took care of the family. Now, the first thing when a couple get married, is a hired girl, and the next thing a piano.

We had hard times, indeed, in those grand old days amid the majestic, overshadowing forest. And now, how changed! And what shall sixty-six years more of time, stretching forward into the dim and wondrous future, accomplish for those who shall look on those coming days? We who have borne the brunt of the hardy past—how few we stand, how swift our passage to the opening tomb! The rising race—what do they know? They complain of hard times, forsooth! Then, it was the ax, the maul, the iron sledge-hammer, the flail, the brake, the swingling-board, the hatchet, the 'cards,' the wheel, the reel, the winding blades, the loom. If we went anywhere, it was on foot, or on horseback, or even on oxback, or on rough, home-made sleds. And now these things are fled, and the faithless ones of the present day will scarcely believe that such things are any more than idle tales made up to beguile the weary hours in the telling; yet they are true, as the few old pioneers know full well.

The Indians helped father raise his cabin. There was no one else to help. He covered his 'camp' with bedclothes and brush the first night. We crept into our cabin under the end logs the first night after it was built because no door hole had been cut. Father and mother went to Friends' meeting at New Garden (probably) the next 'First Day' after they moved into the forest, seven miles through the woods. John Peelle and Francis Thomas, at New Garden pole-cabin meeting-house, one day, swapped pants, and Peelle kept the ones he got, and was buried in them, April 21, 1879. The swap took place about 1813, so that he must have kept those 'pants' about sixty-six years.

The Pucketts were eight brothers. Four settled near Dunkirk. Daniel settled near New Port, Benjamin lived a few years in Randolph, but moved to Morgan county, Ind., in 1826.

We crossed the Ohio at Cincinnati, on a flat-bottomed boat, that was pulled over by a rope stretched across the river.

There were just three pole-cabins in Richmond with families living in them, and one with goods for sale. The families were John Smith, Jere Cox and Robert Hill.

Robert Hill had the store. Mother sold him some 'slaies,' reeds for weaving, for some muslin and other 'traps.'

Francis Thomas lived near the toll-gate below Newport, perhaps. My father and John W. Thomas went up to Nolan's Fork and picked out their 'places.' Parker moved to his land first; Thomas next, and afterward Clarkson Willcutts.

Thomas Parker sold out to John James, and bought out Clarkson Willcutts, and Willcuts bought elsewhere.

The squaw who scared me so and chased me through the brush, was so 'tickled' at my terrible 'scare' that she could not tell mother what she had done, for laughing. She fell down on the cabin floor, and laughed and laughted, and kept on laughing; and to mother's question, she only pointed her finger at me as she lay there, and burst out laughing again; and I stood there, as mad as a lad of my age could well be, at the squaw, for scaring me so terribly, and then laughing herself well-nigh to death over the fun she had got out of me."

MRS. CELIA ARNOLD (PARKER).

Mrs. Celia Arnold, daughter of Thomas W. Parker, first settler of Randolph (who is now living at Arba, Ind.), and sister of Jesse Parker, being one of the three children who belonged to the family of the first emigrant to the Randolph woods. She says, "I was born in 1811, married Benjamin Arnold in 1830, and have had five children, three of whom are living. My husband died 12th month, 11th day, 1878, aged seventy-two years. He was born 3d month, 11th day, 1807. He came to Randolph county in 1823, being the son of William Arnold.

As we were coming to Indiana, our wagon upset and scraped my wrist. Two families, John Thomas and Thomas Parker, came all the way in the same wagon, nine in all, and some of the way Thomas Willcutts and his wife and five children. [NOTE.—David Willcutts, later of Newport, Ind., Thomas Willcutts' youngest son came with us.] All these did all the riding they did on the one wagon. We brought beds and cooking utensils, and one chair (for mother). She died in 1823. I used, when a girl in my teens, to go on foot to New Garden, six and a half miles, to meeting. I have done it many a time, and did not consider myself as having done anything worthy of special mention."

SQUIRE BOWEN, 1814.

"The 'Quaker Trace' was begun in 1817. James Clark, with twenty-five or thirty men, started with three wagon loads of provisions, as also a surveyor and chain, etc., and they marked 'mile trees,' and cut the road out enough for wagons to pass. They wound around ponds, however, and big logs and trees, and quagmires, fording the Mississinewa above Allensville, Randolph county, and the Wabash just west of Corydon, Jay county, and so on to Fort Wayne. My brother James and myself first went to Fort Wayne (with a four-horse team) in 1820. James himself had been the trip a year or so before that. We took our feed along for the whole trip, as there was but one house from one mile north of Spantanburg to Fort Wayne, viz., at Thomson's Prairie, eight miles north of Wabash river. At Black Swamp we had to wade half-leg to knee deep, walking to drive (we always had to do that). After that first trip, we always took oxen, generally three yoke for a team. No feed was needed for the oxen, for they could be turned out to pick their living. Our load was commonly about 2,500 pounds of bacon, flour, etc. Bacon would be 10 to 12 cents a pound, and flour $7 to $8 a barrel. The trip would take about two weeks, and we expected to make about $40 a trip. It would take eight days to go, three days in Fort Wayne and four days to return. Once an ox team came through in three days, which was the quickest trip ever made. We would unyoke the oxen, 'hopple' them, put a bell upon one of them and turn them out. For ourselves, we would build a fire by a log, cook supper, throw down an old bed on the leaves under a tent stretched before the fire, and lie down and sleep as sound as a nut. We would start early, drive till 9 o'clock and get breakfast, and let the oxen eat again. From two to six teams would go in company. Sometimes the teams would get 'stuck' but not often. If so, we would unhitch the 'lead' yoke from another team, hitch on in front, and pull the load through. Once only I had to unload. I got fast in the quicksand in crossing the Missisinewa. We got a horse from a settler (Philip Storms), carried the flour to the bank of the river on his back, hitched the oxen to the hind end and pulled the wagon out backward.

The first religious meeting was held in father's cabin. Stephen Williams exhorted (perhaps in 1815). The first sermon was preached there also (in 1815), by Rev. Holman, of Louisville, Ky.. text, Isaiah, 'Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Why then is the hurt of the daughter of my people not recovered?' It was a good Gospel sermon, and was food to the hungry souls longing to be fed in the wilderness. We used to go to meeting to Dwiggins' (near Newport), and they would come up to our house. The Methodist meeting house near Dwiggins' was warmed thus: They had a box, nearly filled with dirt, standing in the middle of the floor, and would make a fire with charcoal in the box. That house never had a stove in it, but was warmed in that way as long as it stood, fifteen or twenty years. They would have a rail-pen near the church to hold the coal, and carry it in as it might be needed. Mrs. Bowen says she has carried many a basket of coal to replenish the fire. The first meeting house was at Arba, built by the Friends in 1815, and used for church and schoolhouse both; I went to school there four or five years. Afterward they built a hewed-log church, and had a stove in it.

We would catch wolves in a wolf-pen. We could pay our taxes with the 'scalps.' A wolf-pen was made, say six feet long and four feet wide and two feet high, of poles for bottom, sides and top, the size of your arm. The top was like a 'lid,' withed down to the pen at one end, and so as to lift up at the other. The 'lid' would be 'set' with a trap so as to fall and catch the wolf and fasten him into the pen. The bait would be deer meat. To kill the wolf, take a hickory switch and make it limber by 'witheing' it, i. e., twisting it limber. Make a noose and slip it through the pen and around the wolf's neck, and lift him against the top of the pen and choke him to death. If the wolf was shot and bled in the pen, no more wolves would come into it. One big wolf father undertook to choke, but the dogs wished so much to get in at him, that we let them in, but the wolf fought them terribly, and whipped the dogs, till father put an end to the battle by choking him in dead earnest. We moved into the thick, green woods. We would cut out the trees a foot and under, grub the undergrowth, pile and burn the logs, girdle the big trees, and kill them by burning brush piles around them.

The last time I went to Fort Wayne was in 1829. Several tribes drew their payment there for years after Fort Wawne was laid out as a town. The Indians around here were Shawnees. They would trap in April and May, and then go back to their towns. The squaws would plant and raise the corn, and dress the skins. The men did the hunting and the women did the work. At one time at Fort Wayne, thirteen Indians were killed during one payment in drunken fights.

Plenty of wild plums and grapes (and some blackberries) were to be found. The plums and grapes grew on the banks of the creeks, and along the edges of the (wet) prairies. There were different sorts, red and purple, small and round, but very sweet and good, better than most tame plums. Some grapes were fall grapes and some winter grapes. The blackberries grew on the 'windfalls.' There was one near Spartanburg. There were crab-apples, but too sour to use, and pawpaws, but no one would eat them. The woods were full of weeds of many kinds, and of pea-vines, and horses and cattle lived well on them. Some places had been burned over, and the woods, in those spots, were open like a big orchard.

I knew Johnny Cornstalk, the Shawnee chief. My mother-in-law once made him an overcoat. He was a large, portly, fine looking, genteel Indian, straight as an arrow.

He once came (with his wife) to my father's, on horseback, to tell him that they had found a bee-tree in his woods. They rode up. Cornstalk dismounted, but his wife sat still upon her horse, tall, straight and lady-like, genteel, dressed richly in Indian fashion, with a beautiful side-saddle and bridle, and a fine pony. Mother said, 'Won't you light?' Spry as a cat, she sprang off, and they went into the house. She was waiting for an invitation. They were a stately, elegant-looking couple. Cornstalk told father of the bee-tree, and father went and cut the tree down and gathered the honey, and gave Cornstalk half. They were then 'camping' near James Jackson's place. I knew Chief Richardville five miles above Fort Wayne, on St. Mary's river. He was a Miami chief, had a large, brick house and was rich. His daughters dressed Indian fashion, but very grand and stylish. He was a good, honest, genteel, friendly man, and much respected, both by the Indians and white men. We made bricks one season at Fort Wayne, and saw him often.

In plowing, when father first moved, we used a bar-share plow and a wooden mold-board. I could tell tales by the hour of those old times, but it is not worth the while to print so much of an old man's gossip."

JAMES C. BOWEN, 1814.

Son of the fourth settler, who came on his forty-fifth birthday, October 22, 1814, when James was only a half-grown boy.

"Hunting was splendid, and game plenty in the woods. Deer, turkeys, bears (and wolves) were abundant.

We used to go to mill to Newport, to George Sugart's mill, but oftener to White Water, to Jere Cox's mill. Sugart had a little 'corn-cracker,' run by water-power. The buhr went around no oftener than the wheel did. Sugart would throw in a bushel of corn, and go out and swingle flax, etc., for an hour or two, and then go in and attend to his grist again. Awful slow! One day a hound came in and began licking up the meal as it came in spurts from the spout. It did not come fast enough for him and he would look up with a pitiful howl, and then lick for more meal! We boys would go fourteen miles to mill on horseback. Sometimes we would go with a wagon and take a load, and then it would take two days. Often the settlers had to go over to the Big Miami for provisions. Sometimes two men would join teams and go with four horses, and bring a big load. Once I went with Clark Willcutts' son (we were boys) on horseback to a mill four miles east of Richmond, to get a grist of corn. We each got a sack of corn, took it to Cox's mill, got it ground, and took the meal home. It was twenty miles and took us two days.

Pork was $1.50 a hundred net, and sometimes $1, or even less than that. As late as 1835, when I was justice, I rendered judgment on a debt, and the defendant said he had wheat at Jeremiah Cox's mill, and he could not get 12½ cents a bushel, in money, to pay the debt. At Newport, Jonathan Unthank sued David Bowles for $5, balance on a store debt. Bowles was angry and declared he would never trade with Unthank any more. 'To think,' he said, 'that I have traded there so much, and he must go and sue me for $5!' Benjamin Thomas (Wayne county) said he had as good wheat as ever grew, and he could not get 12½ cents a bushel, in money, to pay his taxes!

In making 'Quaker Trace,' in 1817, twenty-five or thirty men started with three wagon-loads of provisions. I went about twenty-five miles (beyond the Mississinewa river) until one wagonload was gone, and then returned with that team."

[Mr. Bowen thinks that Sample's mill, on White river, was the first mill of any importance in the country. He says, also, that Cox's mill had at first a hand bolt, and that flour had to be bolted by hand, which was a slow and tedious process.]

[Ephraim Bowen came from Ohio in a big Shaker wagon, with a load of "plunder," and then went back after his family. The patent for his quarter-section was signed by James Madison. E. B. was an intelligent, devoted Methodist, and did much to help plant the foundations of religion in this western wilderness. His dwelling was the "preacher's home," and a preaching station for more than thirty years. The first meeting was held at his house, and the first sermon was preached there also. All the Methodists in the region were there, and others, perhaps thirty persons. The descendants of E. B. are numerous and widespread. There were at his death seventy grandchildren and many great-grandchildren. E. B. and his family are a fine specimen of the hardy pioneers who subdued these western wilds. Courageous, honest, industrious, devout, intelligent, energetic, upright, enterprising, successful; their labors and achievements have helped the howling wilderness to become the "garden of the Lord," and to cause the "desert to bud and blossom as the rose."]

SILAS JOHNSON, 1817.

"I was fifteen years old when father came here. Paul Beard and John Moorman and Francis Frazier and John Barnes were here when we came. Paul Beard came the same spring. The others had come perhaps the year before. Curtis Clenney came, I think, the same fall. Daniel Shoemaker, James Frazier, David Kenworthy were early settlers. The settlers before us had not been here more than a year, perhaps not so long. John Barnes was very old and he died last spring (1880).

James Frazier (bell-maker) had a large family, and lived in a 'camp.'

The roof-poles of his camp were put in the forks of a cherry tree, There came a heavy snow May 4, after the leaves were out, and broke down his forks, roof—snow and all right on their heads.

The Friends first attended meeting at Center Meeting in Wayne county, but soon Lynn meeting was set up (about 1820).

Francis Frazier lived west of the pike, a mile south of Lynn. Daniel Kenworthy lived east of Jesse Johnson. Curtis Clenney lived a mile south. Daniel Shoemaker lived a half mile east of Lynn. James Frazier lived one mile east of Lynn.

CHOLERA, 1849.

In the morning about breakfast, a black cloud came up from the east, dark and threatening; there was some thunder and a little rain, suddenly a sharp stroke of lightning seemed to strike the earth between Mr. Palmer's and the four corners, a mile east of Lynn. The sky was filled with smoke, and a fearful sickening smell as of burning sulphur filled the air, which lasted some time. A little while afterwards, that same morning, John Lister and two sons (one a lad) passed those corners. They were all taken sick that evening, John died next morning, and his oldest son during the day. The lad lingered a month, but recovered. William Hodgin passed next, and then Henry Benson and three others; they were all taken sick and died the next day or very shortly. On Chamness' place, a mile off, five or six were taken sick, but they did not die.

Isaac Moody and Jonathan Clevinger nursed the sick all the time, but were not sick themselves. Most of the persons east and south of those corners were taken sick. Twenty-seven died, and a few got well. It lasted two or three weeks. There seemed to be an uncommonly sharp smell after dark. [See W. Pickett's, Francis Frazier's and W. D. Stone's accounts.]

When Jesse Johnson came in the fall of 1817 (perhaps), Paul Beard had cleared a field and burned the standing trees black by piling the brush of the undergrowth around the roots of the trees and then burning the brush piles.

Settlers at that time were Paul Beard, Sr., Francis Frazier, John Moorman, John Barnes (Wayne county), Travis Adcock, Isaac Hockett (Cherry Grove), Gideon Frazier.

David Kenworthy had entered land (80 acres) some years before, but he came after Jesse Johnson did.

Jesse Johnson had been here and had entered the land, and came and settled soon afterwards.

Curtis Clenney was the next that bought near Francis Frazier, John Moorman and Travis Adcock.

Clenney was in the Indian war of 1811-13, in the blockhouse and scouting in the region.

James Frazier and John Baxter came the next spring. Edward Hunt came when Jesse Johnson did, and settled west of, and near to Lynn, 1817. James Abshire was an early settler, northwest of Lynn. He was a famous hunter. His son Isaac Abshire is still residing in that region."

IRA SWAIN, 1815.

"My father, Elihu Swain, was born in 1759, on Nantucket Island, moved from there to Guilford county, N. C., in 1776; to Jefferson county, East Tennessee, in 1785; to Wayne county, Ind. (near Randolph county line) in 1815, and died in 1848, aged nearly ninety. He married Sarah Mills in North Carolina in 1782. They had ten children, six boys and four girls—John, Nathaniel, Hannah, Samuel, Joseph, Lydia, Elihu, Rachel, Job and Ira. The family lived in a tent made of a wagon sheet for three weeks or more, lying in beds on the ground. They built a pole cabin, which for some time had a Yankee blanket for a door.

For two or three years the children used to play with the Indians, who were plenty. A dozen Indians lived near, with their families, in 'camps,' made of poles set up in a circle, with ash bark peeled off the tree for a roof, the fire being built in the middle and a hole at the top in the peak to let off the smoke.

In two or three years the Indians left their wigwams and came back no more, but their little pole tents stood tenantless and desolate for years.

One little Indian by the name of 'Jim,' who lived not 200 yards away, and with whom I played many a day when we were boys together, was adopted by Judge Reeves, and grew up civilized. I met him years afterward at La Porte, Ind. He knew me, though I did not know him. He had traveled a great deal, but he came back, and lived on Judge Reeves' old place a few years ago, remaining there until he died. When our family was coming from Tennessee, I saw a sight of cruelty which will stick by me to my dying day, and the memory of which has done much to fasten in my mind an eternal hatred of human slavery. As we came through Richmond, Ky., a man was being flogged near the road where we passed. I was but a child, but I remember it well. The man's hands were drawn down over his knees, and a stick was thrust through between his arms and his legs, thus fastening him forward. His body was naked, and they were whipping him terribly. He was screaming with all his might, and his back and hips were all cut into a jelly. It was a fearful sight.

Father entered Congress land. The twelve-mile purchase was in market, but the land west of it was not, being surveyed in 1821-22. Father had to go or send to mill to Connersville (thirty miles). They would buy corn near the mill and get it ground and bring the meal home.

The first school was near David Moore's (in 1816 or 1817), with, perhaps, twenty scholars. The house was a pole cabin, 14x18 feet. One end of it was cut out (much of it) for a fire-place. We used to pile up logs in the fire-place (i. e., the larger scholars did) for a rousing big fire. The fire-place was built up to the mantel, with puncheons filled in with clay inside, and the chimney was made above with sticks and clay around. The floor was puncheons, and the benches were split poles with legs. The older pupils used to get wood at noon to last till the next day noon. That was not much trouble, though the chief care was not to fell the trees on the schoolhouse, and it took 'lots' of wood to keep the house warm.

For several winters we had no shoes. Then father dug out a large log and made a big trough and tanned some hides, and made some leather, and so we got some shoes. One man who had a trough and some hides tanning, intending to move and wishing to take his hides along (I suppose they were not tanned enough, and he thought there was no bark on the prairie where he was going), made a big truck wagon with wooden wheels, sawed from a large oak tree. He loaded his tan trough, bark, hides and all, upon his huge truck-wagon, and away he started for Illinois. After traveling two or three days, he bethought himself that he had left some tobacco in a crack of his cabin, and, leaving his folks and team (of oxen) in the woods, he 'footed' it back after the tobacco, found it, got it, and tramped back again, spending two or three days in the operation. What the folks did meanwhile I do not know; I suppose they just waited there in the woods, cooking and eating, and taking it easy.

The people in those days made 'hand-mills' with stones 'a foot over' to grind corn with. To turn them was hard work. My wife's father once took a peck of corn to grind on one of them; a boy came with a tin cup to toll the grist. The man ground and ground, till he got so tired that he called out to the boy, 'Come here, sonny, with your tin, and get some more toll, or I shall never get done.' People went on horseback, or rather walked and led the horse, with a sack of corn or meal on his back, thirty miles to mill. A man or a boy would go with a horse and three bushels of corn in a four-bushel sack all that distance. Johnny Banks made a great improvement; he loaded one horse and attached a rein, leading one and riding another, thus not exactly killing two birds with one stone, but what was still better, getting two grists of corn to mill with one boy. Great labor-saving invention, to make one boy to accomplish the work of two, and more than that, for the led horse, having no boy to 'tote,' could take a full load of corn. We were often two weeks without bread. However, mother could make plenty of lye hominy, and we had potatoes, and sweet potatoes, and sweet pumpkins and squashes, and plenty of bacon and chickens and eggs, venison, wild turkey, etc., so that people need not starve even on such fare."

ANNA RETZ.

"Mr. Blount lived at first on the Zimmerman place [southern part of West river]. Mr. Barnes lived south of it.

Griffith Davis lived south of Mount Pleasant church. William Smith settled a mile north. He came in 1817. I remember the 'falling timber.' I saw a tree fall between the house and the corn-crib, and remember playing under the tree top, as it lay there, with Cahoon's children, an Irish family, who lived near by. I recollect father's trying to get some colts that were in the woods among the fallen timber. We could see them and hear them 'whinny,' but he could not get them. They worked round home in three or four days. The cattle also took several days to come home. We could hear them bawl, but they could not be got at. One heifer did not come, but we got her a year afterwards. A man saw the mark on her and came and told us, and father went and got her. My sister was keeping house for Isaac Branson, with his children; father clambered over the trees after the storm and got there. half of the house roof was blown off, and the stable roof also, and the logs were blown down round the horse, so that he could not move, yet he was not hurt; their cow was killed, and that was the only animal we knew to have been hurt. Trees were blown crosswise in every direction; east of our house it blew down but little; the storm seemed to rise for a space, but it came down again near Albert Macy's and took his house roof off; by-and-by it rose, and did not come down any more. The crops were injured, but not so badly as one might think; there was no hail; the worst of the storm was north of us. The house we lived in at the time of the storm is standing yet, and in good repair."

W. M. BOTKIN (1816).

"My father was a tanner; his tan troughs are here yet, though out of use for many years. A large cherry tree is growing in the end of one of them, as it lies buried in the ground. General muster use to be held on father's farm. A colored man named Jack ran away from Kentucky in early times and came to my father's, stopping awhile to work. One night a spelling-school was held in father's cabin. While they were spelling, a knock was heard at the door; father went to the door and asked who was there. Jack heard the reply, and knew his master's voice. Peter Botkin opened the window and let Jack jump out and escape. The master offered father $50 to help him get the slave, but we helped him off instead.

Plows were made almost wholly of wood; the bar and share were iron, but the moldboard, etc., were of wood; sometimes a piece of a saw or the like would be put over the moldboard to make the plow scour.

To make a cradle to rock the baby in, we took a hollow buck-eye and split the log, and put rockers on the bottom.

I have cut many a cord of wood at 20 cents a cord and board, and have split rails at 9 1-3 cents a hundred. I have worked many a day for 25 cents and 37½ cents in harvest, from sunrise till sundown at that. Wheat was 37½ cents a bushel, and pork $1.25 a hundred net. I used to slide on the ice barefooted. the skin on the bottom of my feet was hard, almost like a stick.

Methodist meetings were held in father's cabin, and quarterly meeting at Jesse Cox's. Father's cabin burne ddown, and then meetings were held elsewhere; William Hunt and Nathan Gibson were preachers; father was very poor when we came to Randolph.

There is now on my place a tan trough, made by my father more than sixty years ago, hollowed from the body of a large tree, the top of the tree, some thirty feet long, being still in connection with the trough. There are also rails, made of white oak, of blue ash and of walnut, still sound and in use on the farm, made by father before 1820, and put up into fences by him on his original farm in that early day. It is only two or three years since I changed the location of some of the rails which had lain all that long time unmolested in a fence, and the 'crossing' of the rails were firm and solid."

[Mr. Botkin, poor though he was when a boy, as his story shows, is poor no longer. He owns several hundred acres of excellent land; has a splendid brick mansion in a beautiful situation; is a thrifty and prosperous farmer, and a prominent and influential citizen, foremost in every good work. It is really a wonder how many of the rich men of the day are sons of men who were very poor, and some of them widows' sons and even orphans.

Thomas Ward's father was not able to enter forty acres of land.

Nathan Cadwallader's father died when Nathan was a lad; their old horse died and they were too poor to buy another.

John Fisher was an orphan boy who rode a pony alone from Carolina to Indiana.

Simeon Branham was an orphan boy who went for himself alone in the world at sixteen years old. And so on ad infinitum.]

JOHN FISHER, 1817.

"Father was forty-five and mother was forty-two years of age when they died and left me a lone orphan in the world. I knew of no settlers in Randolph when I came but those on Nolan's Fork. What I understood to be the first wagon that went to White river was that of William Wright, from Clinton county, Ohio, in the fall of 1817."

[Mr. Fisher is mistaken. Settlers had come upon Nolan's Fork, Greensfork, Martindale Creek and West River in 1815, and on White river in the summer of 1816. Mr. Wright's wagon may have been the first that passed through that neighborhood two miles north of Newport (Fountain City). The company from Carolina in the spring of 1817, bound for White River, most likely went along a route farther west, past Economy, Joseph Gass', etc.]

"I owned a little mare and a saddle and bridle, and nothing else. I was an orphan boy and had no more than that pony and its accouterments. I had heard of the free and glorious Northwest, the grand and fertile plains beyond the mountains and the river, where no slave might tread; and set my heart to find that wondrous country, and I found it and thanked God for the consolation. I crossed the Blue Ridge at 'Ward's Gap,' thence to Grayson C. H., Wythe C. H., Abingdon, Va., head of Holston river, Tennessee, a large spring, from which flows a wonderful stream as big as the White Water at Richmond. I traveled down Holston to French Broad, turning north into Kentucky, crossing Clinch mountain, and Cumberland mountains to Cumberland river. and so on to Kentucky river, Cincinnati, Richmond. The latter place had perhaps thirty houses, one small store kept by Robert Morrison, one log tavern, etc.

Newport was founded in 1822. It was a solid wilderness for years after I came. I have voted at every presidential election, beginning with Madison's second term, 1816. I voted for Madison, Monroe and Adams, against Jackson Van Buren; for Harrison and Taylor, against Polk, Pierce, Buchanan; for Lincoln, Grant and Hayes. I hope to give yet one more vote, and to help elect one more Republican president, and then I must leave national politics for younger hands." [Friend Fisher had his wish. He went to the polls and helped elect another Republican president; and now he is gone to the land "where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary are at rest." He lacked thirty hours of living long enough to hear the candidate of his choice declared president by the presiding officer of the senate in the joint convention of the whole congress assembled to witness the counting of the electoral votes and the proclamation of the grand result. The second Wednesday of February was on the 9th, and he died on the morning of the 8th, at 6 o'clock. Father Fisher's era of life was truly an eventful one.]

Mr. Fisher says: "I had no wagon for seven or eight years; my hauling was all done on a sled, winter and summer. In 1826, a neighbor and I bought a wagon 'to the halves' and we used it in company. In 1829, I bought his half and owned it alone. That was an event in my life, to be the sole owner of a two-horse wagon. Wagons were like 'angels' visits, few and far between.

Of course there were some wagons in the country, but great numbers had none, and I belonged to that numerous class until the eventful hour when the bargain was struck, the trade was complete, and the wagon was mine, all mine."

JANE FISHER, 1817.

"Father, Edward Starbuck, Sr., came to Wayne county, in 1817. The family who came were father and mother and nine children. One daughter had been married in Carolina, and did not come till afterward. Father had, in all, eighteen children; ten by his first wife and eight by the second, nine boys and nine girls, the first set five and five, and the second set four and four. The first that died was Phebe (Leverton), sixty years old, and that was when the youngest was twenty-three years old. The father and eighteen children were alive till the youngest was twenty-three years old. The whole eighteen were married. The next that died was James, sixty-five; Edward, sixty-one; Betsey, eighty. Thirteen are still living. (1880.)

I have a large platter (pewter) which was my father's in Carolina, which he got from his mother. Its age is probably not less, perhaps more, than 120 years. The platter is fifteen inches across, is heavy and thick, and has never been remolded."

[Mrs. F. has an iron candlestick, more than fifty years old, and as good as new, made by her uncle, Zachariah Coffin, a famous blacksmith of those early days. It is "the old candlestick"—the family candlestick—that used to hang, by a hook at the top, from a chair-back, to study by, when people were thankful for "tallow dips;" and the splendors of gaslight and kerosene were a thing unknown and unimagined.

She can show several wooden trays forty years old, in good condition, though dusty for lack of use. She can show also the greatest curiosity and oddity of all, in the identical "first coat and pants" made for and worn by her oldest son Daniel, now in his fifty-ninth year. The ancient relic must be about fifty-five years old. They are truly quaint and odd; the coat is not "shad-belly," but more like "swallow-tail;" the pants are "single fall," as was the fashion sixty years ago; the buttons are good, bright, brass buttons, good for fifty years more; the cloth is striped, home-made, strong and smooth, and just a trifle coarse.]

Mrs. F. Says: "When we 'kept house,' at first, we had a table, four cups and saucers, half a dozen plates, four knives and forks, one iron pot, one skillet, one rolling pin, four chairs, one light feather bed, two sheets, one flax-and-cotton, and one tow, one quilt, one coverlet. I have the coverlet yet. Mother wove it herself, in old Guilford county, N. C., and she gave it to me. I have had it more than sixty years, and how much older it is I can not tell. I borrowed a straw tick of Aunt Rebecca for three or four weeks, till I could make some for myself out of tow, which I did, all but the weaving—I hired that done. For a bedstead I borrowed an auger and made two benches out of puncheons, and lugged in nine clapboards and put across on the benches, and on this new, grand bedstead I made up our bed; and, let me tell you, I was 'set up' greatly, and felt as proud of my bed, all nice and neat, as of anything I ever had. My brother Edward and myself went back to North Carolina ten or twelve years ago. I was surprised, and pleased, also, to find how well I remembered the country; I could go anywhere, and knew every hill and stream, every road and farm, although I had been absent fifty years. I found in that ancient region four aunts and one sister, whom I had not seen since my father moved away. They were, of course, greatly rejoiced that we should be spared to meet, face to face, this side of glory land."

[NOTE.—Mrs. Jane Fisher, relict of John Fisher, deceased, departed this life at the dwelling of her son-in-law, Capt. J. R. Jackson, Union City, Ind., Thursday, February 4, 1882, aged about seventy-eight years. She had become much enfeebled, having, some months before her death, suffered a paralytic stroke, from the effects of which she never recovered.]

TEMPLE AND PRISCILLA SMITH, 1817.

"Joseph Hockett came to Randolph county, Washington township, in 1816. The Quaker meeting was set up at Cherry Grove in 1816 or 1817; they built a double log cabin for a meeting-house.

Bloomingsport was laid out not far from 1828, by Nathan Hockett. Alfred Blizzard built the first house. Beeson kept the first store.

Dr. Paul Beard, Sr., was the first physician in the region; there was none in Bloomingsport for a long time. Dr. Gideon Frazier resided there in somewhat early years.

Other physicians were Drs. Gore, Strattan, Kemper, etc. Messrs. Beeson, Comfort, Bullard, Budd, Wyatt, Wright, Coggshall, Hockett, etc., have been merchants.

There has been a potter's shop, a wheelwright's shop, a saw-mill, a grist-mill, etc.

There are two churches, Methodist and United Brethren. At Ridgeville, fifty-four years ago, Meshach Lewallyn's daughter Polly married David Hammer. At the wedding supper, the bride's brothers were present, and one of them, dressed in buckskin hunting-shirt, and leather belt, and with a butcher knife at his waist, undertook to carve the turkey, and did it with his hunting-knife.

At another wedding, the people had gathered, but the supper was not yet done; and as the women were trying to bake pones or slap jacks or something, the crowd of half-drunken fellows would snatch and eat as fast as the women would bake, till at last, one chap, not quite so drunk as the rest, took a club, and stood and watched, and guarded the women till they got enough baked for supper. This was at the house where the boys were chopping as related below. The family was immense, a dozen children or so; the cabin was small. They had a loom in the house but took it down and out, to make room for the 'weddingers.' "

Mrs. Smith says: "When I was twelve years old, my sister and myself went to help one of the neighbors pick wool. They baked a great 'pone,' and turned it out on the floor. The ducks came in, waddling and quacking, and fell to pecking away at the 'pone' till they had broken it badly. The woman had her milk set under the bed, and in scaring the ducks away from the 'pone,' they scattered and ran under the bed, and went floundering and plunging and paddling 'slapdab' through the milk. As the ducks went out, the sheep came in, 'baa-baaing' all over the room. We went home without eating, and said to mother, 'If those folks wish us to pick wool, they must bring the wool here; we cant' stand such living;' and our picking wool there among the sheep and ducks was at an end.

The boys would come in and stamp the mud off their feet upon the floor until the dirt was so thick that they had to scrape it from the floor with a hoe to let the door shut. One of our neighbors told us to be sure to call on a family of 'new-comers,' who, he said, were 'upper crust,' neat, stylish people, and that we must fix up our best. So one day sister and I fixed up in our 'nicest,' and went over there, a little afraid that we were not slick enough. When we got there, lo, and behold, a sight indeed! Four boys, brothers, from eight years and upward, were at the wood-pile chopping wood, with their shirts on and—nothing else! We were taken aback, and thought we must have got to the wrong place. But no, this was the very house. We went in; they set us some stools, black and greasy from having had meat chopped on them. Hardly knowing what to do, we spread some hankkerchiefs on the stools and sat down. It was winter, and the creeks were frozen. The boys went out to the ice to slide barefooted, and when they came back their feet were as red as lobsters. 'Are not your feet cold?' 'No, they burn,' was the reply. And such times the folks had, and such things were done by young and old in days of 'auld lang syne.'"

PAUL BEARD, JR., 1817.

"Settlers, about the same time with my father, were James Frazier, east of Lynn; Francis Frazier; John Pegg, three miles southwest of Beard's; Obadiah Harris, Cherry Grove; Stephen Hockett, Cherry Grove; Edward Thornburg, Cherry Grove; Travis Adcock, Curtis Clenney, Jesse Johnson shortly after, and perhaps others."

[Paul Beard, Jr., and his wife are both living at this time, 1880.]

MRS. PAUL BEARD, DAUGHTER OF BENJAMIN COX, 1817.

"Mother was greatly afraid of the Indians; father was not afraid of them at all. They would come at night; father would get up and make a fire, and let them sit and smoke and stay all night if they wished. Sometimes they would come late in the night and wish to warm, and when they were warm they would go away. Father had to go to Richmond for grain and for milling; this was too much trouble, and they used to pound corn for bread.

Father made a sweep with a maul at the end, and a pin through the maul; two men would take hold of the pin, one on each side, and thus work the maul to pound corn into meal in a trough or mortar below. We took the finest for bread, and the coarse for mush. We raised a kind of squash that was excellent for baking; many a meal has been made on baked squash and milk and butter.

Benjamin Cox was a great hunter, and killed abundance of deer. He has shot as many as five and six deer in a day. A prairie was near and also a spring; he would sprinkle salt around the spring, and the deer would come to lick the salt. He made a scaffold, ten or twelve feet high, in the forks of two elm trees, and from that he watched the deer, and shot them as they came. He has killed scores of deer from that scaffold. Mrs. Beard thinks her father was the first settler on White River, east of Winchester.

John Cox, father of Benjamin Cox, came in the spring of 1818; Joshua and John Cox, sons of John Cox, came in the fall of 1818.

Thomas Ward and Joseph Moffatt came shortly afterward; Jonathan Hiatt, Zachariah Hiatt and Jehu Robison came not long after.

White River meeting-house was built of logs in 1820 or 1821. It was warmed by a box filled with dirt, with coals or bark on the top of a fire."

"Mrs. Paul Beard, Jr., is the daughter of Benjamin Cox. She was born in 1813. she married Paul Beard, Jr., in 1833. They have had nine children, eight are living and seven married."

ELIHU CAMMACK, 1817.

"The floor of the barn on my father's farm near Arba was made of lumber sawed by hand with a whip-saw, done in this way: The log was put on a high frame, and one man stood above on the log and the other below, and they sawed somewhat as with a cross-cut saw. The work was slow and very tedious, but there was no other way then and there. That barn was covered with shingles, and was reckoned the best barn in all that region.

The meeting-house was warmed by a dirt box. They would have a great log heap fire out of doors, and take the box out to the fire and shovel in coals enough, and then take it back into the house, and set it in the middle of the room, and people would get round it and warm themselves as well as they could.

The cabin in which I was born sixty-three years ago is still standing and in good repair. The roof has been renewed, but the logs are sound, and a family occupies it now. The cabin was 'scutched down,' i. e., scored and hewed down after the building was put up.

I have hauled to Cincinnati many winters; the price of hauling was 50 cents per hundred; the trip took a week. A man would make from $6 to $9 a trip. Teamsters on the 'pikes' would have big Conestoga wagons, and four to six horses, and take tremendous loads—equal to a small ship. Dealers would pack meat in 'bulk,' and teamsters would haul it 'loose,' and sometimes, when they would get 'stalled,' they would throw the load of meat out on the ground, like a pile of wood, and come back afterward and pick it up again. The first wagon I ever owned myself, about 1841, I bought the iron for in Cincinnati, and got the money to pay for it with by selling (hauling) bacon, smoked, 'hog-round,' good, sweet and nice, to Cincinnati from near Arba, at $2.12 per hundred. The iron was $3.50 per hundred. I have hauled wheat to Eaton, selling at 37½ cents a bushel. I have fattened hogs and sold the pork, net, at Spartanburg for $1.25 under two hundred, and $1.37, two hundred full. This was done about 1842-43. Henry Peacock, of Jericho, now dead, has told me that since he settled in Jericho, he has paid $18 a barrel for salt, and paid for it in pork at $2 a hundred.

I must give you a story told me on himself by Judge W. A. Peele, at Indianapolis, when he was secretary of state. When he was a boy just old enough to turn the grindstone, his father and himself went to my grandfather's to grind an ax. They went into the house; grandmother had lately made a rag carpet, perhaps the first in the county. His father walked in, and stepped on the carpet. William thought the carpet was some nice cloth spread upon the floor, and that his father had done very wrong, so he tried to better the matter by undertaking to jump across it. He failed, and stumbled upon it, and got dirt on the carpet, and was scolded and laughed at besides for all the pains he took to keep off the wonderful and mysterious thing."

WILLIAM DIGGS, JR., LATE OF WHITE RIVER, 1816.

"I was born in Anson county, N. C., December 17, 1793. In the year of 1816, I came to Indiana to seek a home for myself. Paul, Henry H., William and Robert Way and I came across the country from North Carolina in a road wagon, crossed the Ohio river at Louisville, Ky.; came to Blue River, but not being pleased with the country, we came to Wayne county, made our temporary abode at Charlotte Way's (afterward my mother-in-law), and looked around for suitable places. We finally selected our lands and built our camps about two miles west of Winchester. I remained there till the latter part of Ausust, when the Indians became so numerous that our friends advised us to abandon our claims and seek safety in the settlements.

I was married to Charlotte Way October 6, 1816, and returned to my claim in February, 1817. At that time there was only one white settler nearer than twelve miles.

We moved into a camp and lived in it till I could cut the logs and build a small log house, which seemed a palace to us then. We saw no white man's face for eight weeks after settling there. But Indians were plenty, yet peaceable.

The first year, I cleared four acres of ground, and planted it in corn, but it did not ripen, and we had to go to Richmond, where settlers had been living for twelve or fifteen years, for all our breadstuffs. Wheat was then 75 cents a bushel, and corn $1.

When we were getting out of bread, I would start on horseback for the White Water, buy a sack of corn, get it ground, and take it home. In this way we lived till more settlers came. Not long after, small hand-mills were introduced into the county, and as soon as the corn became too hard for roasting, we would take a small jack-plane, shave the corn off the cob and dry it. We would take this corn to a hand-mill and grind it into meal. The nearest mill to my house was three miles.

Often I have worked hard all day, and then taken a sack of corn on my back to the mill, and gone home with it to furnish bread for my family next day.

In this manner we lived till the country settled up so as to afford better accommodations. We brought up nine children; all but one are living yet, and they were all born in Randolph county, and on White river. The eldest, Fannie, now Mrs. Matthew Hill, lives at Jericho, Randolph county, Indiana; Anna, now Mrs. Jesse Reynard, lives east of Buena Vista, Randolph county, Indiana; Eunice, now Mrs. Thomas Moorman, of Winchester, Indiana; Pleasant W., married Anna Peacock, and now resides at Earlham, Madison county, Iowa; Agnes, not living; Henry H., married Sarah Wright (now deceased), and afterward Lois Ann Carpenter. Their home is at Nora, Jo Daviess county, Illinois. Anthony Diggs married Elvira C. Thomas, daughter of George and Asenath Thomas, and they reside at Earlham, Madison county, Iowa. Ruth, married Matthew W. Diggs, and they live at Farmland, Randolph county, Indiana. After our children left us, we sold the farm which had been our home so many years, and moved to Poplar Run, to be near some of our children. We remained there some years when my wife's health became poor, and the children had all left that neighborhood. We sold that farm also and moved to Winchester. In about sixteen months my beloved companion died. Since then I have made my home with my children, and am now residing at Earlham, Iowa. My age is now eighty-nine years.

Paul W. Way, Henry H. Way, William Way, and Robert Way and myself, came in the summer of 1816; Henry H. Way and myself were both single, and we married during the winter of 1816-17, he taking for his wife Rachel Manlove, of Wayne county, Indiana; Robert Way stayed, as did all the group but Paul Way, who returned to Carolina and brought back a large company in the spring of 1817. During the spring or summer of 1817, William Way went to the south and brought his father and mother to White River.

Paul Way and his company got to White River in the spring of 1817, crossing the Ohio river on the ice with their wagons.

[NOTE.—That winter was very cold.]

Henry, William and Robert Way built cabins for themselves and the rest. Persons from Williamsburg, fifteen miles away, came and helped raise the cabins.

Fanny (Diggs) Hill is the first white child born in White River, her birthday being September 11, 1817. she is living still. My wife died January 31, 1877. I went to Jo Daviess county, Illinois, in May, 1877, to visit my children, stayed there three months, went on to Iowa, and am in Iowa still.

My health is good, I can walk around town and to church, etc. I am an Orthodox 'Body Friend,' never having gone with any 'separations.'

I have voted at every presidential election since I was old enough to vote, casting my first presidential ballot for James Monroe in 1816, and having voted for president in all seventeen times. I was a Whig in the days of that party, and have since been and still am a Republican."

FANNY (DIGGS) HILL, 1817.

"I went to school first at Williamsburg, in Wayne county, Indiana, when eight or nine years old. I attended school also under Henry D. Huffman in a log schoolhouse three miles west of Winchester. For a wonder, that house had window sash and glass!

When my mother was getting me to sleep one day, she heard a noise outside the cabin door. Hurrying to the door, she looked out, and lo! there stood a bear!

She scared it away, and it went to the milk-house, and tore the cloth off the milk-strainer, etc., but shortly went away.

Father for years had but one horse; mother has many a time gone out and cut an armful of wild grass to feed the horse.

My mother's father, Henry Way, of Wayne county, Indiana, was killed by lightning.

Mother used to tell me that we were the first family on White river, and that our cabin was fifteen miles away from any other dwelling, and that for six weeks she saw no white person's face but that of her own husband. She used to tell me that the Indians told her when they were at her cabin how easily they could have killed her and sister while the girls were milking, as the Indians lay hid in the brush."

FRANCIS FRAZIER, LYNN.

"I used to kill many deer. Really, I was too fond of it. My friends tried to get me to quit. George Sugart, with a committee of friends, undertook to visit me to give me advice. I managed to shun them three times, but the fourth time they caught me at home, and I could not dodge them. They talked kindly and urged me to lay aside my gun. I tried to do so for awhile, but 'what is bread in the bone, will break out in the flesh.'

One day a boy told me that some swine needed attention out in the woods. I went, taking my gun. Tying two pigs together with my suspenders, I slung them across my shoulder, and started for the house. Along flew the hound, chasing some deer; pell mell they went and I after them. I tossed the pigs between some logs and laid off my shot pouch; had my coat on my shoulder and lost it. I shot one deer, and chased the other a mile and a half, but could not get it. I came back and found the dead deer, a splendid buck, three snagged, three years old. I hung it up, hide on, entrails out, and went to hunt for my pigs. They were gone, so were my 'gallowses,' and I have never seen them to this day, though that was fifty years ago, or more than that."

BEAR STORY.

"One damp, drizzily day I was out hunting, and heard a hog squealing terribly. I ran toward the noise, perhaps half a mile; came to a thickety pond and started into it. I saw nothing, but still heard the squealing, and also the bones 'craunching,' and knew a bear was killing the hog. As I pushed through the thicket, the thought struck me, 'What if I shoot and she takes after me? There is nothing for me to climb, and I shall be a goner.'

I turned and went home, and got my two brothers on horseback to come. The dog ran in, the bear bit him, and he bounded out yelling for dear life. The bear bounced out too, and we after him, jumping logs, and tearing through the bush screeching like a thousand Indians. The dogs treed the the bear, I shot him, and down he came tearing through the branches, and James rode up just as the bear fell. We skinned it and took the meat home, but it was too fat to eat. Once William Kiff came to our house, and wanted some venison; so we went out to hunt. The day was cloudy and misty, and I was not in humor to stay long. I said to myself, 'I will go home; Kiff may hunt venison for himself.' All at once a red deer stood near me; I shot and down he came. It was a grand, four snagged buck, right 'in the velvet.' horns drop off in winter. In the spring they begin to grow, and the horns will come with 'points' or snags on, one (on each horn) for every year of the deer's age. I have seen a deer with thirteen snags, seven on one horn and six on the other. I dressed the deer and carried it in, and 'jerked' the meat, i. e., cooked it in strips over a slow fire. Kiff filled his pockets with the venison and went home satisfied.

We used to wear shoes and leggings to keep the snakes from biting us. I have killed nine rattlesnakes in one day. The woods had plenty of plums and grapes.

One morning I started toward White river prairie. Seeing something run into a hollow log, I stuck my rifle into the log and let fly, but the recoil of the rifle came near knocking me down. As I went home, I came to a 'maple flat,' and saw a great gray wolf coming. I whistled and she stopped, and I shot at her. I went to the house and got father and Samuel to go back with me. The old sinner had tried to run, but she had made five or six beds as she went, and vomited mutton at each place. After awhile we found her nearly dead. We used wolfskins, instead of saddles, like blankets on a horse.

On 'fifth day,' as we were going to meeting, I said to James, 'Let us kill a deer as we go home.' 'All right,' said he. James' wife spoke up, 'If any deer is killed, James will have it to do.' We went after the deer, and the women went home. We went to a pond and saw deer tracks. There was a sloping tree with roots turned up, and James sat there watching for deer. The bushes crackled, and out sprang two bucks. One threw his head up, and I shot it between the eyes and the nose, and down he dropped. 'Hallo,' cried James, 'is the deer down?' 'Yes.' We tied the feet and carried it home on a pole. 'Well,' said James' wife, 'who killed the deer?'

'Francis,' said James. She hated it that I had shot the deer instead of her precious husband."

BELL-MAKING.

"My father was a bell-maker, and so was I. Bells were in great demand then. Cattle and horses and sheep ran in the woods, and there had to be a bell in the flock to keep them together. I tended a little farm, and would plow till the flies would vex my beast, and then go and work in the shop, making bells. In that way I would make $17 to $22 worth in a single week. They sold from 25 cents to $3.50 a piece. Those heavy ox bells were large; they could be heard easily four miles. I have heard one of them seven miles. (I questioned the accuracy of his memory, but the old gentleman rallied gallantly to the defense of his bells, declaring that his statement was simply the sober, actual fact.—Author.)

I would take my saddle-bags and stuff them with 'nests' of bells, i. e., little bells in bigger ones, perhaps two dozen bells, and set out for Winchester. The bells were ready sale, cash down. I would trade for shoes, hats, anything needed, and tie them on my horse, and go home loaded-some times to the very tail of the horse. People would joke me, 'Hallo, there, got a horseback grocery?' 'Yes; can't you see for yourself,' I would say. I made the bells of the best Juniata iron. When father died, the doctor's bill was $60. He wanted his pay in bells, but I would not do it, and he took a wagon. Sometimes I used boiler iron, and sometimes sheet iron, but Juniata (or Sligo) iron was the best. People would send far off for my bells. I sent $16 worth to Fort Wayne, and they said, 'They are the best bells we ever saw.' They sent another order for $100 worth, but I could not fill it. The demand at home and from Illinois and Iowa movers was more than I could supply. I made bells for over twenty years.

I was quite wild at one time of my life, and inclined to skepticism. I had two nice horses, perfect idols to me. I would walk to Newport any day rather than ride either of them. One day as I was plowing I thought, 'If there is a God, I wish he would reveal Himself to me in some way that I may know Him!' Shortly afterwards, as I was in the house, and the horses were in the stable, suddenly there came a sharp flash of lightning and a crashing thunder peal. I went to the stable and there were my beauties with their heads lying on a long trough. I spoke to them, but they made no sign. The lightning had killed them both dead. It impressed me greatly, 'Turn, or the next will be thine,' rang in my soul. I did turn, and since that time I have tried in my poor, weak way to serve the Lord, and I humbly trust my Maker looks upon my feeble service with gracious favor."

CHOLERA, 1849.

"The rise of the cholera near Lynn (1849) was very strange and striking. A cloud rose in the morning from the east, with some lightning and thunder. The lightning struck the ground at the cross roads near Isaac Palmer's east of Lynn, and there came a terrible smell. The cholera began the same day, and ran along those roads west and south. The next day, in the morning, when I was at Newport, a neighbor came for a coffin, and said 'James Lister is dead with the cholera, sick only a few hours.' I went home instantly. Henry Benson was taken also and died that night. Hodgen died also. Jesse Williams came to shave the corpse, and some one said, 'Jesse, what is the matter?' He quit shaving, went out of the door, sat down, and in a few minutes he was dead. Hodgen and Williams lay dead together. Hodgen's wife stayed all night alone with the two corpses. Hodgen's body was taken away the next morning for burial, and Williams' corpse lay there alone till the next day. Twenty-seven died in all. Dr. Cook came down from Winchester, saying that he could cure it easily enough. He went into the field and picked and ate blackberries, and in two or three hours he was dead himself!"

Note.—The writer of these sketches then lived at the Union Literary Institute, near Spantanburg, and some eight miles from Lynn; and it was stated at the time that six lay dead before the one that died first had been buried. And also that two half-grown lads had to bury their father alone. It was said also that at Boston, six miles south of Richmond, Ind., the first person was taken sick at sunrise, and that before sundown six persons lay dead in the village. Whether these statements were true is not now known, but it is certain that they were made at the time as being matters of current news, and that they were supposed to be correct. The writer well recollects what fear pervaded the school at the institute lest the dread scourge should break out amongst them in its terrible power as at Lynn and elsewhere. The boarding house of the institution was filled with students, and the cholera among them would have been an awful visitation, but by God's mercy the fearful plague came no nearer, and they were spared. [See also statements of Silas Johnson and William Pickett, and of Elder W. D. Stone.]

JERE SMITH, 1817—READ AT OLD SETTLERS' MEETING, JUNE 11, 1864.

The subjoined sketch is so apposite and so well drawn that I cannot forbear to transfer it, in substance, to my pages:

"I came to Indiana, in 1817, with my father, William Smith, being twelve years old. He stopped that spring near Garrett's mill, on Green's Fork, two miles above Williamsburg, Ind. The settlers there were mostly from the same neighborhood in South Carolina with my father. David Young had come out in the fall of 1816, rented some ground for father, and a little cabin in a new town called Salem, in Wayne county, extinct long ago. Father put in a crop on that land, and stayed there till August, and then went up into Randolph county. The country all seemed low and like a river bottom in the jungles. The uncleared land was full of ramps, a rank, ill-smelling weed, eagerly eaten by the cows, and utterly ruining their milk. They grew early, however, and were soon gone. Buckeyes, nettles, gnats and mosquitoes were very plenty. In May, I saw the first Indians. An Indian family camped on the bank of the branch near Salem. I was terribly afraid, for all I had ever read or heard of cruel bloody savages came thronging up to my mind. However, I ventured up after awhile, and got over my scare. After that, an old Indian, called Johnny Green, from whom Green's Fork was named, used to come and talk with us. He would get half drunk, and then the way he would talk was a wonder. He would tell of Wayne's fight with the Indians on the Maumee. He said, acting it out as he talked, 'Injun hide in timber, heap Injun. White man come, heap white man. Injun shoot, heap shoot. White man get in a row. Injun heap shoot, heap shoot. Bimeby old Anthony get mad, heap mad! Gallop horse along row, heap halloo, hoo-ee, hoo-ee, hoo-ee.'

'White man come, heap come, keep come, Anthony heap holloo, hoo-ee, hoo-ee, Injun shoot, heap shoot, white man keep come, then Injun run, run, run, heap run. Me run, run, heap run. Bimeby me come to a swamp, me jump in—yoo-ook, sink down, hide, night come, me slip away.' It excited me greatly to hear the old Indian savage act out this scene, and tell the tale of this great battle, and the picture remains in my mind vivid to this day. In July, 1817, father entered fractional sections 5 and 6, town 18, range 13 east, near the head of West Fork of White Water, now in Randolph, but then in Wayne, just east of the new boundary, and two or three miles farther up than any other settler, like the Nolan's Fork settlers three years before, on the utmost verge of civilization. We laid our corn by, helped Uncle George

"OLD EDDY," WHITE RIVER, NEAR FARMLAND.

Smith through harvest and haying, and then August 18, 1817, father took his team and wagon, my two older brothers, David and Carey, and myself, and went out to his land, several miles through the woods, to build a cabin. We stayed all night at old William Blount's (the Zimmerman farm), and the next morning went on, cutting a road as we went. A little after noon we got to the spot, the top of the hill where my father built, and where he spent the rest of his days. We cleared the bushes away, turned the horses to the feed trough on the tongue, and went to work. In a week we had a cabin up and covered, and had made a fire-place and chimney up to the funnel with dirt back and jambs, but the house had no floor. Father and one brother went back to bring the family and things, but my other brother and myself stayed there and cleared a patch for turnips. The next week the family came, and we sowed our turnips. We had a few small late ones that fall. We hewed logs and built a house in October, and had it floored and ready in December. In the winter we cleared two acres in the creek bottom, smooth for meadow, and sowed it in timothy; also six acres, 'eighteen inches and under,' for corn, and built a smith shop for father to work at his trade in. He was a blacksmith.

William Blount lived highest up the creek, but one of his sons-in-law built a cabin about one-fourth mile above him, and another son-in-law lived on the same section.

John Proctor lived just below on section 17. Evan Shoemaker had the north end, and Griffin Davis the south end of fractional section 18.

John Jordan (and his son, William) lived on section 19, in Wayne county. Thomas Brower and John Gwynn lived below on the same section. James Malcom was on the northeast quarter of section 17, and Henry Shoemaker lived with him. Samuel Sales, Arny Hall, and David Jones, lived on the southeast quarter of section 17. Isaac Barnes and John C. Hodge (brothers-in-law), from Beaver county, Penn., had entered land and built cabins. They went back for their families, and returned in the spring of 1818, by boat, down the Ohio to Cincinnati, and thence by land. Mr. Barnes' cabin stood on section 7, across the creek from where Blount lived, and where Barrett Barnett lived a few years ago. Mr. Hodge's dwelling stood on section 8, near and south of where my father built, and where Emerson Street lived ten years ago. So Mr. Hodge was our nearest neighbor.

The country was thickly covered with a tall, heavy forest, having a dense undergrowth of shrubs, wild grass and weeds. I will name the trees most abundant: first, beech, sugar tree, ash, three varieties, gray, blue and swamp; oak, five varieties, white, red, burr, pin, and river; poplar; walnut—white and black; elm—red or slippery, and white or hickory; hickory—white or shell-bark, and black or pignut; buckeye, linn, wild-maple, hackberry, coffee-nut, honey-locust, cottonwood. The undergrowth was spice-bush, iron-wood water-beech, horn-beam, prickly ash, dog-wood, kunnekanic (Indian name—tree now extinct), red-bud, papaw, wild-plumb, red and black haw, sassafras. In swamps there were black-alder, willow, thorn, crab-apple, young cotton-wood. Weeds and grasses were nettles, pea-vines, may-apple, ginseng, ferns, black snake-root, seneca-root, silk-weed, ramps (soon extinct), bear-grass, file-grass, skunk's cabbage, pond lily, cats-tail.

In clearings, there were butter weeds, thistles, mullen, dog fennel; in tilled lands, Spanish needles and touch-me-nots.

The game was deer, squirrels—gray, red and black; turkeys, pheasants and bears. Other wild animals—wolves, racoons, ground hogs, opossums, porcupines, wild cats, foxes, panthers, mink, otters and polecats. Wild bees were abundant.

People helped each other roll logs, raise buildings and husk corn, often going several miles for that purpose. For milling, people had to go to Milton, or even to Connersville. My father got a pair of hand mill-stones, and we ground meal upon them, rather than go so far to mill. We also beat hominy in a mortar, and used that and potatoes and squashes and pumpkins instead of bread. My father finally had his mill-stones geared, and much of the corn of the neighborhood was ground upon them. Two turning would grind pretty well, but four would rattle it out finely."

CLOTHING.

"Our clothing was made of flax, wool and deer-skin, all home made. There was no money to buy 'store clothes,' and very few to be bought. Trade was mostly by barter. Peltry, honey, beeswax (for there were bees, both wild and tame), etc., were traded for salt, iron (which always had to be bought), and sometimes for leather, though many tanned their own leather, and many wore only moccasins. Hides were tanned in great troughs made from trunks of large trees chopped out hollow.

Winter clothing was coon-skin caps, dressed deer-skin hunting shirts, pants and moccasins. Summer wear was linen, straw hats, bare-feet or moccasins. We often got moccasins from the Indians for corn, butter, hominy, salt, etc. The people, though now they would be called rough and uncouth, were yet neighborly, kind, sociable and affectionate, and intelligent and moral withal.

The wild range was good for many years, and we soon had plenty of cattle, which furnished abundance of milk, butter and meat, with hides and tallow to buy salt, iron and leather. From 1821 to 1828, a common way to trade was, so many young cattle for a thing, for (say) a horse, yoke of oxen, piece of land, etc., and anything from six months to three years old was 'counted in.' If the parties could not agree, the price was settled by referees. Sometimes so many bushels of wheat or corn would be the price. In 1826-27, money began to appear somewhat, and barter became less frequent. However, in the spring of 1838, I traded a large, rather ugly four-year-old horse, and a half-worn dragon-bitted bridle, for a forty-acre lot a mile west of Winchester, no price being named in the trade."

CLEARING LAND.

"Clearing land was done thus: 'One foot and under,' or 'eighteen inches and under,' i. e., all below twelve or eighteen inches, were cut, and they and the 'grub' and old logs were all burned up. The rest were deadened by 'girdling' (i. e., cutting through the bark, or the sap), or by burning brush heaps around the trees. If girdling to the 'red,' the tree would die immediately; if only through the bark, it would take two or three or four years, soonest if deadened in August. The deadened trees would fall more or less, and the land would have to be recleared each season for several years. Many, about the fourth year, would cut down everything standing, and clear the land fully. The trees would be made into proper lengths for rolling by 'niggering,' i. e. burning the trunks into pieces by piling large limbs and chunks across, and keeping fires across the tree-trunks. Attending to these fires was called 'watching the niggers.' I have done it many times, attending sometimes a hundred fires in one job. Sometimes, at first, land was cleared in the green, but as soon as they could, it would be done by deadening, and mostly in August, by cutting the undergrowth, with stubs a foot or so long; nearly all would rot or die out the third year. The whole might be cleared by cutting and cross-piling and firing, with but little labor."

BIRDS AND "VARMINTS."

"When the land was cleared 'in the green,' the birds, etc., for three or four years would nearly take the crop. The trees left standing would afford them ample refuge, and they would take heavy toll. In 1821 or 1822, a general inroad of turkeys, birds, squirrels, raccoons, and even bears, passed the West river settlement toward the south. Much of the crops were destroyed. The creatures crossed over the Ohio into Kentucky; vast numbers were slaughtered as they passed; I once killed three turkeys from one flock, and my father and brothers, five more, making eight in all. The little boys used to be kept going round the fields, 'hallooing' and screaming, to keep the birds away; sometimes yelling themselves hoarse."

"PIGEON ROOST."

"In the fall and winter of 1821-22, a pigeon roost was made between father's and Huntsville, on the southwest quarter section 33, township 18, range 13, and northwest quarter of section 4, township 18, range 13. They began in October or November, and stayed to lay and hatch the next spring. They would begin to come about sun-down, and keep coming till 8 or 9 o'clock at night; some flocks would be more than a mile long. There must have been millions of the birds; on still nights, we could hear their noise to our house, a mile and a half. People would go there by night and kill them by hundreds, coming from Martindale creek, and even from Green's Fork. The birds would lay their eggs in March, two in a nest, hatch and fly away, such as were left. I have seen but few for many years."

'FALLEN TIMBER.'

"In 1824, a terrible hurricane passed over my father's house. It was the second Sunday in July—the regular monthly meeting of the Baptist church at Salem, of which my father and mother were members. My brother, David, and myself had been there and were going home; hence it took place July 11, 1824, at 5 p. m. As we were going along the Jacksonburg road, near the county line, we saw a black cloud rising in the west and we stopped in an empty cabin, hitching our colts near by. The cloud roared terribly, and the sky became suddenly dark; in five minutes it grew as dark as a starlight night; no sound was heard for twenty or thirty minutes but a deep, dead, tremendous roar; I heard no rain, no thunder, no trees falling, nothing but that awful roar, deep, dead and loud; it stopped quite suddenly, and the sky grew bright again; on going out, we saw there had been a heavy rain, and many trees, both dead and green, had been blown down around us. We started again for home, two miles north; some trees had fallen across the road, but we got to old John Zimmerman's (Blount's) place, with little trouble. He and his boys were out fixing the fence to save the crops; forty or fifty rods of fence were flat, and many trees also. John Zimmerman said (he was Dutch), 'You can't kit home, te trees is all blown acrost te rote.' We said, 'We will try.' David said, 'Our colts can go through the brush where a wild cat can't.' The farther we went the worse it got. The thick timber began one quarter of a mile above, and for a half mile to the creek crossing there had been no clearing, but it had been dense, unbroken forest. As we entered the mass of crushed and fallen timber, we tried to follow the track till we got to where Elijah Arnold built, and his widow Rhoda still lives (1864). We could get no further; it was nearly dark, and stripping the bridles and old riding quilts from the heads and backs of the colts, we shouldered the things and put for home. The poor fillies neighed most pitifully as we left them; we got home before long, they came three days afterwards. They never told us how they got through, neither can I imagine, but they made it somehow, we found the family unhurt, frightened at the terrible storm, but thankful for safety. Most of the roof was blown off, weight poles and all; some of the clap-boards were carried 200 yards or more; the body of the house was hewed logs, and they stood firm. Early the next morning, the whole neighborhood set to work, righting up houses, building fences, etc., and on Thursday, we got the road opened again. Half a mile south of father's, a sound, thrifty-growing beech tree was twisted like a hickory withe, from two to eight feet above the ground, and was lying down all whole except that twist. It would seem that the tree had been bent over, and that while falling, it had been 'whirled' by the tornado, and the tree was so tough and green that it would not break, but just twisted like a withe. I helped cut the tree out of the road; it had stood west of the track and lay a little north of east. Another fact, at John E. Hodge's house, 300 yards south of father's, a twelve or fifteen gallon iron sugar kettle had been leaning against the southeast corner of the cabin, a low, one-story building. The wind moved the kettle three or four feet, and turned it bottom-upward. Mr. Hodge's cabin was wholly unroofed, and some of the ribs and logs were thrown out of place; the wind was stronger there than at fathers', being 300 yards nearer the center of the storm. How far west or how high up in the air the storm was formed I never knew; it seems to have struck the timber at the Randolph and Henry line; its course was about due east, and nearly in a straight line, verging slightly south. The extent of the storm was about six miles from west to east; it seems to have come down to the timber about the county line, and to have come nearer and widened for two and a half miles, then to have ground and crushed everything in its reach, for about one and a half miles in length, and a mile in width; then it seemed to rise or grow weaker, till at length it appeared to pass entirely above the timber. My father's house and the road we traveled were nearly a mile west of where its effect ceased, and its crashing track was about half a mile wide there, its whole track being at that point about three miles from north to south; not quite a mile west, the crashing power was a mile wide, and for two miles farther west, the crashing force was a mile from one to one and a quarter miles. That whole region was a dense virgin forest, and the storm threw down all the timber in one immense mass. Some four miles west, a road had been opened north and south; that road was utterly blocked, and for years was wholly impassable for man or beast. This space, four miles east and west, and a mile or so north and south, was called the 'fallen timber.' Some ten years later the settlers began to enter and clear the lands and the tract is now occupied by fine farms.

So far as known, no person and no animal was killed or injured, which is, indeed, a wonderful fact."

[NOTE.—It is stated elsewhere that a cow was killed belonging to Isaac Branson. See Reminiscences of Mrs. Anna Retz above.

URIAH BALL (1817).

"When father first came west (1817), not being satisfied with Warren county, Ohio, he took a flat-boat and floated down the Ohio and the Mississippi, stopping first in Tennessee, near Chickasaw Bluffs; he bought out an improvement there and located, but sickness soon drove us away from that region, and he went across the river to Little Prairie, Mo. Before long he turned his face northward again, coming back through Kentucky to Warren county, Ohio. The first Indian I ever saw was near Chickasaw Bluffs, Tenn. I was afraid of him, and tried to hide behind father; but the Indian (all painted and feathered) would 'peek' around father at me, to scare me, I suppose.

The great earthquake had occurred a few years before (1811-12), and at Little Prairie we would often come to great 'cracks' in the ground several feet wide. Sometimes trees would be standing split partly open, and 'astraddle' of the crack. Two miles from Little Prairie, there had been before the earthquake a lake of considerable size. The earthquake so raised the land as to 'spill all the water out,' and the bottom was at that time two feet higher than the surrounding land. Outside the lake were trees and cane-brakes, but in the lake ground were only great weeds like sun-flower weeds, called by the French 'wample-pins.'

The earth had not done shaking yet, for as I lay on the cabin floor sick with the ague, the house and the doors, and the dishes would rattle with the shaking of the earth; and as we were on the Mississippi, the water would 'ripple' as though there was a heavy shower, while yet the sky was clear and the air still.

In New Madrid the houses had been cracked and twisted by the earthquake, and stood so yet when we were there (although some years after the earthquake had occurred).

I sat on the west bank of the Mississippi and looked across the river with a spy-glass at the deer and the bears as they would come down to the river to drink, standing upon the eastern shore."

[Mr. Ball now resides at Union City, aged and feeble.]

JUDITH (WILSON) WAY (1817).

"I was born in Carolina in 1807, and was in my tenth year when father emigrated to Indiana in 1816-17.

On the first day of December, 1816, a large company of emigrants set out from South Carolina, bound for Randolph county, Indiana, as follows: Paul W. Way and family, five in number; John Way and family, six in number; John Moorman and family, six in number; Benjamin Beverly and family, six in number; George T. Wilson and family, five in number; Armsbee Diggs and family, two in number they were relatives by blood, or marriage, or both. Paul W. and John Way were brothers. George T. Wilson had married John Moorman's daughter.

Benjamin Beverly's wife was Paul Way's sister, as also was Armsbee Diggs' wife. Thus there were six men with their wives and eighteen children, making thirty in all. We had four wagons, to wit: One two-horse wagon, two five-horse wagons, one four-horse wagon. John Moorman (with his son-in-law, George Wilson), had a two-horse wagon and a five-horse wagon; Paul W. Way (with Benjamin Beverly, his brother-in-law), had one five-horse wagon. John Way (with Armsbee Diggs, his son-in-law), had one four-horse wagon, making sixteen horses in all.

We overtook families of emigrants in every variety of locomotion; some had only pack horses, and sometimes there would be a whole family with a single horse. I remember one such in particular. They had a little knot of a horse piled up with goods, with two or three children on top and the woman and baby besides. The whole cry was 'to get to Indiana,' no matter how, so as only to reach that paradise beyond the Ohio.

As I said, we started from Carolina December 1, 1816, and we reached Williamsburg, Wayne county, Indiana, February 27, 1817.

Our route lay across Blue Ridge, over the Holston, along French Broad and Crooked rivers, through Sawanna gap, over Cumberland Mountains, and so through Tennessee and Kentucky to the Ohio river at Cincinnati. We camped on New Year's night on a very high bluff on French Broad, with steps cut down to the river. We saw a live alligator, which to us children was an unusual sight. There was a severe snow-storm as we were on top of the Cumberland Mountains, and we had snow and cold weather from there all the way through. The Ohio river was frozen over, and we crossed on the ice; boys were skating, and ladies and gentlemen were riding in sleighs on the river. Our folks were afraid to cross with their heavy wagons and big teams; and the men went over to Cincinnati and got men to come with long ropes and haul the wagons across the ice in that way. The hind wheels of Paul Way's wagon (which was the last one to cross), broke through the ice, and it was hard work to get the wagon out and across, but they succeeded. George Wilson (my father), was likely to have been drowned. He fell into an air hole up to his neck, and came near being sucked under the ice; but he held to the ice and the men pulled him out.

We met a tribe of Indians (I think somewhere in Kentucky), going home with their ponies and their squaws. They had been to make peace, and to get their pay and their presents. There were 500 or more of them, men and women on ponies with the chief. Our company were greatly alarmed, but the Indians did us no harm. They asked for tobacco and bread, and they got what they asked for, so far as our folks had them. We were very glad to get along with them so easily as that. They went on their way, and our people passed on toward the Ohio, thankful to escape so cheaply.

That winter journey was a severe one, and to look back it is not easy to see how we were able to get safely through. But by God's mercy we were spared to come safe to our looked-for haven, and to reach the friends who had already made the trip, and to meet them in joy and thankfulness of heart."

This is understood to have been the first company of emigrants to White river in Randolph county.

"Paul W. Way, Henry H. Way, William Way, Robert Way and William Diggs had gone up White river from its mouth through the woods to Randolph county. Paul Way had gone back to Carolina to pilot the company through, and the others had stayed in Indiana. Henry Way and William Diggs went down to Wayne county during the fall and winter, and were married, and William Diggs and his wife are understood to have been the first family who settled on White river in Randolph county. Fannie Hill, of Jericho, oldest daughter of William Diggs, says her mother lived there for six weeks without seeing a white face, except probably her husband)."

Such moving and such settlements as this would not very well suit modern notions of pride and comfort. But such was the way of the pioneers, and thus this goodly heritage gained its brave and hardy settlers.

The Ways, the Wrights, the Moormans, the Diggs, the Pucketts, the Hills, and many others were numerous and noted in early times among the primitive settlers, and many of their descendants still remain.

[NOTE.—Truth compels us to state that the romantic travel up White river from near its mouth to the neighborhood of Winchester, is declared by William Diggs, Jr., one of the party who is supposed to have made the wonderful trip, to be wholly a "myth;" that their journey was simply from Henry county over into Randolph, far enough indeed, but by no means such a journey as a trip the whole length of White river would have been.]

[NOTE. 2—Jesse Way, who says he, too, was a lad in the same company of emigrants, though younger than Judith Wilson, insists that the party saw no company of Indians like that of which she speaks. It is difficult to see how she could imagine the fact, more so than to consider that Jesse may have forgotten the circumstance.]

[NOTE 3.—Another and perhaps a more serious objection to the correctness of her memory, is the question what Indians they could have been, and whither they were going. However, Aunt Judith insists that they met the Indians, let them be who they might be, and no matter where they had been or where they might be going.]

WILLIAM PEACOCK.

"Jessup's mill, on Greenville creek, was built some years before Cox's mill was, on White river.

When I was a little boy, say six years old, I used to go with some older boys to carry dinner to the men who were building Cox's mill, on White river.

For a long time there were no ministers belonging to Jericho meeting.

John Jones came about 1835. Benjamin Cox belonged to White river, and he used often to exercise at Jericho. Mr. Robinson has been a minister about fifteen years.

The early settlers were Henry Hill, Benoni Hill, Amos Peacock, Abram Peacock, Stanton Bailey, Jeremiah Cox, William Pickett, Joshua Buckingham.

The Shockney family did not come for years afterwards—not till I was grown."

GEORGE AND ASENATH THOMAS, 1818.

Asenath (Hill) Thomas was born in North Carolina, in 1815, and was brought to Jericho, Randolph county, Indiana, in 1818. Jeremiah Cox entered land in the neighborhood before Henry Hill came. Abram and Amos Peacock were the first settlers there. They came, also, in 1818, but before Henry Hill did. A Mr. Kennedy lived up White river, three miles away, near Mount Zion. Mrs. Thomas says, "We used to 'neighbor' with them, they lived so near us. We went by a 'blazed path' through the woods. An 'Indian trail' passed from the north and west through Jericho, and past old Benjamin Thomas', east of Newport. The Indians would go in companies, fifteen or twenty pack-horses at one time. They would call at father's (Henry Hill's) for bread and milk. They thought milk was a wonderful treat. They would bring hickory kernels, moccasins, baskets, etc., to exchange for corn, meal, salt, etc. One of their chiefs was named Johnny Cornstalk. He often passed, and was always friendly. He was a stout, heavy man, with large limbs and high cheek bones. He would come in and stay and talk and laugh and enjoy himself for hours with us. The Indians mostly talked very broken English, but he spoke our language quite well.

There was one bad Indian; the tribe had driven him off. He skulked round among the whites. Finally he shot a white man, and another white man shot him and wounded him, and still another man killed him. The Indians would not take him after he was wounded. The poor fellow got Mr. Lewallyn, of Ridgeville, to take him in. Mr. Lewallyn sent to the Indians to come and get him. They said 'No bad Indian; don't want him.' The man whom the Indian shot, found that he was at Lewallyn's, and came there and shot him as he lay wounded in bed." [This was Fleming. See other accounts elsewhere.]

"Friends' Meeting at Jericho was established about 1821. They built a log-cabin church, no windows, but merely holes, with shutters. The seats were poles, with legs. The women's side had a big fire-place; the men's side had a hearth in the middle, with a hole above to let the smoke out. They would use coals from the fire-place, with bark, etc., that would not smoke much.

Benoni Hill, Henry Hill, Amos Peacock, Abram Peacock, Elijah Cox and Wm. Cox formed the meeting. The first preacher was John Jones, 1835. The first school was in 1822 or 1823, taught by Mariam Hill, consisting of twenty or twenty-five pupils, in Friends' meeting-house. Father Henry Hill once went to Richmond to work for money to pay his taxes, $1. He could get work at 25 cents per day. John Charles lent him $1, and he came back and paid them. He has taken bacon to Richmond, and sold it at $1 a hundred, half in trade. Eggs and chickens, for awhile, were no sale at all. Bye and bye we could get 3 cents a dozen for eggs, at Winchester.

The first mill on White river, in this region, was Jeremiah Cox's—a water mill; a corn mill at first, then a flour mill also. The first run was gray heads; the other run was buhrs from abroad. It was built in 1825, and stood forty-five years. It was somewhat famous in its day.

The lumber for Jeremiah Cox's house, owned now by Simon Cox—house still standing—was hauled fifty-two years ago from Richmond, and from Uncle Elijah Thomas' saw-mill, near Newport.

Henry Hill lived in a pole cabin, fourteen by sixteen feet; no windows, but a hole for four lights, with a shutter. He made a sash with his pocket-knife, put in the lights, and then we had a window, and were grand for a fact! Our hearth was rock and dirt pounded together. Cattle would get fat on the wild pea-vines, etc., but they died with what was called the 'bloody murrain.' They were fat and full of tallow, but they would be taken sick and die in a few hours. Father had four heifers 'come in' nearly at one time, and three died suddenly.

People tanned their own leather in tan-troughs, made from big logs hewed out. George Thomas has a strip of leather tanned by Henry Hill forty-five years ago. George has worn it in his suspenders forty years, and it is good and strong now.

People went to meeting in home-spun—the men in linen or tow shirts, and tow pantaloons, and deer-skin jackets; the women in check home-spun. All classes would go barefooted. After awhile, people began to have shoes, and women would carry their shoes in their hands, and put them on when near church."

JAMES CLARK, 1819.

"We went to mill at Moffat's, Newman's or Cox's. Our corn sacks would hold four bushels, but we would take two or three bushels, and put the sacks across the horse. Fruit was abundant—gooseberries, plums, etc. Our clothing was linsey, home-spun, or buckskin. Breeches, jackets, hunting-shirts, were buckskin.

To dress skins was a great curiosity. The art is now nearly lost. I used to dress many skins years ago, and I will tell how:"

TO DRESS DEERSKINS.

"Soak the skin soft; take off the flesh with a grain knife (a tedious job, two good skins are a full day's work); hang them up till dry; take deer's or beef's brains and dry them on a board, and put them into a sack with warm water, and squeeze them till like soap-suds; work the skin soft in this lather, two or three hours, wring it lengthwise as dry as possible, and stretch and pull it in every possible way till entirely dry. Do so (soak, wring, pull) three or four times, till white. Then cut off all the flash and smoke the skin soft and yellow. It is nice and warm when dry, but when wet it will stick to your hide."

LOST CHILD.

"Once a child, Mr. Burson's, was lost—a three year-old girl. It wandered off three miles through the woods, to Micajah Morgan's. Mr. Morgan saw it clambering the fence, and took it in. Mrs. Morgan said, 'She looks like Enoch Burson's child.' Mr. Morgan started on horseback with the girl, and met Ephraim Bowen, hunting it. Mr. Bowen took the child and carried it home."

WORK, MONEY, ETC.

"At one time I hired out, mowing, twenty-six and a half days, at 25 cents a day. (Eighteen years old.) We used shin-plasters, mostly, for money. We seldom could get silver. The coins were commonly cut up into pieces, called 'sharp-shins.' Shin-plasters disappeared by and by, but silver was still very scarce. Sugar and deerskins were all we had to sell for money. Sugar, $6 a hundred; deerskins, from 25 to 50 cents apiece; fawn-skins, 25 cents; doe-skins, 37½ cents; old buckskins, 50 cents. Land was, at first, $2 per acre; one-quarter down, not less than 160 acres. About 1820, the price was put at $1.25, and 80 acres; and afterwards, 40 acres, all down. Many paid entry money and could not pay the rest, and lost their land. Afterwards, the law was made so as to allow a 'floating claim,' i. e., the money paid might apply to a part of the land.

The community was civil and peaceable, mostly. No great crimes, no big affrays, nor fights, nor murders.

There was a mill north of Spartanburg—Jessup's mill. I went there once. There was no roof; the mill stood open. The miller's house was across the creek from the mill, and a foot-log between. He would take a peck measure full over, turn it in, come back and talk awhile, and go with another peck, and so all night long; just about a peck an hour."

DEER HUNTING.

"Next day I killed my second deer. I had killed the first deer near Overman's. I shot that first deer, and asked him to help carry it in. 'No,' said Overman, 'I can't leave planting corn. You just take it on your shoulders, and its tail between your teeth, and climb a sapling and hang it up.' I didn't do it, however. But for my second deer. I was hunting a horse in the range. As I was going round a pond at the head of Nolan's Fork, a deer sprang up ahead of me, and I drew up my gun and let fly, and down came the deer. In 1821, I was staying with a cousin, north of where Spartanburg now is. We had been planting corn, and when that was done I went hunting. I saw no game till, finally, I came to Beaver Pond. The deer tracks were abundant, but no deer. Coming to a thick maple-top, I laid my rifle in it, and cleared away the twigs, and made a 'rest' for my gun. About sundown I saw a deer cross, but too far off to shoot. About dusk there stood a doe in plain sight, about twenty steps away. I shot and she went. I hunted for her, but no doe could I find. I went back to my 'rest' to watch for deer again. Presently along came a big buck, not ten yards distant. I moved, and he 'bounced.' About 11 o'clock, I heard the water go 'plug-plug.' Soon I saw a deer about 20 steps from me, running its head into the water, and flapping its ears. I sighted for two minutes, and shot, and the deer ran. I got down to load the gun, but I had not powder enough; and so I went to the cabin about 12 o'clock. 'Where have you been all night?' 'Beaver Pond.' 'Shooting deer?' 'Yes.' 'What luck?' 'Had two shots, but haven't found my deer.' In the morning we went out and found both deer, dead, not ten yards apart. This was the Napoleon died, 1821.

Twice I have shot three deer in one day, and two in a day many times.

Once I was chasing a gang of deer, and the sky clouded up and I started for home. All at once there stood four deer gazing at me. I let drive at them. After loading again, I went to the place and found the 'hair cut' and scattered on the snow. I followed the trail and saw blood plenty, and at length found the deer, dead, 100 yards from where it had been shot. I hung it up, skinned it, left the meat hanging, and, going back, I found another place of 'hair cut.' I followed that trail, also and the first I knew, there lay the other deer, dead, in a thicket of spice-brush. One shot had killed both deer. The carcass of the dead buck lay stiff and cold where it had been shot down. I did with that as with the other, and went to the cabin. Next morning we brought in the venison, and splendid meat it was, too, I can tell you."

SOLOMON WRIGHT.

"My grandfather, James Wright, was a Carolinian Quaker, who fled to the wilds of the Holston, in Tennessee, to escape conscription into the army, in the war of 1776. My father, John Wright, was puny at first, and was rocked in an old trunk-cover lined with the skin of a sea animal, the hair on which is said to rise and fall with the tides. As he grew up, he gained strength and vigor. He married Margaret Reece, in Carolina. About 1804, the Wrights emigrated to Ohio, to military lands. In 1814, or thereabouts, the twelve-mile strip came into market, and some fourteen or fifteen families, who lost their lands on the military tract through a flaw in the title, came, soon afterwards, to Randolph county. They had fine improvements in Ohio, but they lost the whole. James and Abram Wright moved first of this company. My father came out and selected some land, but did not move then. James and Abram Wright settled on Eight-mile creek. William Haworth came with them. William Diggs and Armsbee Diggs came from Carolina about the same time. William Way, Sr., and his sons, William, Paul and Henry, all grown and married, came also. I think these came in the fall of 1815. James and Abram Wright moved soon afterwards from Clinton county, Ohio.

March 10, 1816, my brother Isaac (one of the triplets), and myself started, with one horse for us both, from Clinton county, Ohio, to go to the woods of Randolph. With a few things in a sack slung across the horse (among them, seven or eight apples—the last of the season), we set off in high glee, I being fourteen years old, taking turns in riding, or as it is called, 'riding and tying,' a very common practice then. Our route was Waynesville, Springboro, Eaton, New Paris, Williamsburg, Ind., and so on to Randolph. We got to brother James' glad enough. Isaac said, 'I had to walk nearly all the way. Solomon was so chicklegged he could hardly go at all.' We went to work on father's place to clear and build. One day I had laid off my coat and vest on the leaves, when the fire ran and caught them, and burnt leaves, coat, vest and all. As I held up the smoking shreds, Uncle Haworth cried, 'Save the buttons!' 'There are no buttons to save' was the curt reply. There was I, a poor lad fourteen years old, one hundred and twenty miles from home, with no clothes but shirt and pants. I had to wear an old overcoat of brother James', a world too large and long, which made me the laughing stock at all the log-rollings. In warm weather, I gladly shed the old coat and took to shirt and pants.

I stayed through the summer, and were turned home; and in about a year father and I came through with a load of provisions. A year after that, father moved to his land. Cabin creek was so named on a trip we made to David Connor's, below Wheeling. Seeing a group of Indian cabins on the bank of the creek, some one cried, 'Let us call the stream Cabin creek,' and Cabin creek it is to this day. Muncie was so named from Muncie [Montzie], an old Indian. The Indians complained of Connor's whiskey. 'Too much "Sinewa," they said. I saw the first lot sold in Winchester.

Once in school, near Dunkirk, on the last day, the girls got behind the chimney and pushed the fire-place and back wall over into the house, and scattered the clay all over the floor—grand fun, they thought.

My oldest boy, George Washington, killed a bear. He was quite young, and people would ask, 'Is that the boy who killed the bear?' He skinned the bear and brought it [the skin] home.

One day some white men and Indians were jumping near the mill-pond. One white man jumped with stones in his hands. The Indians were angry. One of them threw the stones into the pond exclaiming, 'No fair!'

Nathan Thornburg came one day and said, 'We are starving or meat.' We went hunting, but found nothing. Just as we were going home, a deer started up. I shot the deer and cried to Thornburg, 'There is your meat; go get it,' which he did.

One evening a man came and said, 'There is a bear over the hill yonder.' We went, and, sure enough, the dogs had treed a bear. Thornburg snapped and I snapped. He stuck in a new flint and shot the bear outright. One man said, not very long age, 'The telegraph cannot come here; there is no water-course.' Once, as we were traveling near Smithfield, we came upon a gang of Indians, lying on the ground under the oak trees. The dog barked, and they jumped up and hastily wrapped themselves up in some way. One

Indian asked me for 'big ax, to cut bee tree.' I told him, 'No; got none.' He brought me some venison, as black as black cloth, and gave me a piece. I took it. The young man with we took none. The Indian was displeased, and said, 'No good white man.'

In 1833, my wife noticed the 'stars falling.' She went to the door and cried, 'O, come and look, quick, or the stars will all be down!' While we were moving from Ohio, as we stopped one evening, a young man sat on a stone and sang:

'O, when shall I see Jesus, and reign with Him above?'

The occasion was affecting. We felt lonely and sad, and wept freely.

Between Williamsburg and White River, an old ewe 'gave out,' and we laid her on a tree-root 'in the wilderness.' Seven weeks afterward we found her there, feeding about, and took her home. A great many Indians were here then. I used to hop with them and shoot at a mark. We lived in harmony till two young white men went down below Stoney creek and stole two Indian ponies and escaped to Ohio. Shortly, the Indians went after them. They said, 'No good white man; steal Indian ponies.' I always noticed that, in the Indian difficulties, the whites were mostly to blame, and that the trouble generally arose from stealing their horses or from selling them liquor.

A while after we came to Randolph, father sent me to mill, on the Stillwater below Greenville. I followed the Indian trail through the forest, seeing not a living soul, except that I met some Indians, who, upon my asking them 'how far to Greenville?' held up six fingers, to mean, as I supposed, six miles. When I got to Greenville, the old fort was there in decay and partial ruin, and not much of a town. Passing on, I found the mill on Stillwater, some miles below, got my 'grinding,' and returned safetly home."

[This was probably before 1820. Solomon Wright is probably mistaken, by at least one year, in his idea of the time when he came to Randolph. It seems well settled that William Diggs and the Ways came in the fall of 1816, and that the Wrights, etc., none of them till at least the spring, or, more probably, the fall, of 1817. They did, some of them, certainly arrive that fall, and that was probably the time, December, 1817, when William Wright went to White River, as told by John Fisher, he thinking that wagon the first to White River.]

The following reminiscences of Solomon Wright were written and furnished by Miss Lillie A. Garrett:

"About the time grandpa settled on this farm, he saw a young fawn floating down White river, rescued it from the water and put it into a hollow sycamore; and when he came back from hunting, took it home. He kept it several years. Grandpa says, 'I put a bell on it, and it would go off into the woods, and wild deer would follow it; and when I would hear the bell I would look out for the deer and kill them.'

He became awful cross, and when anybody came, he would turn his hair back, bow up his neck, meet them at the gate, and they had to stand back or 'be floored.' One day, two boys were going to meeting, and 'Buck' made them 'climb' to get out of his way; and he kept them up their saplings till it was too late for meeting. At last he 'bunted' over one of the children, and grandpa shot him.

Jacob Wright and Sarah Wright (?) were the names on the first marriage license issued at Winchester.

Abram Wright and Isom Garrett were pioneer teachers. One taught at Dunkirk and one on Green's Fork, and the schools used to meet to 'spell' against each other. Those 'spelling matches' were gay times, and were useful, to boot.

To persons inquiring the way to Winchester, Charles Conway used to reply, 'Just go on as far as you can get among the logs and brush, and you are in Winchester.' Paul W. Way surveyed the town plat, and Abram Wright carried the chain for him. David Wright 'cried' the lots at the first sale. He said to David Wysong, 'That young man is good-looking, and he would look still better if he would bid just a little higher.' Hiram Mendenhall and others, between 1830 and 1840, joined their possessions and formed a 'Community' at Unionsport. The town still stands, but the 'Community' was dissolved long, long ago.

In time of the 'Millerism' excitement, a deep snow fell, which the frightened devotees predicted would turn to brimstone.

The first teacher at Cabin Creek was Mary Ann Ring. Grandpa sent the two oldest children. The little 'chits' hid their dinner, tied up in a rag, under the floor before they entered the schoolroom on the first day.

The Diggs', Littleberry, Marshall and Franklin taught the school in after times, and the 'Wright children' grew fond of learning, eight attending at one time. And future years found them at Winchester, Williamsburg, Liber, etc., and then as teachers through the region. Great interest was taken by them in temperance, anti-slavery, etc. Fanny, the youngest, now the wife of Judge R. S. Taylor, of Fort Wayne, used to stand on a chair and recite:

'What, fellow-countrymen in chains!
Slaves in a land of light and law!'

—Whittier.

In the 'Separation,' most of the Cabin Creek Friends left the 'Body.' Amos Bond, J. H. Bond, Solomon Wright, etc., were noted Anti-slavery Friends. Great enthusiasm prevailed, and lectures, papers, pamphlets, etc., were the order of the day. The underground railroad track passed this way, and 'Cabin Creek' was one of the chief stations.

When 'Birney's vote' was found to be about 7,000, Hiram Mendenhall, who presented the 'petition' to Henry Clay, at Richmond, Indiana, said, 'Thank God, there are left yet 7,000 men who have not bowed the knee to Baal, nor kissed his image'—referring to the rumor that so many kissed Henry Clay. Grandpa kept an inn for many years, as this road was a great Western thoroughfare.

The Van Amburg show passed here once and the men, some of them, stayed overnight, and the elephant stood in the yard, tied to a young walnut tree.

Some Mormon converts once camped at the creek ford, and their preacher declared they were going to Nauvoo, protected by the same power that guarded Daniel in the 'lions' den.' They seemed sincere and hearty in their faith. Abram Wright attended a meeting of Mormons, at which the people wept profusely under the words of a speaker who said he had prayed all night to be delivered from the devil, whose chains he could hear rattling down the stairs.

Samuel Peters, a highly respected young colored man, used to board with us. He went South, after the war, was cashier of the Freedman's Bank, at Shreveport, Louisiana, and had been elected to Congress there, when he died in the fall of 1873 by yellow fever, which struck that city so fatally at that time. First burial in Friends' burying-ground at Cabin Creek was a child of Mordecai Bond's, and the next was Jethro Hiatt's wife.

First mill in Stoney Creek township was built at Windsor by John Thornburg, 1827. The first cooking stove was owned by Solomon Wright, bought at Newport.

A criminal with his legs fastened round the horse, once stopped for dinner. Two men held the clanking chains upon his ankles as he walked into the house. 'Look at that and be honest, boys,' said grandpa to his sons, who were standing by and gazing at the poor fellow.

Eminent Quaker preachers of the olden time, in Randolph county, were Isom Puckett, Benjamin Cox and others. In later years, Martha Wooton, Daniel Puckett, Charles Osborn, etc., labored here to some extent, though not residents within the limits of the county."

WILLIAM ROBINSON.

"I have owned and improved six different farms in this region, building six separate houses. When my father moved here I was too young to go to mill, but my brothers used to go to Solomon Wright's to mill and get wheat ground, unbolted, and then take the meal to an old man who had made a sieve by stretching a cloth over a piece of hoop bent round, and they would sift the meal through that and thus make flour.

Soon after father settled, the State road was made from Winchester to the State line toward Greenville, right past father's cabin. I saw the men going along blazing 'the trees.' Judge Edwards said that when Paul Way surveyed the road, he had a man go along the county road and blow a horn, so as to keep him in a straight course. When they reached the 'Dismal,' they hunted a narrow passage for a crossing, and curved the road to hit the spot. The State road was the leading highway in this country, and, for many years, an immense amount of travel passed upon it. I have counted eighty wagons of movers in one day, going to western Indiana, Illinois, etc. My father's cabin was a stopping-place, and we have had so many at once that we boys often had to go to the hay mow to sleep to give room to the lodgers.

Years afterward, when the West had become somewhat settled, cattle used to be taken east in immense droves. I have seen 700 or 800 in a single herd. David Heaston's, James Griffis', and my father's were the chief places for movers and for droves. Father used to charge a man for supper, breakfast, lodging and horse feed, 37½ cents. The old National road was another great thoroughfare.

An old man, Banta, built a bridge over Greenville creek on the State road, and I helped him do the job. We went out there to work, camping in the woods. His folks neglected to bring us any provisions, and for three days we lived on bread and water.

My father lived here six years before he was able to enter any land.

He got money to enter his first land by hauling wheat to Lewallyn's mill, at Ridgeville, for flour; and by buying pork, potatoes, etc., building a flat-boat, and taking the boat-load of bacon, flour, etc., down the river to Logansport, and selling his load to the Indians.

He entered land east of Winchester (Kemp farm). A company, of whom Jesse Way was one, went down the Mississinewa river with loaded flat-boats, and Jesse lost his boat, and his load, too, in trying to run the dam at Byles's mill on that river.

An Indian 'trail' was simply a path through the woods. The path would be trodden so as to be plainly visible. Sometimes the amount of pony-travel would be so great as to make a heavily-trodden track. 'Trails' passed in various directions: One led from Muncie to Greenville, straight as an arrow. One from Muncie to Fort Wayne; one from Godfroy Farm to Fort Wayne, etc."

RUTH (TEST) ROBINSON.

"When a girl, I went with my mother to a quilting and corn-husking. When we got there nothing seemed ready, but the boys went to the woods and got some poles for frames; the women pieced the quilt and carded the tow, and so they quilted the quilt, each woman quilting where and how she pleased. Doubtless, the quilt was just as warm, which is the chief thing after all. One woman got drunk. She said she was 'getting her 'nats upon the taps;' and she would go out and help cook. Whisky was everywhere. Still-houses were plenty, and much whisky was made and drank. My father settled in Union county in 1817. He owned the first mill in that county, and my oldest brother built a factory. My father came to Ohio from New Jersey in 1802, to Waynesville, and I was born there. He resided at Cincinnati eighteen months, then at Covington, operating a woolen factory, and building the first good house in Covington. He lived thirty-six years on the East fork of White river, and then moved to Richmond, residing there for four years. He died in 1852, eighty-four years old.

Some men from Union county took the first (and only) two flat-boats down the East Fork of White Water to New Orleans. There was a heavy freshet and the water was very high. There was a great crowd to see them start, from all the country round. They sold their load at New Orleans and came back all the way from that distant market on foot."

THOMAS WARD.

"The first money I ever had, when a young lad, as my own, was 12½ cents. My brother and I sold a pair of deer-horns for 25 cents, and I had half. I managed, afterward, somehow, to get 87½ cents, and loaned it to father, he promising to give me a sheep. His 'sheep' proved to be a lamb, but I raised it and traded it for a pig, and then that for a calf, and so on. Afterward I came to be the owner of a colt, which I traded again, and so on from small things to greater, till, by the time I was twenty-one years old, I had become the owner of six hundred acres of wild land."

[Gideon Shaw states that Thomas Ward, when a lad, was at his father's, in the southeast corner of Randolph county, buying furs, etc.]

"I began very early to trade for things. Father let me have a pig or two, and I traded for a calf and then for a motherless colt, and so on. I bought my own clothes. As before stated, men would come along and hire me to survey and deaden land, and I would do the surveying, and hire the deadening for less than what they would give me. At one time I entered an eighty-acre tract for $100, and sold it shortly after for $200. I used to trade in furs and peltry, and would make, sometimes, $200 in a single winter, or even more in that way.

The first land I ever entered for myself I carried the money in my hand all the way to Fort Wayne, traveling on foot the whole distance. There was a nice Indian sugar orchard which I wished very much to own. We found out that another party was planning to enter it, and I started on foot with money for that tract, and also for some that father wished to enter. I had the money tied up, and carried it in my hand the whole way. The 'specie circular' had lately been issued, and in just three days it was to take effect. I got to John Brooks' the first night, gave Mrs. B. the money to keep and went to bed. The next day I got to Adam Miller's, near Bluffton. The third day I tried hard to make Fort Wayne, but the traveling was very bad, the snow being nearly knee deep, and I was but a boy (eighteen years old, or perhaps less), and I had to come short of the mark. In the morning I went to the registrar's office, made application for the land for myself and my father, got my certificate from that office and went boldly to the receiver. Colonel Spencer knew my father and knew me too, for he had stayed at my father's at different times. I told him the whole story—the paper money, the sudden start, my hard travel on foot, and how I had missed by a few hours, and what a disappointment it would be to lose my land after such a chase for it.

He was a sturdy Democrat, and father was a steadfast Whig; but Colonel Spencer was a gentleman and a kind-hearted man, and he pitied the poor boy; and he said to me, 'You shall have your land, and your father shall, too. I am going into Ohio on business of my own, and I can use the money myself.' So he took my money and I entered the land. But my piece was some four acres more than a full eighty, and it took $5 extra; and that was every cent of money I had. But I was determined I would have the land, let come what would; so I paid my last cent and got it. I told Colonel Spencer what I had done, and he asked me how I expected to get home. I told him I did not know, but that I was going to start and risk getting through. 'O, that will never do,' said he; and he insisted that I should borrow of him enough to take me home. I finally did so, and tramped home again, sending his money back the first chance I found. I had an uncle (Daniel Miller), on Robinson's Prairie, and I stayed the first night with him, the second night at Portland, and got home the third night. When I started in the morning from my uncle's, on my way from Fort Wayne, he told me of a nearer way through the woods; that I could go by 'blazes' to the Wabash, and cut off several miles. I took his directions, and followed the 'blazes' through without difficulty. I thought no more of traveling thus through the thick woods, guided only by 'blazed' trees, than I would now to travel along a beaten road.

I have lost great amounts of property during my life. I put two hundred and forty-five acres of land near Ridgeville, and one thousand acres of Iowa land, into the north and south road through Ridgeville, when it was first worked on, and lost it. I did more for the road than anybody else, living or dead. Others managed to secure their stock, but my loss by the road was $30,000 or more. Mr. Lewallyn's mill, at Ridgeville, was built, probably, after 1819. My father, Joab Ward, commenced building boats about 1835. When the country along the Wabash, etc., began to settle up, the fact made a market for several years, and the people of Wayne and Randolph tried to supply it by sending their produce down the Mississinewa to the Wabash, and thereabouts. Boats were needed, and Ridgeville was the head of high-water navigation, and so father took to building boats and selling them to people to take their produce down the river on. He would build a boat forty feet long by ten feet wide, at 62½ cents a foot, i. e., $25 for the boat, all ready for floating. He would cut the timber green, from the woods, have two heavy side-pieces sloped rounding upward at both ends, cut a 'gain' in the lower edge to receive the ends of the planks which formed the bottom, pin the bottom planks to the sides and the middle piece, fasten on some pieces of plank at the top of the gunwale, so as to increase the depth of the boat (making it, perhaps, two feet), stop up the cracks, and she was ready to receive her load and to float along her downward way. This flat-boating could be done only in times of flood.

High water was mostly during the winter and spring. The business lasted perhaps ten or fifteen years. The river floods became less, and the markets in that region ceased or were supplied in other ways.

Father built, in all, a large number of boats—thirty-seven in one spring. He used to hire hands to work for him, and board them at 12½ cents a meal.

One spring several boats started down the river, loaded with apples, potatoes, cider, etc. At the first mill dam below Marion (McClure's), one boat, belonging to Hampton Brown, who lived below Newport (Fountain City), in going over the dam, ran under and sunk and lost the whole cargo, and the boat was ruined. The men swam out to the shore and were saved.

At one time a raft came plunging down upon the swift-rushing flood. They contrived to land a cable and tied it round a tree; but the raft broke in two and went over the dam. There were two men on the raft. One came ashore, but the other shot under the water and was never again seen alive. His dead body was found afterward, some distance below."

DAVID LASLEY.

"William Edwards came in 1818; Jonathan Edwards came in 1818; they lived north toward town.

David Wysong lived three-quarters of a mile east.

John Elzroth lived near the 'poor farm,' coming in 1818.

Thomas Jarrett came in 1818. He lived one-quarter mile away. Peter Lasley bought his land at private sale, but unimproved.

In Winchester there were a few log cabins, and a log court house. David Heaston came in 1819, a little southwest. In Winchester were Paul W. Way, Charles Conway, John Odell, John Wright (blacksmith), John Wright (judge).

I cleared off the public square in Winchester; there were three and one-half acres; it took me three months, working all day and half the night, and I got $35 for the job. Moorman Way got more than double that sum ($75) years afterward for putting in new trees. It was all 'in the green,' there came a snow and the heaps would not burn well; much was sugar-tree, three feet and over. A very large elm stood right in the cross street. The timber in this region was sugar-tree, beech, hickory, walnut, oak, elm, etc. Oak was scarce, sugar-tree most abundant of all. There was much wet land in the region that nobody would have, that land is now the best in the county. I helped make a big cross-way on the State road west of Winchester, three-quarters of a mile long. The logs were, many of them, eighteen inches through. Two of us built it in three months, getting $10 a month, boarding ourselves. Poles had to be put in between the logs at the top, and the whole was covered with dirt six inches deep. We had to cut many of the trees, standing knee-deep in water, and the logs often floated as we hauled them, making the work of drawing them to the track much easier."

JOHN MANN, GREENSFORK.

"We used to grind out corn on a hand-mill. My father had one, and the neighbors were in the habit of coming and using it. It was hard work; a few quarts would tire a man completely out; you had to turn with one hand and feed with the other (a few grains at a time). The mill worked very slowly, and we generally ground only enough for a meal or two at once. The way the mill was made and worked was this: The lower stone was laid flat and fast; the upper stone was fixed to turn upon a center piece in some way, and was made to revolve by a pole, fastened (loosely) in a beam above, and in the top of the stone below, near the edge of the stone, in a shallow hole drilled in the surface. This drilling into the stone was hard to do, for there were no tools, and there was no way to fasten anything to the stone. These stones were about two feet across, home-dressed and home-made."

SIMON COX.

"When I came to Randolph, Charles Conway lived half a mile south of Winchester. John Wright (blacksmith) lived on the north side of Winchester. Paul Beard and Jesse Johnson (and perhaps others), were on Greensfork, near Lynn. There were some settlers down White river, but I did not know them. No settlers were on White river above us. John Cox, my father, came in 1818, with eight children; none are now living but myself. He died forty years ago. White River meeting was set up about 1820. The members were Benjamin Cox, John Wright (blacksmith), Jonathan Hiatt, Simon Cox, Thomas Ward, Joseph Moffatt and maybe others. Jericho meeting was begun soon afterward. The first school was about 1823; Isaac Pearson was the teacher. George Cox, born 1820, remembers riding home from school on his Uncle Pearson's shoulders; George was perhaps three years old.

The first mill was on Salt creek, north of Winchester, water-mill, built by Solomon Wright; it ground very slowly, being in use some years. Jeremiah Cox's mill was the next—a flour mill—bolt run by hand. The first meeting-house was the White River church, warmed by coal in the middle.

The first doctor I knew of was at Winchester. The first store I knew of was there too. The first frame house was Jeremiah Cox's, built about fifty-five years, and standing yet in good repair. The first child born in our settlement was my son, George Cox, born January 6, 1820.

Benjamin Cox and myself once started to go through to the Johnson settlement below Lynn, after some grain to take to mill. One had to go ahead and cut 'a road' for the wagon to pass. We had to 'camp out,' and a deep snow fell in the night."

BURKETT PIERCE.

"Meshach Lewallyn and Joab Ward lived near Ridgeville when I came; they had been there not long. James Massey and ———— Massey came the same fall that I did, and settled near Saratoga. (James Massey was here in 1818, before B. P. came). George Ritenour came two weeks after me and settled across the river. Meshach Lewallyn built a small mill in 1819 (I think), a water-mill; it would grind two or three bushels a day; the meal would come by 'spurts.' A dog came in and tried to lick the meal; now he would get some meal, and now he wouldn't; it did not suit him, and he would throw up his head and howl, and then he would try to lick the meal again. (This story has been told us of four different mills in the region, as also of one in Pennsylvania.)

Mr. Lewallyn afterward built a better mill, which became a noted point in those times for many years; he built a saw-mill also. David Connor built a log shanty two miles east of Deerfield, on the Mississinewa, and traded with the Indians. He sold them flour, and salt, and powder, and whisky, etc., for furs and peltry. He took loads of furs and skins in 'pirogues,' down the Mississinewa, up Wabash, up Little river, across the portage nine miles to St. Mary's, and so to Toledo and Detroit. He hauled his goods across the portage on wagons with three yoke of oxen. Brother Thomas and I went with him once. He had otter, muskrats, beaver, coon skins, minks, etc., a heavy load. He got his pay in silver, and bought a pony to bring the silver home. (This was in 1822.) He stayed at that point a year or two or so, and moved down the river to near Wheeling, and later, to below Marion, where he settled, built mills, and spent the rest of his life. He died rich a few years ago. I took hogs to him, which he bought and butchered. He showed me half a bushel of silver money. He was a 'smart' man, and a man of his word; but he would have his own way in a bargain. He made a 'power' of money. He did not like to sell to settlers, because he could not charge them enough. He commonly sold to Indians, and his price to them was very high.

Lewallyn's son, Shadrach, shot an Indian in their yard. A patch of corn had been planted, and the boys were gathering it on a sled (as most of the hauling was done then). The Indian had bought some powder and whisky at Connor's, and he 'cut up' and scared the boys. They unhitched the horses, and one of the boys ran, and the Indian ran after him and pointed his gun at the boy. Shadrach called out, 'What is the matter?' The boy said, 'The Indian is going to shoot me.' Shadrach caught his gun and undertook to shoot the Indian. Shadrach's wife tried to pull him away for 100 yards, but he shot and killed the Indian right there in the yard. This was in the evening. Shadrach went to his father's that night, and in the morning they covered the body in the hollow of a tree turned up. Old Meshach went to Muncie alone, and told the Indians what his son had done and that he should be tried fairly, and suffer the penalty. He also told the Indians to come and bury their comrade and they did so; fifteen or twenty came and buried him on the river bank on my farm. The young man was tried, but he was acquitted; and that made the Indians hostile. I went to Connor and talked with him, and got him to intercede with the Indians. Connor had great influence with them, and they would do almost anything he wished. He told them that I was his cousin, and that he wished they would be reconciled. I had come into the county after the shooting and before the trial. The Indians had torn up the floor in the cabin I was to live in, and I fixed it. We sent some boys to get the cabin ready, and we expected to move up from Joab Ward's. While the boys were at the cabin, six or seven Indians came in. One of the young men set them a puncheon bench, and they sat down. Presently one of them, Big Nose, drew his knife, and caught my brother Thomas, and cried, 'Now I kill you; you killed my cousin.' Brother said, 'No, I wasn't in the country then.' 'You are a liar,' Big Nose cried. He held Thomas a long time, but let him go at last. Another young man, who was with Thomas, ran away 100 yards and caught up his gun. The Indian caught my brother again, but finally said, 'I let you go. I no kill you this time—next time I kill you, sure.' The other Indians smiled like, but said nothing. The Indian turned my brother's face toward him and said, 'Look, next time I kill you.'

The boy came and met us and told us. Joab Ward said, 'Follow the Indians.' I said 'No.' Then he said, 'Go back with me.' My wife stood there with the child, and she said, 'Let us go on,' and we started again. We went, and my wife followed, trembling, but when we got in sight of the cabin, all fear left her. We got to the cabin and unloaded, and there came along a big, burly fellow, and offered to stay with us. 'He was not afraid,' he said. He stayed. There was a big stump of a tree-root near by. Before bed-time he looked out and said, 'I see an Indian out there. I see his blanket and his eyes. He is going to shoot.' The fellow got his gun and his axe, and stood ready a good while. I said, 'I am going to see.' 'Oh, no, he will shoot you.' I did go out; there was no Indian, only the stump and some snow. In the morning we went out to cut up the tree. I said, 'It would not do for an Indian to come and cut up like that one yesterday.' I looked up, and there stood an Indian! He heard what I said, but he smiled and was friendly.

In about a month my brother went back to Ohio. He had not been long gone when six Indians came and hallooed from across the river, wishing to come across, Big Nose among them. I took my canoe, and brought them across. I charged him with his mischief. He said, 'No, me civil.' 'Yes, it was you.' 'No whisky.' They went up to Connor's, and by and by, returned. (One was called Killbuck.) One was so drunk that he could not walk alone; two of them were leading him across waist-deep. When they had come across, Killbuck said, 'We not been saucy.' I went into the house, but presently he came back, foaming with rage. 'You go and get your gun,' said he. 'How do you know,' said I. 'What did you come back for?' 'To show you I no coward, give me some bread,' said he. I did, and he went away pacified. That poor drunken fellow lay there all night with his feet in the water, dead drunk.

One night an Indian hallooed. 'What do you want?' 'To come in and warm.' I let him in. 'Me civil,' said he. After he got in, he began to curse, and swore he would kill the first man that came into the cabin. I quieted him down, and then he began again. He went on to Connor's, and in the morning he came back, and said, 'Connor told me "No," and I won't hurt anybody.'

In boating, flat-boats would jump the dams four feet high. People would bring fruit from Wayne county in wagons, and boat it down to settlers on the Wabash and elsewhere.

After Fleming was killed, about twenty-five Indians came and had a ceremony over him. They had guns, and marched up very solemnly. One old Indian made a speech. He spoke a long time; Killbuck interpreted. He said, 'Don't be scared, he was a bad Indian. We will be friendly.' As the man stood there speaking, he seemed much affected, and the tears streamed down his cheeks.

We used to go to mill at first to Richmond. David Wysong made a thread-mill (for oxen). One day I went with a grist, and, in the night, while I was there, the oxen slipped through, and stopped the mill, but they could not get out and were just hanging by their necks.

The first school was taught two or three years after I came, in a log cabin, kept by Mr. Stevens, at $1 per scholar. There were perhaps twenty scholars. Half of the patrons could not pay. There were only two or three books in the school. The teacher would write letters on paddles to have the little fellows learn. I once drove thirty head of hogs to Ross county, Ohio, to have them fatten on the 'mast.' The Indians began to shoot them. I talked to them. 'Big Jim,' said 'Fat hog make good soup,' and laughed. When I came to the county, a big brush heap lay where the Winchester court house now stands.

John Cox settled near Winchester in 1815 or 1816."

JACOB DRIVER, 1821.

"Settlers when I came, in 1821: John Sample, at Sampletown (Mill), Paul W. Way, William Way, Henry Way, William Diggs (old), William Diggs (young), Littleberry Diggs, Armsbee Diggs, Tarlton Moorman, Robison, McIntyre, Walter Ruble, John Wright and others.

The Claytons came nearly when I did—perhaps two or three years afterward.

Tarlton Moorman is the brother of James Moorman and the father of Stephen Moorman."

PELATIAH BOND.

"Benjamin Bond, my father, lived, at one time, just west of New Garden meeting-house, in Wayne county.

In building a house, he bought nails at 25 cents a pound, and paid for them in cord-wood at 25 cents a cord, chopping the wood on his own land, and selling it on the ground at the rate of four cords for $1.

In Western Pennsylvania, in early times, a man gave a horse for a barrel of salt."

DANIEL B. MILLER, 1822.

"The settlers, when I came (on the Mississinewa, 1822), were, Riley Marshall, east of Deerfield;. William Massey, James Massey, Robert Massey, north of Miller's; Frank Peake, north of Mississinewa river; Samuel Emery, on the south side of the river; Burkett Pierce, west of Deerfield, north of river; George Ritenour, west of Deerfield, south of the river; Martin Boots, between Deerfield and Ridgeville. He was the first blacksmith in that region. He moved to Fairview, afterward.

I was single, and came on horseback from near Cincinnati, via Richmond and the 'Quaker Trace,' to Riley Marshall's. I bought eighty acres of a non-resident owner, and boarded eighteen months at Riley Marshall's, going then to Wayne county to be married, and bringing my wife with me, on horseback, into the woods of Randolph. Judge M. thinks James Massey was the first settler in Ward township. Some of the Masseys were there in 1818. Burkett Pierce says James and another Massey came the same fall he did—1820 or 1821. Judge M. thinks, also, that Philip Storms came to Allensville after he (Miller) came to Randolph, and that Connor stayed on the river above Deerfield, five or six years after 1822.

Lewallyn's mill ground very slowly. They said a pig crawled into the trough and licked up the meal, and that he would squeal because the meal did not come fast enough for him. This is probably another version of the 'hound' story, so often repeated.

Meetings were held for a long time at private dwellings, i. e., at Riley Marshall's, and also elsewhere."

MARTIN A. REEDER, 1822.

"John Gass had settled at his place, southwest of Winchester, and was keeping tavern there when the Ways, etc., came from South Carolina, in the spring of 1817.

The first entry in Randolph county used to be said to be three miles east of Winchester, where Miles Scott now lives. That land was entered by Jeremiah Moffett, in December, 1812.

Anti-slavery societies began to be formed between 1836 and 1840, or sooner. The U. G. R. R. had a sort of organization, though not a very elaborate one. Lists of the stations, of the routes, of the men who would entertain and who would forward fugitives, etc., were kept for reference along the route.

At Winchester, Eli Hiatt was a chief promoter of the work. Others, were James P. Way, Frank Diggs, Jesse Way, Moorman Way, Dr. Cook, M. A. Reeder and others; George Bailey and others, at Huntsville; Zimri Bond, John H. Bond, etc., at Cabin Creek. Large numbers were in sympathy with the work; some, in fact, who would hardly have been expected to do so. One man, a landlord in Jay county, who was then, and has always since been, a stanch Democrat, was nevertheless a constant and reliable helper in the U. G. R. R.

At one time, a company of twelve stopped at Eli Hiatt's. The pursuers came to town while the fugitives were still here. They knew the fugitives were not far off, but not that they were in town.

Dr. Cook went early toward Ridgeville, and, returning, met the man-hunters—giving them such information as caused them to suppose their prey was ahead, and they pressed vigorously onward (four men, all armed to the teeth). The slaves were taken back to Huntsville, from there to John Bond's and thence to Camden, and so on toward Canada.

During the war of 1861, Mr. Reeder and his wife went as nurses in the hospital, etc., spending more than a year in that service, and going wholly at his own expense. He was at Washington City, at Gettysburg and elsewhere, witnessing many sad and fearful scenes of terrible suffering, and doing his utmost for its relief. He bore a commission from Gov. Morton, and recommendations from President Lincoln, which enabled him to go anywhere he pleased in the prosecution of his loving work, and he feels thankful for the degree of success which attended his labors in his country's cause. Gov. Morton's name was itself a 'power,' and, of course, President Lincoln's 'sign manual' was omnipotent, and both together became irresistible."

The following was printed in a Winchester paper in 1875:

M. A. REEDER.

Last week, Mr. Harris Allman and his wife returned, after an absence of forty-five years, to visit their former friends and comrades in this vicinity—now, alas, but few. His father, Matthew Allman, was a very early settler here, and in 1830 removed to White Lick, between Plainfield and Indianapolis. Since that removal, a wonderful change has taken place!

Winchester was then a solid forest. About eight families were at that time residents of the place, scattered here and there over the town plat, in small log cabins. The heavy timber was near on every hand. The streets could not be seen. Only three houses now [1875] remain standing that were here when Mr. Allman left, and one of them has lately been reconstructed.

The old settlers are mostly gone. M. A. Reeder has been longest a resident of the town, including, also, his mother, who is still living. Mr. Allman passed through the city (in company with M. A. R.), searching, almost in vain, to find the spots of familiar interest of the early olden time. Mr. A. pointed out many locations of objects then important, now to the younger generation unknown.

The old schoolhouse, on the site where now stands the residence of A. Aker, Jr.; the old spring at which the scholars slaked their thirst, located on the east bank of Salt creek, about a rod south of the Washington street bridge; the old Aker hotel, partly standing, just east of the city hall; the Odle storeroom, the first dry goods store, afterward the residence of D. Haworth and of Jacob Elzroth, Esq., and now occupied by George Isom; Haworth's cabinet-shop, now occupied by J. W Diggs as an undertaken.

The big oak tree, seven feet through, which stood where now stands Col. H. H. Neff's elegant mansion; the "old fort and mound," near and in the "Fair Grounds;" the "Ring Spring," one hundred yards west of the toll-gate on the pike leading westward; the big walnut tree, six feet through, standing where now Hon. E. L. Watson resides; the old Quaker (or Richmond) Trace, leading from the Wayne county settlements into these northern woods, which ran out the south end of East street, which trace is now nearly obliterated—these, and other landmarks unknown to the present inhabitants, were full of interest to one who spent his boyhood in our vicinity when all was rough and wild, full fifty years ago.

ISAAC BRANSON—STONEY CREEK.

Came to Randolph county, Ind., in 1822 (or sooner), entered land in the southern part of Stoney creek, in 1822 [Section 10, 19, 12], being the farm afterward owned by Abram Clevinger. This land he sold to Joseph Rooks, about 1825, and entered land again in the southern part of Nettle Creek township [W. N. W., 15, 18, 12], near Mr. Burroughs, March 26, 1816. They sold out again and moved to Delaware county, becoming pioneers in that region.

They raised a large family of children, enduring great hardships and peril. Mr. Branson died many years ago, but "Aunt Patsy" Branson, as she is called, resides with one of her daughters, in Muncie, Delaware county. She is nearly ninety years old, but very spry and strong, walking a mile or two without difficulty or fatigue, and retaining in memory the events of her old-time life with remarkable tenacity.

They had peculiar hardships when they first settled in Randolph. They came into the woods with one horse of their own, though somebody's two-horse wagon moved them there. In less than a week after they arrived, her husband cut his knee with a frow, while splitting clap-boards for a roof to his "camp," and so badly that he could not step on his foot for six weeks; and much of that time he lay helpless on the puncheons of the floor. About the same time, his only horse died. The horse was not very good, but it was better than none, and it was all they had, and they had nothing to buy another.

They came in February, and brought four large iron kettles to make sugar in. Mrs. Branson and her husband's brother, a lad of seventeen, who came with them into their forest home, took hold and opened an immense sugar camp that stood ready to their hand, and actually cut the wood, carried the water, made the troughs, and produced about three barrels of excellent tree-sugar, all nice and dry, as good as need be. This sugar was indeed a "God-send" to the poor, afflicted family in the wilderness. Mr. B. hired a "plug" pony of his uncle in Wayne county, and contrived to do his work. After they got corn planted, he took sugar to Richmond and exchanged for corn and other necessaries. But their corn and vegetables grew splendidly, and long before the year was out, they had plenty of corn and potatoes and such things. They took to the corn as soon as it came to "roasting ears," potatoes as soon as they would do to cook, and squashes as soon as they got large enough, and so on.

They had a cow, and the pea-vines were up to her back, and she gave abundance of milk, and grew fat on her keeping to boot.

When Mr. B. went to Richmond with his sugar, he borrowed a wagon and a yoke of oxen, and took grain and things, also, for some other neighbor settlers, and the trip took a week or more.

Mrs. B. thinks they came in 1819, which may possibly be the fact; but if so, they must have resided here more than three years before they entered land, since that took place in the fall of 1822. And that, too, may have been true, as Mr. B. seems to have been very poor, and it may have been three years before he could raise the money for an entry.

ELDER THOMAS ADDINGTON.

"Once, when I was a boy at school, the teacher would sleep in 'books.' There was a boy in school who was rather 'simple' and greatly given to 'pranks,' just because he 'did not know any better.'

One day, a mouse came running across the floor, and the 'simple' boy went to chasing it. The teacher was asleep, but the noise waked him. He looked up and saw the boy capering about the room. As he spied the lad, he caught his whip and chased the little fellow, whipping as he went. The poor chap gave no heed to the slashing of the teacher, but went dancing ahead after his mouse. At last he 'grabbed' with his fingers, clutched the 'varmint,' and turning short round, facing the master, cried, 'See, teacher, I "cotch" him!'

What the teacher did thereafter is not remembered. The laughing that the school accomplished just then was past all control, and the picture of that 'simple youth,' grinning in glee at his success in grabbing that quadruped, is a vivid thing in the minds of all who then beheld the performance of the feat."

WILLIAM COX, WEST RIVER.

"Settlers at that time were Joseph Hollingsworth, Albert Macy, Jesse Ballinger, Joshua Wright, William Stansberry, and others. Daniel Worth lived on the John Hunnicutt place; John Bunker was where John Charles now resides; Morgan Thornburg lived near White chapel. Some of these had been on their places for several years."

HURRICANE.

"Eli B. Barnard says he was twenty-seven months old when the tornado took place. Their roof blew off, and they shoved the cradle with him in it under the bed to keep him from drowning, and he says he remembers that. This was where widow Ballinger lives northwest of Charles W. Osborn's.

A horse was hemmed in with the fallen trees into a place only a few feet square, and yet the horse was not hurt! One man, scared nearly out of his wits, had yet sense enough left to pray, and he cried, 'O Lord, if thou wilt spare me this time, I will get away just as soon as I can go!' And he kept his word, the people say, and the next morning, picking his way to the nearest standing timber, he left for parts unknown.

Squirrels were one year so poor that they were not fit to eat. William Smith's mill was built before 1819." [Doubtful.]

WILLIAM PICKETT.

"I have been a miller much of my life. I helped Jeremiah Cox build his mill on White river, in 1825. It was a water mill and stood on the place I now own; Jeremiah Cox died soon after. Joseph and Benjamin Pickett bought the mill, Benjamin Pickett built a saw-mill, and in 1853, I bought the farm, 108 acres, and the two mills. The mills ran till the 'five dry years,' 1864—69; they were pulled down in 1870. The river has far less water now than formerly. I worked as a miller three years at White Water, afterward off and on at Winchester, dressing buhrs, etc. A steam mill was built there about 1835.

When we were tearing down my saw-mill, a big post fell on me. While taking a sill from the second story (the mill was built double), a post, a foot square and eleven feet long, knocked me down and fell on me. I was confined several weeks. They thought I could not live; but that was ten years ago and I am here yet."

WILD HOGS.

"Great numbers of wild hogs were in the woods, descendants of tame ones, brought by early settlers, that had become wild. The males would stay wild for years. They would get with droves, and in a short time the whole drove would become so wild that you could hardly get them back again. Wild hogs would attack people when hard pressed. John Chapman, Allen county, was attacked by a wild boar when out after the cows. He climbed a big log, and had to stay till the creature left. He had a fiste with him; the hog chased the dog and then took after Chapman himself. He had to stay on the log till some time in the night.

An immense male hog once attacked a cow, in Thomas Coates' lane. He stuck his tusk into her breast, and the blood spurted right out. He then struck another cow and knocked her down as if she had been shot. His tusk was broken, or he would probably have killed her. The children were in the lane. they saw the hog, and climbed the fence. The men chased him more than half a mile, and shot him again and again, and at last killed him.

This animal belonged to one of the neighbors, but the creature had gone wild. On the Mississinewa hogs were found wild in abundance when the settlers first came there, as people would let their swine run in the woods, and after a while hunt them up again, to get them home, or to kill them for meat. They would go out and find the 'range,' and when snow would come several men would go on horseback, and shoot the hogs as they could find them. Sometimes the creatures would be four or five miles from home. After they were shot the hogs would be hauled home, by the nose, or on a sled or on a wagon. Once in a while people would make a fire out in the woods, and scald and dress them before taking them home."

DEER, ETC.

"Deer sometimes have thirteen prongs. At first the straight 'spike' grows, the next year one prong on each horn, and so on. A straight horn is called a 'spike;' one prong is called a 'fork;' more than one, 'snags,' three-snagged, four-snagged, etc. Deer were fat in the summer and fall and poor in the spring. I have often killed old deer that had no horns. Horns of old deer would be perhaps two feet long, when full grown.

Amos Peacock and Henry Hill once took a load of smoked bacon to Richmond, and got only $1 a hundred.

I have bought salt that cost me $11.37 a barrel. I had flax seed to sell. I paid for hauling the seed, and the salt back from Dayton, and the whole cost me as above, $11.37 per barrel."

CHOLERA.

"As I was cradling wheat, a cloud gathered south of east, taking several hours. It covered nearly the whole sky. There was much lightning and thunder, and a little rain; I did not stop cradling. The body of the storm seemed to pass south. Shortly after I smelt a strong smell of burning sulphur, the smell lasting perhaps half an hour. It made be feel sick and faint, and I came near falling to the ground. Shortly after that the cholera broke out terribly at Lynn and other places." [See statements by Frazier, Johnson, Stone, etc.]

MARY HYATT—COATS—PICKETT.

"I was born in Grayson county, Virginia, in 1806. My father, Zachary Hyatt, came to Wayne county, Ind., 1814, and to Randolph county in 1817. Winchester, when I first saw it, October, 1819, had a court house and jail and three houses. Once father lay sick, and I was weaving. Suddenly I saw through the open door a deer crawling through a crack in the fence. There were two crooked rails, one up and the other down. The deer had one hind leg broken. I sprang out with my little thread-knife, and my sisters and myself, with the dog, chased the deer one-quarter of a mile to a pond about knee deep. The dog caught the deer by the throat, and we waded in and killed it with clubs. We dragged the deer from the water, cut the leaders of the legs, and tucked the others in so we could carry it with a pole, and in that way we bore it home in triumph. The men were away, except father, and he was sick. Once the men were shooting turkeys, and one lit down into the yard and tried to crawl through the fence. My sister and I caught it and killed it.

I used to spin and weave a great deal. I have woven many a yard of tow, and linen, and woolen. I wove coverlets, etc., for the whole region, Richmond, Mississinewa, Wabash, etc. Mr. Lewallyn from Ridgeville, once brought five coverlets. I told him, 'I can't weave them, I have more than I can do.' 'Don't say a word,' said he, 'I shall leave the work, and you must do it, though it should stay here five years.' So, he left the work, and in due time I wove them. We used to card and spin raw cotton, and wool too. My price for weaving coverlets was $1 apiece.

One day mother went away to be gone ten days. The flax was on the ground rotting. We girls took up the flax, dried, broke, swingled and hatcheled it, carded, spun and wove it; and by the time mother came home, the cloth was in garments and on the children's backs.

We used pewter platters, dishes, etc. [Mrs. Pickett showed a large ancient pewter platter, about a foot across, and heavy and thick, that her mother bought in 1818. It had never been molded over, and was about as good as new.]

My father sold his place in North Carolina, and got ready to move to Indiana. Everything was packed and loaded, ready to start in the morning. The boys got up before daylight, and fed the horses, and got the harness to 'gear up.' Mother said, 'you need not do it, father is sick.' In ten days, father died. Mother married again, and in a year or two, came to Indiana."

WILLIAM ARMFIELD THORNBURG—STONEY CREEK.

"When we first came, Richmond was our place of trade. We would go with the front wheels of a wagon, taking out the king-bolt, and fixing clapboards on the bolster and the 'slider,' putting on our coon skins and deerskins and ginseng, and wheat if we could spare any, and the corn to be ground. The trip could be made as handily as you please. With only the two wheels, one could turn and twist almost any way around and among the trees. The 'truck' would be traded for 'store tea,' and cotton yarn, and powder and sole-leather. If a barrel of salt was needed, father would go with the whole wagon.

The first mill I ever saw was Sample's mill, a corn cracker. The mills then were small affairs, but we boys thought them something wonderful.

Our folks made large quantities of tree sugar. Two springs, we made each season, two barrels of grain sugar, 100 pounds of cake-sugar, and forty or fifty pounds of molasses.

The third spring of our residence in Randolph, Samuel Anthony, father of E. C. Anthony, Esq., of Muncie, came to that place with a store of goods. Father needed some things. He said to my mother and myself, 'you go to Muncie with a sack of sugar apiece.' We filled the sacks; mother took hers before her, but I took a heavy sack. We got there in due time (twelve miles), and traded the sugar at 6¼ cents a pound for coffee at half a dollar, and other goods as high as they could well be. When father built his mill, coffee and whisky had both to be furnished, or the men would not work. I had to go to Judge Reece's distillery in Delaware county, for the whisky, which when a lad, I have often done. Father and I once went to Richmond with two yoke of oxen and the wagon, carrying flour and ginseng and sugar and deer-skins and coon skins, perhaps $35 worth in all. The trip took four days (thirty-five miles). A man named Brightwell was in company. As they were about to start for home, Brightwell said, 'take a drink,' handing a bottle of 'ginger pop,' and as he drew the cork the 'pop' flew clear to the loft. Father drank and gave me some. As we came to a big hill father said to me, 'you tend the hind cattle, and I will see to the forward yoke,' locking the wagon, as he spoke, but taking the forewheel instead of the hind wheel. We went down the hill, but it was a terrible 'go,' neither of us knowing what the matter was. Just as we reached the bottom, I saw what he had done, and said, 'what made thee lock the forewheel?' 'The dogs, I did, didn't I?' said he. I told my brother, and he remarked, 'father was pretty tight.' However, he was no drinker, but he got caught that time."

MRS. JOSEPH BROWN, JR.

" My uncle, William Simmons, came early to Randolph county, Ind., and, I think, as soon as 1821. He lived just at the line between Jackson and Ward townships, directly on the Mississinewa river, south of New Pittsburg. He died in middle life, but was the father of twenty-one children by the same wife. They were all raised 'by hand,' the mother being unable to 'suckle' them. Twelve became grown, and ten are still living.

James Simmons (my father) worked one harvest for Chief Richardville, near Ft. Wayne. One day an old man passed along the road having a tall hat on his head and a bundle on his back, and being otherwise odd looking The boys began to 'poke fun' at him. Suddenly he laid down his bundle, took off his hat, whirled round and faced them. Said he, 'Do you know the eleventh commandment?' 'No, what is it?' 'Mind your own business.'

That was a 'center shot,' their battery hushed, and without another word the old man went his way.

When he was a boy at home, during the 'squirrel year,' James shot squirrels for weeks, throwing them to the hogs outside the field, and leaving them to decay upon the ground. It was a hard task, but they saved their corn by the means.

Daniel B. Miller and his wife came on horseback to their forest home, and she stuck a black locust riding switch into the ground in the door yard. It grew and became a fine, large tree, and a few years ago was there still.

James Simmons was a great hunter. It may be safely said that he killed more deer than any other man in Jackson township. When he was building his log house, he set himself to cut and hew four logs a day, and besides that to kill one deer, and he did it. They lived at first for two or three months in a 'camp' made of rails.

He has killed six deer in one day. At one time he ran a deer till away after dark and got lost, and in the night he kept wandering round and firing his gun. His wife heard the firing, and, thinking that he might be lost, she took the ax and pounded as hard as she could upon a 'gum' there was in the yard. He heard the pounding, and the noise guided him home.

In winter time, after supper he would sit and tell deer stories as long as anybody would listen. He used never to think about going home from hunting as long as he could see the 'sights' upon his gun, and often he would have a 'time' to find his way to his cabin."

BEAR STORY.

"When I was a little girl, my brother (a little bit of a fellow), and myself were playing by a creek near the house, and a bear came and sat watching us from the opposite bank, a high bluff ten or fifteen feet high. I thought it was a dog, and was not scared. Presently mother saw the old fellow, and 'hissed' the dog, which came and 'tackled' the bear. She called to us, and we heeled it for the house. While the dog and the bear were 'tussling,' Jacob Harshman came along with his gun, hunting, and he shot and killed the bear.

They used to have some fun in those days, too. Cameron Coffin, a gentleman land-owner, came out to see his land; he was not used to the woods, and the 'bushwhackers' made game of him. One day he was at James Simmons' sugar camp, and the boys were making wax. Coffin was 'green' upon the subject of wax making, and they made some very hard and sticky, and got him to take a great chunk into his mouth to eat; he chewed the wax till his teeth and jaws were all stuck fast together. He worked and worked and clawed and dug at the wax till he was nearly choked. Finally the stuff softened and melted somewhat in his mouth, and he made out to get clear of it; but he had a terrible time, and the boys nearly died laughing at the fun. At another time, they were walking a foot log over the river, and he undertook it; he did not know how to keep his balance, and the boys pretended to come near falling off, and shook the log so that he did fall off into the water waist deep. He was not used to such life; the backwoods boys were too much for him, and he 'got out of that,' and went back to the settlement where he came from, and left the jolly blades to play tricks upon themselves."

F. G. WIGGS, GREENSFORK.

"Father left North Carolina when I was seven years old; we were six weeks and three days on the road, reaching William Arnold's (now Noah Turner's), May 5, 1826. I rode a horse (that pulled one of our carts) all the way. Father put me on the horse the evening we started, and I rode clear through. We had two carts, and father led the other beast. Mother also walked a great deal; we camped under a tent through the whole journey; several families were in company: Joseph Copeland, wife and four children; Isaac Cook, wife and four children; father and mother and four children, eighteen in all.

Father lent Isaac Cook $25.00 to come with (which he paid afterward). Father bought eighty acres of Benjamin Puckett, agreeing to give $250.00 and a cart valued at $25.00. He afterward entered eighty acres, and mother lived on it till she died in the fall of 1881; we settled in the wilderness. William Arnold and Frederick Fulghum came just before father did. Fred Fulghum had come back to Carolina and told us what a grand place Indiana was, and father was not satisfied till he moved out there himself. Deer used to come into father's clearing, and they were so tame that they would not run away; father had no gun, and never shot any of them."

JAMES W. CLARK.

"The first school I went to was held in a little horse stable made of slabs set endwise. David Semans taught the school. The seats were slabs with legs in, no backs, of course. The first church in the town was in 1837, on the old church lot, now (a part of) the graveyard. Three camp-meetings were held near Spartanburg (in 1838-40 probably). The rowdies disliked Preacher Bruce. He was pretty 'sharp' on them. They had planned to flog him. They were swaggering round with peeled canes. He disguised his dress, got a 'peeled cane,' went down to the spring among the rowdies, and heard all their plans. He then went back, opened meeting, and told the astonished tricksters from the pulpit all their plot. The rowdies did not whip him. There were great revival meetings. At one time one hundred members joined.

The first disciple meeting was held near old Mr. Stewart's a mile or so west of town. Several persons joined. The Baptists held meeting at Mr. Cartwright's. He was a Baptist.

When I was a boy, people hired me to hunt their cattle. I could go anywhere, and not get lost, day or night. When twelve years old, I used to grind bark for the tanner at eleven pence (12½ cents) a day. Wild hogs were plenty in the 'timber.' I have been treed by them many a time. As I would be after the cows, the hogs would be in the woods, and they would see and chase my dog, and he would run to me, and they after him. Then the hogs would see me and chase me. I would begin to climb right sudden, you may guess, a high log or a tree, and there I had to stay till they would leave, which sometimes would not be anyways soon. The hogs would boo-boo around, and then seem to go away, and suddenly be back, and try to get at me again. These wild hogs had sprung from swine that had been tame, and had bred in the woods, and so their offspring had grown to be wild. My grandfather would let his swine run in the woods, and by-and-by he would find where they slept, and build a pen partly round their nest, and watch and shut them in. Then he would catch the pigs and mark them, and let the whole 'pack' go again. At killing time, men would go out and track and shoot them wherever they might chance to be found. When I was twelve years old, grandfather was chasing up and killing his hogs. The men would shoot them, and I hauled them to the road with a horse. I forgot how many I hauled that day. Grandfather marketed that pork at Richmond for $1.50 net.

A big poplar tree stood in front of Mrs. Hammond's house, and another large tree stood on my lot. When I was a boy, I had a young bullock, perhaps a two-year-old, that I worked. It was a tough job to catch him, the only way being to run him down; and we would have a tedious race. One day I chased him a long time, and finally he plunged into a pond, and I after him waist deep. He stopped; I gathered him by the horns, Frank Morgan waded in with a rope, and we roped him and brought his lordship out of the pond in triumph."

[Mr. Clark reckons himself to have been longest a resident of Spartanburg, since 1826, or fifty-six years ago. Frank Morgan and he were boys then together, but Frank spent many years of his youthful life elsewhere, and, moreover, he died in 1880 at Spartanburg. Still, Mr. C. is by no means an old man, but is active and vigorous as in former days.]

WILLIAM CLEVENGER.

"The settlers when father came, 1828 (near father's), were Bezaleel Hunt, Nettle Creek; Joel Drake, Nettle Creek; Mark Diggs, Nettle Creek; Joab Thornburg, Stoney Creek; Jonathan Finger, Stoney Creek; Job Thornburg, Stoney Creek; Abraham Clevenger, Stoney Creek; David Vestal, Stoney Creek. George W Smithson, Stoney Creek; Joseph Rooks, Stoney Creek (large family boys); Jonathan Clevenger, Stoney Creek; John Diggs, Stoney Creek; and in the colored settlement, Richard Robbins (blacksmith), John Smith, Benjamin Outlan, Richard Scott, Jerry Terry, Isaac Woods.

I have been to fifteen log-rollings in one spring. The first show I ever went to was an animal show at Muncie. I walked fifteen miles and got there by 9 A. M. My father was a member of the Christian church, and a Democrat. He voted for Jackson the first time that Jackson was elected, just after he came to Randolph county.

He had just money enough to enter 120 acres. He had one old horse, and it died in the spring. He had no way to buy any, and he did without, borrowing sometimes, which was hard to do. He cleared ground, and tended it mostly with the hoe. By next season he got an ox-team. We plowed our corn with an ox, putting harness on it like a horse, and one boy would lead the ox and one hold the plow.

Father and his boys have cleared more land than any other family in Randolph county—more than six hundred acres. Father had no wagon for years. He hauled everything on a sled. He never owned a good wagon. He bought an old one for $30.00, and got 'bit' at that. That was about 1836. He used that seven or eight years, and never owned any other. He made one crop with no team, and two crops with oxen. Then he traded the oxen for one horse. The oxen were young, and we could not 'break' them well. We did mostly with one horse. Sometimes in the winter we would have a boy behind the sled with a rope hitched to hold back with. We had no wheat bread till we raised some wheat to make it from, for a year or two, at least.

I remember when there were only three wagons in two miles square among twenty-five or thirty settlers. Once we put horses to a wagon with twenty bushels of corn and wheat, and started to mill (Economy). The horses knew nothing of pulling together, and the wagon got stuck fast before half a mile. Six men took a horse and sack apiece and went ten miles to a mill, and left four or five to get the wagon out. The mill was owned by Nathan Proctor. Nathan Proctor, Elijah Arnold and others were charged with counterfeiting, thieving, etc. They were said to have a 'rendezvous' in the 'fallen timber.' Some were convicted, and the gang was broken up at last. One of them, arrested for passing a counterfeit bill, asking to see the bill, took it and swallowed it.

My father got his meat thus: He had a dog that would catch any hog. He helped his neighbors catch their wild hogs, and they would pay him in pork. The hogs were so wild they would not eat corn.

How to build a cabin with weight poles: Build the square, let the top end logs project a foot or so, put the butting pole farther out than the body of the house, have it split and notched and pinned with the edge upright, so as to catch the ends of the boards; lay logs to build up the gables, with their ends scafed off to allow the roof boards to cover them, and the supporting poles so arranged as to give the proper slant. Put on the first course of boards, and lay a pole on the course far enough from the butting pole to receive the second course, keeping the 'weight pole' up by 'knees' between it and the butting pole. Put on the second course and another weight pole, and 'knees,' and so on to the top.

Mother never got a meal of victuals on a cook-stove in her life."

JOHN KEY.

"Father came from Tennessee in 1829. He was a Methodist, and took great delight in the religious services of the olden time. When camp-meeting opened, he would move down to camp to stay while the meeting lasted, on a rude wagon with truck wheels made by sawing them from the end of a huge oak log. He had no wagon, and for home purposes used a sled. When father landed in 'Randolph,' he had just 37½ cents, one old horse, and five children. Pork was high afterward, and he sold four hogs for $50.00, and entered his first forty acres of land.

Swine would run wild, and often, while we were hunting them and the dogs were trying to catch them, the wild creatures would cut the poor dogs' throats with their sharp, strong tusks.

Once while some men were hunting wild swine, the savage beasts undertook to run into Dolph Warren's cabin, and scared the family inside well nigh to death. Squirrels would be so thick and would make such havoc in the corn that the children had to be set to scare the greedy 'varmints' away.

The pea-vines would grow as tall as a man's head, and as thick as they could grow, so that one could track a horse or a cow through the tangled masses of pea-vines almost as readily as through a snow-bank.

Wild plums would grow in the thick woods, loaded down with as nice fruit as one would need to see, gooseberries, raspberries and blackberries would grow in the 'clearings' and open places.

The state road through Deerfield to Ridgeville, etc., was cut out about 1830. Mr. Andrew Key helped cut it out from the state line west, and assisted in opening it, too.

Mr. Key entered forty acres at first (with that hog money), and afterward forty acres more; still later, he bought out Collins (his brother-in-law)."

"Andrew McCartney, born in 1804, in Virginia, came first to Jay county, in 1837. He has been married several times; once and the last time, to John Key's sister. He had had a large family, was a rough, harsh, cruel man, with whom no one could live in peace. He would boast of his scrapes and exploits, and, in fact, would readily find and plunge into enough of them to answer any five ordinary men.

Riley Marshall lived where Judge Miller did afterward. Mr. Miller bought Mr. Marshall out."

STATEMENT BY JOHN MOCK, WARD TOWNSHIP.

In 1824, Daniel B. Miller lived in Jackson township. In a few years, the Harshmans came, and soon afterward, John Sheets settled on the Mississinewa, and built a saw-mill. Benjamin Devor, Ezekiel Cooper, Thomas Devor, Christian Nickey, Dr. Diehl, the Mikesells, Baileys, Moses Byram and the Debolts, also moved in before very long.

March 24, 1824, Ward (including Franklin) township had seventeen families—Meshach Lewallyn, Benjamin Lewallyn, George and Henry Renbarger, Daniel Badger, Burkett Pierce, George Ritenour, William Odle, Elias Kizer, Allen Wall, David Connor, Reason Malott, William Massey, Riley Marshall, Daniel Mock, Jeremiah Lindsey, Joab Ward. Lewallyn had a mill that would crack five bushels of corn in twenty-four hours, if everything was in order. In 1829 he put in a hand-bolt and ground wheat, each customer bolting his own grist. A saw-mill was built about that time, near Deerfield. At the presidential election in 1824 five votes were cast in the township of Ward. At that precinct D. B. Miller was inspector and Riley Marshall, clerk. Persons could vote anywhere in the county, and most of the voters went elsewhere to cast their ballots.

In 1829, Ward received a large reinforcement from Tennessee, Key, Fields, etc., etc.

In 1836, George Ritenour built a grist-mill one mile west of Deerfield, with two run of buhrs, which did pretty good work. Samuel Helm built a saw-mill two and a half miles east of Deerfield. Collins & Fields also put up a saw-mill half a mile east of Deerfield. The village of Deerfield was laid out in 1831, but did not improve till 1837, when Edward Edger came and brought a store, and from that time it grew and a great amount of business was done there.

A long time after the first settlement, William P. Charlton built a steam saw-mill at Ridgeville, and William Addington rebuilt the grist-mill, which were of advantage to the county round, but no town was established till years afterward.

There were but few settlers in Green township before 1835. John Life and Samuel Caylor, Bennet King, the Orrs, Cyrus Reed, Philip Barger, Elijah Harbour, Thomas Hubbard, Nathan Godwin, the Garringers and others came about that date or soon after. Fitzpatrick, Evans, Haynes, etc., lived at Fairview.

Antony McKinney built a mill in 1839. Cyrus Reed built a saw-mill near the grist-mill, causing trouble and a tedious lawsuit.

In 1824, Winchester was a field of stumps, with one store on the northeast corner of the square, owned by George Burkett. The old log court house was on the north side of the street, which lay north of the square. Charles Conway lived in a log cabin between the store and Salt creek, and there was a log cabin still nearer the creek. On the northwest corner of the square was a double log cabin, occupied as a hotel by John Odle. There was a small log cabin in the southwest part of the town, and the new log jail stood on the jail lot. Those were the buildings in Winchester in March, 1824. In 1825, Thomas and Joseph Hanna put a stock of goods into a new building on the north side of the square, and before many years Michael and Andrew Aker bought them out, and sold goods a considerable time. Meanwhile the Mansion House was built, and Jesse and William M. Way put a store in it. The brick across the street was built, and Jere Smith built the Franklin House. A. B. Shaw erected a brick on the northwest square. Moorman Way built the brick west of the Mansion House. Rush and Kizer put up a brick building on the east of the square.

In 1836, Elias Kizer and David Haworth put up a steam grist-mill east of Salt creek, the first steam engine in Randolph county. This mill was of great importance, as there was none north of it nearer than Fort Wayne. The new (second) court house was built in 1826, or thereabouts.

Some of the early settlers in the region now called Monroe township were Andrew Devoss, John Henenridge, Jesse Addington, Mr. Sloan and others. It settled very slowly. The region had no conveniences, no thoroughfare, no mill, no village nor town of any sort, until 1852. The southeastern and southern portion of the county had been long settled; the Bowens, the Fraziers, the Johnsons, the Hocketts, the Hinshaws, the Beards, the Hunts, the Botkins, the Smiths, the Arnolds of famous memory and many others had filled up that region. But in 1824, Nettle Creek and Stoney Creek were still in the deep, unbroken forest. Nathan Mendenhall built a mill on Cabin creek, which was a great convenience. John Thornburg put up mills near Windsor for both grist and sawing.

Among the facts of old times, it may be mentioned that there was not a shoe shop in Randolph county before about 1830. People made their own or got some neighbors to do it for them, and there was not a boot made nor worn in the county before that date.

A man by the name of Hartley made the first pair of boots in Winchester, for Michael Aker, and Aker, after exhibiting them a while to a curious crowd, wore the boots himself.

During the winter of 1824-25, an imitation of a school was had at Deerfield, on a grade from arithmetic down, and the teacher could not spell the word "highest" any better than to say h-i-e-s-t, nor tell how much salt $1.12½ will buy, at $1.37½ for fifty pounds [a rather snug little mental problem, by the way]. I never saw a blackboard in a schoolhouse in Randolph county, except at the seminary.

The people in the early days were full of hospitality. The settlers were from all quarters—Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee and Carolina—and all classes vied with each other in generous hospitality to strangers sojourning in the region.

None were ever allowed to suffer, and men would kill deer and give the flesh away. And so with turkeys and pheasants and fish. The way to catch fish was peculiar, and worth a description.

If the ice was thick enough to stand on, we could cut holes, and drive the fish to the holes and spear them. Sometimes, in a sunny day, we would tie three hooks back to back, and haul the fish out that way. In the spring they would bite freely; later in the season we would take torches of hickory bark, and spear the poor fellows as they lay in the ripples of the streams. Sometimes we made a "brush-drag" by taking a grape-vine of sufficient length, laying strips of thin hickory bark across the vine under it, and then piling brush on till there was as much as we wished, tying the brush to the grape-vines with these strips of hickory bark; and, when the drag was completed, it would be hauled through the water, and the fish would move along in front of the "drag," and so they would be caught.

There were several ways to kill deer. One way was simply to shoot them from the ground; another was to climb a tree, and shoot them as they were drinking from a spring. Another, and a very cruel way, was to bleat like a fawn, and decoy the does to their death. Hunting turkeys was very sly work, as they are wonderfully sharp-witted. However, in the "gobbling time," you could call the "gobblers" to you by making a kind of pipe of the center bone of the wing. Fox hunting and coon hunting were great sport, though chasing the foxes and chopping the trees for the coons made a pretty hard task; yet the fun of it made the work seem light.

The tools for farm work at first were exceedingly simple. An ax, an iron wedge, a mattock and a maul, and a big "nigger hoe," an old-fashioned single shovel plow, and a barshare plow with an iron share, a coulter in front and a wooden mold-board, and a harrow made of wood, teeth and all. These were all they had till about 1829. About that time, John Way began to make the front part of the mold-board of iron, some of which would scour, and these were used till about 1834, when Horney, of Richmond, made a cast-iron mold-board and share. And in 1845, Beard & Sinex brought forward the steel mold-board. About 1830, John Mansur, of Richmond, sold cast-steel axes, and about 1835, the Collins' patent came. About 1840, Gaar & Co., produced the four-horse power chaff-piler threshing machine, and later the eight-horse power separator came to hand—the Pitts, from Buffalo, for instance.

In 1836, there was only one open buggy in Ward township, and one top buggy, Edward Edger having the former and widow Kinnear the latter. Reapers and mowers, hay rakes, corn planters, nor even simple corn-markers, had any of them come into use in 1855, when Mr. Mock left Randolph county for the West. The first cook stoves in Randolph were brought by Edward Edger to Deerfield in 1838, one for himself and one for Mrs. Kinnear. They weighed 600 pounds each and cost $50.00, besides the hauling from Cincinnati, which was a large sum. Roads there were none in those early times only perhaps that they were cut out somewhat; and the travel went anywhere among the trees and stumps, with mud in the wet season two feet deep, even as late as 1855, when he left for Illinois. Mr. M. started from Deerfield June 10, 1855, in a wagon with as good a span of horses as could be found in the county, with himself and wife and three small children and two trunks, perhaps 600 pounds in all, and it was all they could do to get through to Winchester. At least a mile of the corduroy was afloat or under water. There were too "little showers" that day, in which the rain fell five inches deep.

Mr. Mock relates that he once shot a horse belonging to one of the settlers by the name of Cox in the White River settlement, east of Winchester, in mistake for a deer. Mock was young, and he was greatly alarmed. He went to Mr. Cox and told him. "So thee has killed my horse." "Yes." "And thee thought it was a deer." "I did." "And thee wishes to pay me for the horse." "It would be no more than right that I should, I suppose." "Well, John, I guess I'll not charge thee anything for the horse." And then Mock felt mightily relieved.

One of the old settlers (who might be named, but will not be, as he is yet alive) came to mill one morning and bought a drink of whisky. In undertaking to swallow it, he threw it up twice, but, catching it in the glass, he kept turning it down, exclaiming the third time he swallowed it (with an oath), "Stay down; whisky costs too much money to be wasted that way." And it stayed at last.

Jacob Voris was a butcher and a grocer and a baker. He made great quantities of gingerbread, that wonderful "nick-nack" of olden time. The chaps had a song about it, one stanza of which ran thus:

"Of all the birds that fly in air,
The white, the blue, the red;
Of all the cakes that Voris bakes,
Give me the 'gungerbread.'"

At one time they had a spelling match at the school west of Deerfield under William Shoemaker as teacher. They spelled from the dictionary, which was the first time Mock had ever seen a book of the kind. It scared him out. He thought it was of no use to try to spell from that.

The best teacher in that region in those days was James Edwards, from Cincinnati or thereabouts. He taught a term or two and left again.

CHARLES CRIST.

"When we moved to Hancock county, Ohio, there was but one house within three miles of where we built our cabin. It was January, and the snow was eight inches deep in the woods. My family stayed at that house, and we (brother and myself) tramped back and forth night and morning, to build my cabin, and we could get only two other men (four in all) to help raise it. It was small, fourteen by sixteen, and just high enough to stand up in. When we moved in, it was chinked, but not daubed; had neither chimney, nor floor, and no door (only a hole for one). We built a big log-heap fire to cook and warm by for two or three days, till we got a fire-place and chimney made, and we hung up a quilt for a door. There were only three or four houses then at Fort Findlay. There was one store; the two men that kept it were so poor that they had only one coat between them, and they brought their goods on packhorses. We were as happy then as ever in our lives. The Indians lived on their "Reserve," between Findlay and Upper Sandusky (about twelve miles away). They used often to pass as they were hunting—Wyandots and others. They are gone now, except some who live like white people. I have stayed many a night with the Indians. They lived well; the half-breeds, especially were intelligent and industrious.

For some years, we had to go to mill to Perrysburg (Fort Meigs), on the Maumee river, across the 'Black Swamp.' That 'Black Swamp' was a terrible place. We would take three yoke of oxen, and twenty-five bushels of grain, and cross the swamp, eighteen miles, and then go fifteen miles farther to the mill. The trip would take us twelve days, sometimes going only two or three miles a day. We crossed at what was 'Hull's Trace,' and the places were still there where Hull's soldiers cut brush, and little trees, and fixed and wove them together, to make places to keep them out of the mud and water as they slept at night. The mud was black and deep—how deep I do not know. Large rocks were scattered in many places through the swamp.

At another swamp in that country, there was a 'crossing' made of rails, for a road, and the swamp would shake for several rods on each side, as a wagon passed along the track, and if a horse or ox got off the rails, he would sink into the mire so that he could not get out, only as he was hauled out. The 'Black Swamp' has since been drained, and the farms there are among the very best. This swamp extended a great distance, perhaps one hundred and fifty miles. As we traveled across it, we slept in the wagon, and would tie one ox to the wagon, and turn the rest out to feed. The surface away from the track was firm enough for cattle to walk on, and feed upon the weeds and bushes. I was at Lower Sandusky when the cholera prevailed. The emigrants going West died there in great numbers. I saw them lying dead around, I cannot tell how many. I got a load of salt to take to Findlay, and as I went to get some buckwheat straw to stuff round my barrels, I found several corpses lying covered in the straw.

We lived in Marion county, Ohio, when the 'stars fell,' November, 1833. Some people that worked the next day in a deep well saw the 'stars falling' all the next day also. In a deep well in Baltimore county, Maryland, eighty-four feet deep, which I cleaned out, I saw distinctly the stars from the bottom of the well. In Hancock county, Ohio, Mrs. Crist saw a 'ball of fire' fall to the ground, and explode in all directions. I, myself, saw, one night, one fall not fifty yards off. It struck the ground and burst, and the fire flew every way. The light was bright enough to see to pick up a pin. It seemed as large as a man's hat, and burst as it struck. I have bought cornmeal at $1.00 a bushel that was so musty it was green, and that smelt so strong you could smell it several feet from the wagon, and we were glad to get even that! I used to split rails at 20 cents a hundred, and to work at 40 cents a day.

The first spring, I cleared up five acres for corn. A good crop grew, but the birds and 'varmints' mostly ate it up. I used to kill squirrels, and coons and turkeys, so many that I did not take the trouble to pick them up. The turkeys would come twenty or thirty in a flock."

THOMAS MIDDLETON.

"I came to Indiana with $3.00 and a rifle-gun. I have been greatly afflicted; had much sickness. Have seven times been sick expecting to die; yet I am eighty-one years old, and in moderate, though feeble, health. I have paid thousands of dollars for doctors' bills. I was sick, when a boy, and I am sick in the same way yet. My back was hurt when I was a small child, and it hurts me still. I have had the piles and the gravel from early youth. I was ruptured in 1826, which remains till now. Dr. Ruby made thirty visits from Bethel at one time. I took my wife and walked and led the mare to Richmond. My wife stayed six weeks and got no relief. She came home and lived till October. My second wife was visited once a day for seventy days. I once sent for Doctor Warner, who prescribed for my case. Said he: 'When this medicine is gone come and see me.' I went, and he charged me $1.50, and said: 'You can't be cured.' Some doctors will say: 'We can cure you, but all they wish is a big bill; they can run that up on you fast enough.' I was at one time greatly troubled with the gravel, and Doctor Morgan tried to ease me. He injected morphine into my side, which seemed to give relief. I had been almost raving and wild with pain from Wednesday morning till sometime Sunday.

Thus many and severe have been my afflictions from my youth even till this day, but I have trusted in the Lord, and trust Him still."

ELISHA T. BAILEY.

"Doctor Silvers used to live near Ridgeville. He and his cousin, when small boys, were captured by the Indians, and lived and traveled with them for many years (1811 and onward) from Vincennes to Muncie, Greenville, Ft. Wayne, etc.

When the Indians captured the boys, the clothes were thrown on the bank of a creek to make believe the children had been drowned.

The Indians often passed through portions of Randolph county.

Doctor Silvers used to say there was a spot on Nolan's Fork, under a knotty walnut tree (he thinks on the farm of John Thomas, one of the first settlers), where the Indians had buried money. The doctor has gone, in later years, and dug to find it; whether he succeeded or not, probably no mortal knows.

At another place, near Richard Corbitt's, he said metal had been found.

On Greensfork, he said, an old Indian buried a lot of money, and the doctor spent months in hunting for it, but whether he found that or not no one ever knew but himself.

The Indians used to have copper kettles (gotten in trade with the English or the French), and settlers have found some of them. Mr. Frazier, on Greensfork, found one in early times."

WILLIAM M. LOCKE.

"The first preaching appointment at Spartanburg was started by Ohio preachers at Brother William McKim's. The Methodists built their first church there, in 1837, and their present one in about 1869.

The first preaching was about 1833. We joined in 1834, in Mr. McKim's barn. Camp-meetings were held a little west of town three different seasons. The preachers in charge were Revs. Hall, Bruce and Smith. Large numbers joined the church.

A Mr. Manning died near the camp ground. He had been sick, and was feeling better, and he wished so much to attend meeting, that he went before he was able, and by the excitement and the night air he took a relapse, and was dead before they got him home.

There had been a little mill where Jessup's mill was afterward built, but it was gone. The 'Quaker Trace' had been cut out, but as you went farther north, the track went 'all over the woods,' over saplings, round logs and ponds, etc.

John Alexander used to tell how, in high water, the cattle would get on the bridges, and the puncheons would be floating, and the oxen would get their legs between the puncheons, and the teamsters would unyoke the cattle and let them swim out. How the wagons were got across cannot be stated. Old Thornton Alexander and his boys (colored) used to wagon regularly to Ft. Wayne."

ARTHUR MCKEW, 1831, RIDGEVILLE.

"When I was a lad, thirteen years old, I went with father to Fort Wayne, with two yoke of oxen and a wagon; and he worked there two weeks. When about to start for home, father found a man who was going to Logansport, and father waited, went, with him, taking the oxen and wagon, and sending me home by the 'Quaker Trace,' alone. It took me five days to make the journey. It was a lonely trip and I camped out several nights. Father, in coming home, lay out the last night. There was a heavy snowfall and he spread the blanket over him and raked the snow on and around him to keep him warm.

At one time, Thomas Shaler, whose home was near Camden, Jay county, Indiana, came to mill, and after bacon, etc., with a wagon and two yoke of oxen. As he started home, in passing a drain bridged with poles, an ox got a leg between the poles and broke it. Mr. Shaler came back for help and hired me (a boy fourteen years old), to take a yoke of oxen and help him through. As we were crossing the 'maple slash,' in Jay county, the ox-tongue broke. It was in winter and the snow was six inches deep. Shaler went to Mr. Welch's, four miles off, to get help and tools. He returned after dark with an ax and an auger and two men. Joseph Hawkins (another boy, fourteen years old) and myself took the 'back tracks' of the men, getting to Mr. Welch's after midnight, nearly chilled through. She got up (the woman was in bed), and gave us some 'corn dodger,' and it was good, sure. The men came with the wagon and team, near daylight, with feet badly frostbitten. After breakfast, Shaler and I went on, getting to Philip Brown's for dinner (corn bread and venison)—near Liber—and staying at Judge Winter's that night. In the morning, we cut the ice and crossed the Salimony, and went on through the thick wood, there being no road; and away in the night we got within a half mile of Shaler's cabin; but there was a creek and ice, and the oxen would not cross; so we tied them to the wagon, and, shouldering some meal and bacon, footed it to the cabin. But that cabin was a sight. No daubing, no chinking, no floor, no fireplace, no chimney; fire in the middle of the cabin, and the house filled with smoke. The woman got up, cooked us some meat and gave us some dodger, and we lay down. That woman and her four little girls had been there alone for more than a week, and were out of food. [See J. Hawkins' statement.] The next morning I started for home with the cattle. I had passed Judge Winters' about 1 P. M., when I met father, with Mr. Lewallyn and Mr. McCartney, hunting me. We got home about midnight, I having been absent five days.

At another time, a horse had strayed. He was 'spanciled,' and I 'trailed' him. I had on a rimless straw hat and no coat nor vest, but simply tow shirt and pants, and was barefooted. I followed the trail to near Huntsville, stayed all night with a 'Dunkard,' and the next morning went with him to a 'woods meeting.' The preacher made inquiry and a man came and told me he had seen such a horse, and where. The horse had been raised at Connersville, and seemed to be heading thither. I went to Connersville, Cambridge City, Milton, Jacksonburg, Waterloo, etc., but no horse could I find, and so I set out for home. I met father near Maxville, hunting for me. I told him what the man had said, and he went and found the horse in that neighborhood. I had somehow missed him. My travels had been one hundred miles or more, and lasted seven days. At Waterloo they thought me a runaway apprentice, and were about to arrest me as such; but a man there happened to know my father and myself and they let me go. And truly I was a sight to behold, and my story, though true, was entirely unlikely, and people would not believe me.

Flatboating was a great business in those times. We used to steer the boats down the river over the dams, etc., to the Wabash, or elsewhere, and then go home on foot. Once, five of us were hired to take five boats down all lashed together. We got through all safe, got our pay twenty miles below Marion and 'put' for Randolph. We struck south for the road (what there was), and so to Marion. Billy Gray said, 'Boys, this makes my thirteenth trip. I always had plenty of company at the start but none when I got home.'

We set forth that day for 'keeps.' The next day Billy Gray was not well, but he warmed up and left us. We had to wade waist-deep that day to cross a stream. The next day he went ahead again, but we passed him before he reached Fairview. Gray stayed at Elijah Thomas', south of Fairview. Addington stayed at Caylor's Tavern, Roe came home, three miles from Ridgeville and I got home to Ridgeville at midnight, having traveled that day more than fifty miles, often wading and in places waist deep."

JAMES PORTER.

"George Porter, my brother, came out in the spring of 1829 and raised crops, and then came back and moved his family to Randolph three or four weeks before I arrived there.

There was a mill at Ridgeville when I came. Henry Hinchy built a water-mill on the Mississinewa after a while for corn and wheat, bolted by machinery in (about) 1844.

The first school was taught by George Porter's wife about one-half mile west of our house (in Ward township), about 1836.

We used to go to meeting (Methodist Episcopal), at Riley Marshall's house, near (what is now) Prospect meeting-house. Mrs. Porter used to go afoot and 'tote' the baby—three miles. Mrs. Porter used to be greatly afraid of the Indians, though they never injured her. Travelers would often pass from Winchester to the 'Quaker Trace.' We were glad to see them and have them stay over night.

The Brockuses would drink and fight. Their wives were fine women but the men used them badly. They would not work but would go off hunting or running about. The women would be at home with nothing to eat.

I went three times to Cincinnati to enter land—forty acres each time—afoot, except, partly the second time. Then I rode a colt to Hamilton and sold it there for $35.00 cash to enter land with. I had been offered $100.00 credit for the horse at home, but I was in a hurry to enter my land for fear somebody else would get it before me. I went afoot to Cincinnati and home again.

Thomas Shaler lived in a cabin on this place (and his brother; but they moved off). He had been here three or four years. Samuel Emery came in 1826. He lived in Ward township, two miles down the Mississinewa. Allen Wall lived close by Emery's. There were no more between here and Deerfield on the Mississinewa. Daniel B. Miller and Riley Marshall lived near Prospect meeting-house, east of Deerfield. Philip Storms lived near 'Sockum,' at the crossing. He had been there some time. Andrew Debolt lived at Mount Holly. William Simmons had been here, had gone away to Blue river, and he came again in 1830. Messrs. Keys, Hodge, Manus and Fields lived south of here.

Thomas Devor and Mr. Beach, Jacob Johnson, Joseph Sutton, James Wickersham, Amos Smith, Thomas Wiley and John Hoke came after a while. John Skinner and James Skinner came also."

WILLIS C. WILLMORE.

"Before I was five years old I remember being at my grandfather Harrison's; I was with some black boys tramping clothes in a big trough. My uncles made me popguns and gave me slices of toast from the plate before the fire. When five years old, father took me to his new home and my new mother.

As I got to the gate I ran into the house and the first thing I knew I was in my stepmother's lap. Father settled among the Blue Ridge mountains. A part of the farm was creek bottoms, the rest was on the mountains. Some of the surface was very steep so that it could be cultivated. The sloping land had to be plowed one way and some could not be plowed at all; and that which was too steep to be plowed was cultivated entirely with the hoe. The stones and the hoe would often meet, and several hoeing together would make lively music. The mountains were full of bears, wolves, panthers, wild cats and snakes. Rattlesnakes and copperheads were the most dreaded. Our nearest neighbor was a mile distant. We could see no house but our own Many days would pass with a sight of none but our own family. The pasture was fine in the mountains and ravines and ready in March. The cows would come to their calves for three or four months and then they had to be hunted. I was the cowboy and often night would find me in the mountains calling the cows. The hair would well-nigh stand on end for fright while driving them over rocks and hills and through laurel thickets, not knowing when I might meet a wild beast or tread on a snake. One night, two of my brothers out coon-hunting, came home at daylight and said the dogs were baying a bear in the mountain close by. We went with the gun to find the den. I walked to its mouth, the bear met me and passed without a word of 'How-d'ye,' or 'Good bye.' I crawled in and captured three cubs and took them home.

Another night John and I were hunting in a strange place. John fell from a cliff; I hugged a tree. At dawn we were at the edge of a precipice over a stream.

One time going home from picking whortleberries we came upon three huge rattlesnakes lying in the sun. We cut three long forked sticks and put them over their heads and I held down their heads with a short fork and cut them off with my pocket-knife. We did this to prevent their biting themselves because we wanted the oil. We dragged our snakes two and a half miles to get them home. When I was skinning one of them the headless neck drew back and stood in the attitude to strike and gave a forward blow as if to bite. My brother laughed at me years afterward for being bitten by a rattlesnake without a head.

In the valley where I was born, in the Blue Ridge, the sun would shine far up the western heights long ere we could see its disk above the eastern hills and long before night, moreover, it had sunk behind the mountain tops. In that rugged country, work began at daylight and at 9 A. M. the horn blew for breakfast and at 2 or 3 o'clock for dinner which was the last meal. The work kept on from dawn till dark and in winter cotton had to be picked till 9 or 10 o'clock at night.

The hills were very steep, so much so that often we were obliged to 'tote' things a long way to where they could be 'hauled.' One day I was driving a cart and though several were holding it, over it went—load and all. Luckily the 'overturn' did little damage so we loaded up again and went on.

People here can have little idea of the hardships of such a life in so rough and rugged a land.

Yet there were some advantages even there. The clear, cool, bright springs gushing from the hillsides and the pure, fresh, bracing mountain air were a delight to behold and to breathe.

I had even in my boyhood resolved that this hard and broken land was 'not the land for me.' I had heard of that fair, level, rich country in the Northwest beyond the beautiful Ohio and I determined to find it and view its glories for myself. And in due time the opportunity came. Father had met with losses and went to Ohio to find a new home. Meanwhile I remained behind to settle his business and a hard and tiresome task it was indeed. In performing the work I walked more than a thousand miles and rode hundreds of miles besides.

Once we 'ran off' a tract of land overflowed by a violent rain, riding on horseback and using poles instead of pegs. The survey had to be made and the surveyor would not do it and so we did.

When all was done that I could do there for father, I moved stepmother with eight children to the 'Great West,' finding father in Gallia county, Ohio, in which region he made his new home. So here I was in the wonderful Northwest and I had come to stay. I had bidden the rough and rugged mountains a long, long farewell. I had found the forest plains of which I had dreamed so often and so fondly. In Ohio I married, and, after four years. made my way to Wayne county, Indiana, and after a brief sojourn there we pitched out tent under the green beeches of Randolph.

But the West was not without its hardships also. Work was wearisome and money was scarce. Twenty-five cents a day (cash) was reckoned fair wages. Fifty cents in 'dicker' was easier to get than half that amount in money.

I chopped and split rails from heavy oak timber for 25 cents a hundred and my board. Everything (that farmers produced) was low. The first cow (and calf) I bought was for $6.50. She was three years old and very small. When I got home with her and the calf I called to my wife, 'See here, I have brought you two calves.' She looked and cried out, 'She can't raise a calf.' She did though and both of them made splendid milkers.

We bought pork at $2.00 net, delivered, and corn was 12½ cents a bushel. I boarded a teacher, Samuel Godfrey, in Wayne county, about 1830, for 75 cents a week.

November 17, 1831, we moved into our cabin and the next day it snowed. I had managed by years of hard work to get money with which I had entered one hundred and sixty acres of land and I felt richer than a king and hoped and expected to prosper. But ,alas, disease and affliction were speedily my lot. I was doomed to crutches for life. In less than three months I was prostrated with the 'cold plague,' and I have never stood upon my feet unsupported nor walked without crutches since that hour. I lay a long time helpless, my wife rolling me over in bed. Nobody thought I would live. But here I am! When it became clear that I could not regain strength, I was alarmed at the prospect. What was to become of us? But these fears were at that time taken away and I clung to the promise, 'Seek first, etc.' We resolved to hold together as a family which we have done. To pine, would avail nothing. How we lived is hard to tell. 'God delivered us,' is all I can say. The wheel and the loom did a brave part. When the calamity came I was engaged in preaching to two churches. Of course I stopped. But when I had recovered so as to go on crutches, though not to sit up, I was sent for to see a sick man. The house was crowded; I lay on a pallet and pointed them to Christ. Since then often have I, lying on a couch in the congregation, invited sinners to repentance and bade Christians God speed! The followers of the Lamb would meet and sing and pray, and I would try to preach and the Lord was well pleased for His gracious name's sake. And many a time we were fed on heavenly manna!

My worldly prospect was indeed dark, but God comforted me and blessed be His holy name!

I had grace to trust Him and He sustained me. We had kind friends and we always had enough; sometimes the bitter tear would fall, but I lifted up the eye of faith to Him who sent the ravens to feed Elijah, and to Him who, though He rules all worlds, yet had not where to lay his head! I was not disappointed. My friends have been many and kind and with them would I live and die; and may we all rise to light, clothed in the garments of salvation!

I was converted and joined the Baptists in 1821, was licensed in 1825, and ordained in 1830, and in 1839, when we moved to Winchester, a Baptist church was organized for that place and region which stood many years.

There was at the time a Methodist meeting-house and there was no other. The Presbyterians began before long and kept up an organization for ten or fifteen years, building a house for their worship but the church was always weak and at length became extinct.

After I moved to Winchester, at first I wrote lying on a narrow straw bed but mostly on my knees. The recorder's office then was worth but little; an able-bodied man could have done the work but I had to hire a deputy and the profits were small. In the summer of 1847, my disease returned and in May, 1848, I was hauled between two feather beds to where I now live. I was confined to my bed at that time for more than two years; since then I have been several times snatched from the jaws of death by the same hand which has led me all my journey through. Like the Jews before Jordan, I look across the river and behold the blessed Canaan.

Like Moses on Mt. Pisgah's top, I view the heavenly landscape o'er and humbly wait the appointed time when God shall set my happy spirit free and receive my blood-washed soul to the blissful mansions of eternal rest.

For some years I trusted in the sweet Bible promise and was upheld in the midst of my sorrow. But, as my family cares increased, after a time I became somewhat disheartened; my way seemed hedged up, darkness was on me and I felt gloomy and sad. When I looked at my wife and children and thought of their needs and my own and my helplessness, my soul cried 'What will become of us?'

But one Sabbath after having been to my appointment at Concord (for I could preach though I could not stand, and had been greatly helped and strengthened in the Lord's work), I came home and at night, when in bed, a burden of distress rolled upon my heart and it seemed that I should be crushed; I was not asleep, it was no dream; but I saw myself struggling through deep water and suddenly my Saviour was walking by my side and He sweetly held me up as I buffeted the waves. Deep peace fell on me, all trouble and doubt and sorrow fled, and my soul was bathed in joy unspeakable and full of glory. The holy baptism of that midnight hour has never left me; but I have been enabled to walk in the strength of the grace I then received, even to this blessed day.

A cripple bodily I have continued to be to this moment but the ecstasy of spirit which my poor soul has many a time received from the Lord, human tongue in this world can never tell. And the good Lord is with His unworthy servant still.

The prayer of the Psalmist, 'When I am old and gray-headed, O Lord, forsake me not,' has with me and mine been wonderfully answered! Near fifty years ago I lay feeble and helpless, waiting for death to do its work upon my wretched body; and yet, here I am still, tarrying in this tabernacle of clay, patiently expecting the hour now surely near at hand, when I shall be, 'not unclothed, but clothed upon'; and mortality shall be swallowed up of life—when I shall be permitted to see the King in His beauty; when my crutches and my poor old frame shall be laid aside together, and my freed spirit shall go shouting home!"

"Hallelujah to the Lamb who has purchased our pardon,
We will praise Him again when we pass over Jordan."

Since the Baptist church spoken of above went down, Mr. Willmore has stood outside of special church relation. But he is in full and blessed sympathy with God and all good men and feels that all humble, penitent, God-fearing, heaven-seeking souls are his brethren and sisters. He feels too, that—

"The church on earth and all the dead,
But one communion make.
They all have life in Christ, their Head,
And of His righteousness partake."

Through the glass of faith he views from the tops of the "Delectable Mountains" the glorious sights and scenes in the New Jerusalem; and feels that the time will not be long till he shall be among them, till he shall join the ecstatic throng; till with the spirits of the just made perfect with the "church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven," he, too, cleansed and purified, "washed in the blood of the Lamb," shall take up the heavenly song and swell the hallelujah chorus that rises ever from the hosts of the saved in the courts of glory on high!

NATHAN CADWALLADER.

"When I taught school, I did bravely, taking pupils through arithmetic, etc., where I had never been myself! The first school was by subscription, eight weeks, taught in an old log building in Frederick Davis' field. It had once boasted a clay and puncheon fireplace, but that had been pulled down and the chimney-place was open, like a barn door. The books were whatever each pupil brought—Bible, Testament, Life of Washington, Life of Marion, History of England, spelling books and so on. Each one used whatever be brought, too; 'uniformity of text-books' was not in vogue in that institution, sure; of course classification gave no trouble, but each tow-headed urchin was head and foot too of his own class. I had, perhaps twenty pupils. My school was liked; my government was somewhat unique and certainly original. One day I had two lads standing face to face, two or three feet apart, with a stick split at both ends and one end on each boy's nose; another mischievous ten-year-old I had thrown astraddle of the naked joist-pole overhead; and a fourth luckless wight who had fallen under my magisterial displeasure, was expiating his crime by standing with his hands behind his back and his nose plump against the wall!

Just at that supreme moment of the endurance of penalty for transgressing the majesty of violated law in popped a neighbor and patron of the school more noted for bluntness than gentility, through the open door. He stared, first at one, then at the next, and so on, till at length as the whole ridiculous gravity of the curious situation dawned upon his mind, suddenly he broke out with a rough expression and, sinking with his ponderous weight upon the puncheon floor, burst into a loud and uncontrollable fit of laughter. Was not that school-room a sight? 'Wholesome discipline' was at a discount at that moment of supreme ridiculousness; and teacher, pupils and visitor all gave way together and laughed in concert till they got tired and quit because they could laugh no longer.' "

At another time the same 'school visitor' 'cut a shine' in that (or some neighboring) school, which fun-loving teachers will wonder at when they read: The school was in session; all were at their 'books,' and studying 'for keeps.' One young man was sitting face to the wall engaged in writing, as he sat in front of one of those old slab or puncheon writing-desks, fastened against the side of the house.

All at once in popped 'that same old coon' with a meal-sack slung around his neck. Paying no special heed to what was going on in the room, he strode straight across the floor to this young man aforesaid; and, before any one had the slightest idea of his intention, the old sack was slapped violently round the young man's face, the other exclaiming, 'Tend to your books, you or-na-ry cuss.' Teachers generally say they like to have visitors; doubtless this teacher had often said the same. But probably thereafter his desire for visitors contained at least one mental reservation.

Mr. Cadwallader's school was liked, perhaps all the better for his attempted 'new departures' and original methods. At any rate he was engaged again for the winter school with an enormous increase of wages from $7.00 to $9.00 per month—a growth of well-nigh 30 per cent. and an increase worthy of especial notice and remembrance; conclusively showing that the employers in that backwoods school district thoroughly understood the appropriate method and means of rendering suitable encouragement to corresponding merits; and that they put their knowledge earnestly into practice, much to the satisfaction of the worthy subject of the present sketch.

"That winter furnished some interesting experience. The big boys took me at Christmas and ducked me through a hole in the ice up to my chin, till I would agree to 'treat,' which I finally did. They let me out and I sent for some apples for the 'treat.' The sequel came near being tragic, for the apple boys stayed so long that the others thought I was 'shamming,' and had sent for no apples and so they caught me and went to duck me again. Luckily the boys came just at the nick of time and I was let go and we had a gay 'treat.' Thus went school life (not very) long ago, when I was young and in my 'teens."

During Mr. Cadwallader's term as Senator, an event occurred so curious and vexatious and so apt an illustration of the evils of hasty legislation, and, moreover, of the importance of careful and exact expression that we cannot forbear to state it somewhat in detail. He had resolved that Indiana should have, like her sister states, a law regulating the movements of railroad trains, a thing, in fact, greatly necessary. So, he drew up a bill mostly like the Ohio law, presented it to the Senate and it was "teetotally" passed in fifteen minutes; in fact, before he sat down. It was read, once, twice, ordered to be considered engrossed, read the third time and finally passed, all in the same transaction. Not an objection was raised, not a word was changed; it went through "clean." It passed the other House much in the same way and nothing more was thought of it. On the day in which the law was to go into effect, the whole State of Indiana was "waked up" by the unearthly screeching of every engine-whistle on every railroad of the State. Especially were the ears of our Senator, whose residence is close to the railroad depot in Union City, greeted with whistling fit to "wake the dead." When the railroad men were asked, "what does this mean?" they replied, "Senator Cadwallader's whistle-bill requires it."

Mr. Cadwallader resolutely denied the allegation, but on examining the "Record," there it stood in black and white—"Every engineer shall, within eighty rods of any crossing of any street or public highway, sound the whistle continuously until he has passed said crossing." Cities were allowed to regulate the matter as they chose; but as no town had done so, the law was binding in town and country alike. Here was a racket indeed. Mr. Cadwallader was nonplussed, but knowing the bill was not so when he had it pass the Senate, he got hold of the copy thereof and found this curious fact to wit: The section as he wrote it stood thus: * * * "shall sound the whistle and ring the bell continuously until, etc., i. e., sound the whistle once at first and then keep on ringing the bell, etc. Somebody had drawn a pencil mark across the words "and ring the bell," making the clause read, "shall sound the whistle continuously," and thus it stands on the "Record." Who made the alteration Mr. Cadwallader has never been able to find out. But it shows very strikingly how important it is to have the words of a law just exactly right and how great a change a slight alteration will make. The bill as it was presented, commanded (though the idea is not very clearly expressed), a proper and needful thing. As it stands on the Record, the thing required would be an intolerable nuisance.

Probably no man was ever greeted with such a howl of indignation as from every corner of the State met the astounded ears of the Senator from Randolph. Examination, however, soon quieted the clamor and showed his intention and his action to have been proper and that he was simply the victim of a strange and, thus far, unexplained mistake (or, possibly, of a trick on the part of some truckler to the favor of railroad corporations). Mr. Cadwallader has had the satisfaction of witnessing the Indiana Legislature pass the "Railroad Whistle Bill" in an amended form, i. e., in the shape that he put it through the Senate originally, and of having the Senate pass, unanimously, a resolution that the "blunder" of the previous "act" was in no way chargeable to him. One would have supposed that Governor Williams would have seen the absurdity of the bill in the form in which it seems to have come into his hands, but it appears he did not; and "Governors" are not always "sharp" in the matter of language, any more than other people, as the Hoosier state, in common with others, has had occasion to discover.

I should not do justice to my feelings were I to omit to state that Mr. C. is himself an eminent specimen of an honorable and high-minded citizen. Though economical, he is not penurious; though desirous to make money, he is not oppressive to the poor and unfortunate; though not, in name, a professor of religion, yet in heart he delights in all things good and lovely, and assists liberally in building up every worthy enterprise. He is a hearty and earnest friend of the temperance reform, and an active and uncompromising Republican. He possesses the unqualified respect of all his fellow-citizens, and is an honor to the town in which he resides, and to the county which, for well nigh fifty years, has claimed him for her own. Although highly honored, thus far, by his fellow-citizens, the state will never know what she has lost by neglecting to advance him to the post of state school superintendent, for a genius so decidedly fresh and vigorous when in the inexperience of untutored youth, as shown by his original inventive powers, in the way of penalties for violation of school law, would infallibly have wrought out radical and thorough reformation in all school appliances and methods, so that lads and lasses both in the near and the remote future would have revered and blessed his name as the ceaseless ages roll.

WILLIAM TAYLOR.

"William McKim laid out Spartanburg. William Dukes lived in the house where Taylor now lives. Elias Godfrey and Thomas Hart kept a grocery is the house now occupied by John H. Taylor. Mr. Fires built the house where John Wiggs now lives, and sold it to Stephen Barnes, who completed it, and occupied it till he died. In the war of 1812, many men went from our region to Norfolk or Portsmouth. We lived 200 miles from Norfolk. People used to drive their hogs thither to market. The country where we lived was level and sandy. The upper counties were broken, and the soil was good for wheat and tobacco. We lived east of Raleigh forty miles. We could hear the cannon roar at Raleigh on the Fourth of July. We were six weeks and two days on the road coming West. My oldest son and myself walked nearly all the way. We camped out every night but one. Jesse Jordan had come to Indiana, and stayed three or four years, and returned to Carolina for some money that was due him, and he came back to Indiana with us. We were well and enjoyed the trip first rate. We had two one-horse carts to haul our luggage in. We had a tent, and would throw our beds down on the leaves. We slept one night at the foot of the Blue Ridge. We started the last Sunday of April, and arrived at Arba June 8, 1836. We came the mail stage route a long way, then through Powell Valley, Cumberland Gap, etc. We crossed the Blue Ridge at Good Spur and Poplar Camp, and came through Crab Orchard, etc. We traveled nearly a week on the Blue Ridge. We could see houses on points of hills and away down in valleys where we could not guess how anybody could ever get to them. One place called Dry Ridge had no water for a long distance. We crossed the Ohio at Cincinnati, which seemed to me to be quite a large town, the largest I had ever seen. We did not stop long there, but drove through, and camped for the night. As we came through Raleigh they were building the new state house. Jesse Jordan had $1,500 in North Carolina currency that he had to exchange because it would not pass in Indiana. He got United States bank notes, the only bills that would pass. I had my money in gold. I paid for my land in half-eagles—seventy half-eagles. I had in North Carolina 125 acres. I went back to Carolina once and stayed six weeks. Jesse Jordan's widow also went back a short time ago. She said the people seemed to be doing very well."

BRANSON ANDERSON, 1833.

"Settlers when we came, in 1833, were Jacob Chenoweth, in Ohio; Hezekiah Locke, on the Bailey place; Mason Freeman, on the Marquis place. John Foster came on the Griffis place a year or so after we came. [This was not the Joshua Foster who was in that vicinity many years before.] Mr. Farms had just put up a cabin on the James Ruby place; had not moved into it yet. Smith Masterson lived on the Downing place, north of Dismal. James Griffis lived on the Williamson farm, and moved not long afterward to the Griffis place, on the Greenville State road."

ELISHA MARTIN.

"In June, 1832, in a race, molding brick with Silas Connell, I molded, from sun to sun, 25,148 brick, and he, 23,365. I was about twenty years old. My father-in-law scolded me; told me I should not have tried it, and that I could not stand it. He stood by me and kept me from working full speed, till 2 p. m., when he told me to 'go it.' Silas led me all the forenoon. A great crowd were looking on, and they bet two to one on Connell. By and by the tide turned, and the bets became five to one for me, and I beat. People after that offered to bring men to beat me, but they never did. I had a man on his yard and he on mine. They set their watches just alike, and we begun to a second. We worked till dinner. I had my dinner brought to the yard; took a few bites and went to molding again. Men said I molded forty-eight brick the last minute. They carried me to the house, washed me in whisky, and would not let me lie down till near morning. I went to work the third day after. The bet was only $10 on a side. Isrum Engle, of Union City, and Ezekiel Clough, of Jackson township, lived at Cincinnati at the time, and know that I did what I claim to have done."

Mr. Martin was a brick molder, and has been for many years. He owns a good farm south of Winchester.

THOMAS SHALER. [BY JOSEPH C. HAWKINS.]

"I had to go to mill at Ridgeville, from near Antioch, Jay county, Indiana, generally on horseback. I had to do the milling, while the older boys carried the mail from Winchester to Fort Wayne. Thomas Shaler, who used to live near, but had moved to near Camden, came to mother's on his way to mill with a wagon and oxen. He persuaded her to have me go with him and get fifteen bushels of corn, and said he would bring home the meal for her; so she sent me. Brother Ben had raised the corn at Joab Ward's, and I shelled it; got a horse there and took it to mill, and had the meal all ready. But Shaler had been getting drunk and fooling around, and he stayed three days. I determined to walk home and bring a horse and get my grist that way. But at last he got ready and started. (See Arthur McKew's Reminiscences.) He left my meal at William Welch's, and I took the grist home from there (John Adair's place south of Liber). Shaler was away about nine days, and his wife and family were at home starving. He was a drunken, shiftless fellow, boasting of being half-Indian. His wife was an excellent woman, with four children, all girls. She was there in the woods, ten miles from any settler. Their cabin had no fire-place, floor, nor chimney, no daubing nor chinking, and the snow was eight inches deep; everything was frozen up, and they had nothing to eat. She had burned some coal in one corner of the shanty, had made a sled, and was intending to take an ox, the sled, her four children, and a kettle with coals in it to keep the children from freezing to death, and to start for Mrs. Hawkins' cabin fifteen miles off, the nearest settler she knew. But her husband and young McKew got to the cabin that night about midnight, with the provisions. Shaler and McKew cut the ice and crossed the Big Salamonie, near Judge Winters', but there was a stream called Big Branch, up which the water had set back from the Big Salamonie, over a wide space. The water had suddenly frozen, and then had sunk away, leaving the ice, and they could not get the oxen across in the night."

[NOTE.—This Tom Shaler was the same that James Porter found "squatted" on the land that Porter entered afterward, northwest part of Jackson township, Randolph county. Shaler moved from there near to Liber, and soon after that to near Camden. This incident took place about 1833. Joseph Hawkins' father moved to Jay county in 1829. He died in 1833, and they were "roughing" it up there in the Jay county woods, a poor widow with a large family.]

JACOB JOHNSON, 1833.

"The first resident of Jackson township is supposed to have been Philip Storms. He 'squatted' on a piece of land east of my farm; but a Mr. Fager entered the land from under him, and he then moved to Mississinewa crossing and remained there several years. It is also said that another person entered Mr. Storms' land there; that he was very angry and threatened to shoot the intruder, but that they finally settled the matter amicably and that he moved elsewhere. He was living in the region in 1830, how much later is not now known, and if he had lived elsewhere in the township several years, he was certainly the first comer. Mr. Jacobs is thought by some to have been the first permanent settler in the township, but these things are 'mighty hard to find out.' Ishmael Bunch was a very early pioneer also.

I (Johnson) lived in a rail-pen from May 3 to June 22. Our family was myself and wife and nine children, and we were as happy as need be. We made the floor of the rail-pen of bark, and renewed it twice. When the water would splash up through the bark, I would put in a new floor of the same sort.

The State road to Portland was laid out about 1838, only forty feet wide.

The first justice in Jackson township was James Wickersham.

The first couple married were David Vance and Sally Smith by Esq. Wickersham.

The first mill was erected by Jones, on Lowe's Branch, one and a half miles above me.

I built a horse-mill, then a water-mill, and afterward a saw-mill.

The grist-mill was run twenty years and the saw-mill ten years, but they are all rotted down now.

The graveyard on my place was begun about 1840.

The Indians were all gone but one, 'Old Duck.' He hunted and trapped and took his skins and furs to Greenville. He used to stay with Jacobs, at Harshman's, and with Andrew Debolt."

Note.—This "Duck" is spoken of in Jay County History as being familiar with the early settlers of that county. He seems to have been a clever, civil, honest Indian. At one time he was at a church trial, and when the witness began to testify "crosswise," he rose to leave, saying, "Me go; no much good here, too much lie."

The author of Jay County History says (in substance):

All early settlers are familiar with the name of the old Indian, Doctor Duck, who remained in the county a long time after his tribe had moved to Kansas. He showed much skill in the treatment of diseases. * * * He was religious and often appeared to be praying to the Great Spirit. He attended meeting for preaching at Deerfield and the church trial afterward, which he left as stated above. He tried to cure John J. Hawking, a pioneer of Jay county, but did not succeed, though he lived with Mr. H. six months. About two weeks after Mr. H. died (March 15, 1832), the Indian visited his grave and spent nearly half a day there alone, apparently preaching and performing wild ceremonies."

Settlers (that Mr. Johnson remembers) when he came were: Daniel B. Miller, Ward township; Jacob Harshman, two miles west of Johnson's; Abram Harshman, same neighborhood; Reuben Harshman, same neighborhood (died lately in Union City, Ohio); Andrew Debolt, Mount Holly, dead; James Reeves, near Castle P. O., dead; Amos Smith, near New Lisbon, gone long ago; Samuel Skinner, near New Lisbon, gone long ago; John Skinner, near New Lisbon, gone long ago; James Willson, James Wickersham, etc.

John Johnson, his brother, came when he did, dying a year or so ago, aged eighty-eight years.

William Warren, James Warren, James Simmons, came soon after Mr. Johnson.

James Porter was living near New Pittsburg, and others had settled near Allensville, on the Mississinewa river.

ANDREW AKER.

"My trade as a merchant was extensive and various. I used to buy every commodity that was salable at that day. I bought produce of all kinds and shipped it on flat-boats down the Mississinewa, sending sometimes two or three boats at once, loaded with flour, bacon, apples, etc. We went to Logansport, Lafayette, etc., selling mostly, though not entirely, to Indian traders. Sales would be made on credit, and then we would go down at the time of the Indian payments, which were made once a year, generally in August or September, and get the money for the goods sold to them. The last time I went we had three boat loads. The boats were made by Joab Ward, who kept a boat-yard near what is now Ridgeville. He would make a boat all complete for an amount varying from $25 to $30, which would carry about one hundred barrels of flour.

I lost my sight about 1836, and sold goods till 1838. I worked twenty-five years at pump-making. I had worked at it when young, and, trying it again after blindness came on, I found that I could do the work with success, and resumed the business. I have made and sold great numbers of pumps, working all through the country, making forty at one time at Recovery.

Thomas Hanna kept a store at Winchester when I came there. Esq. Odle had owned a store before that; Hanna's store was quite an extensive establishment for those days.

Paul W. Way set up a dry goods store afterwards, and William and Jesse Way began also. Michael Aker bought out my stock and followed me in the business, though he did not continue long.

The court house was up and covered when I came to Winchester; David Wysong furnished the brick, and the lime was obtained at New Paris, or at Middleboro; lime was not burned in this county till afterwards.

Joseph Hinchy had made pumps, hauling his tools with an ox team, and making them from farm to farm. He is the same man who planted nurseries in various places through the country.

Soon after I came here I bought 108 acres of John B. Wright and 100 acres of Charles Conway. I bought the Daniel Petty land east of town, of Oliver Walker, as also a lot in every square in town. I traded the lot in the north front with a building on it for the farm I now live on (108 acres).

I traded 180 acres with a good house and barn and orchard and 50 acres cleared for 400 acres, and sold that in four or five years to Joshua Bond for $1,100.

Ernestus Strohm began a cabinet shop, and I was in partnership with him for awhile. We made a sideboard worth $175 about 1838, the first costly piece of furniture made in the county. It is a splendid article—large, square, rather low, with a large framed glass at the middle of the top. I have it yet in a good state of preservation; in fact, almost as nice and good as new. It was the first thing that was made in that shop, and it was made to show what kind of work the shop could furnish.

Some amusing things would take place in those primitive times. Some such incidents occurred in my own experience.

Curtis Voris and a half-brother of his had moved out here from Greenville. He had some money to spare and he asked, 'Who would be safe?' The person told him, 'Andrew Aker.' So he came to me: 'What per cent?' 'Six.' 'How long time?' 'A year.' 'All right,' said he, 'and I will trade out the interest.' 'Better yet,' said I, 'I will take your money. How much can you spare?' 'Two dollars and a half,' was the rejoinder. That I was astonished is simply the truth. However, I took his money, the whole of it, and he kept his bargain by trading out the interest, all of it.

A man from out North was trading one day, and having made a bill of (perhaps) $2, offered in payment a $5 bill. It was a base counterfeit, and I told him so. 'Why,' said he, 'it is good; I got it from Hell.' 'Take it back there, then, it will not pass here.' He meant a man with that name.

One day Old Samuel Emery, from the Mississinewa (who died only a short time ago), came in with a roll of deer-skins. He was truly a rough-looking customer. His pants were buckskin and ripped up nearly to the knee. He wore a straw hat, with the rim half torn off; his shoes were ragged and tied up with hickory bark; and altogether he was as forlorn as one often sees. He wished to 'trade out' his roll of buckskins. He got several articles, I reckoned up the account and the trade was nearly even. He then said, 'I wish to get a few more things, powder and lead and some flints, and I would like to get trusted.' I spoke to Charlie Conway at the back end of the store. 'O,' said he, 'Sam Emery is all right, he is one of the substantial citizens out on the Mississinewa.' He got his powder and things on credit and paid for them promptly according to agreement. After that time he did a large amount of trading at my store, always dealing fairly, like the honorable man that he was. But when I first set eyes on him as he entered the store with his roll of buckskins on his shoulder, he was a strange-looking customer indeed!

The same man who loaned me the $2.50 also bought a cow of me for $8. He agreed to pay me for the creature in two or three months. He paid me, though it took a much longer time than that. He made the payment in small sums, sometimes as low as 12½ cents, and never more than 37½ cents at any one time. But he paid me fully after a while.

Shortly after I came to Winchester I built a brick house, getting the brick of David Wysong at $2.50 per thousand delivered. Mr. Wysong died only two or three years ago, about eighty years old.

The pump business is carried on at present by my sons-in-law, Knecht and Thomas. They do not make now, but buy and sell, purchasing sometimes as high as 4,000 pumps at one time."

MRS. JESSIE ADDINGTON, 1834.

"Joab Ward and Meshach Lewallyn lived near Ridgeville. There were no houses from here to Winchester. Thomas Addington (not Rev. Thomas) occupied a cabin near where George Addington now lives. William Addington had come on in March, and had settled one mile north. There were no settlers east or west that I know of.

Benjamin Lewallyn and a Mr. Jones, as also James Addington (uncle to Jesse), had settled on the Mississinewa, below Ridgeville. That town was not begun till long afterward. People used to bring flour, bacon, apples, potatoes, apple-butter, etc., to Ridgeville to Ward's, and buy of him a flat-boat, to send them down the river to market. Mr. Addington has bought of Mr. Ward apples supposed to be spoiled for trade by being frozen. We had to go to White River or Mississinewa to get help in raisings or log-rollings.

Thomas Addington (cousin of Jesse, son-in-law of Joseph Addington, on Sparrow Creek) had moved out here just before, had built him a cabin and his family (and we, too) moved in without chimney or floor. We stayed there, cooking outdoors, for a month, till ours was built. We moved in as soon as our cabin was covered, having nothing but log walls and a clapboard roof. We cooked by a log-heap fire for several weeks, till a chimney was built, some time in August.

Religious meetings used to be held in private dwellings around the settlement by the Methodists. There was no school for several years. There were several other Addingtons, father and uncles of Jesse Addington."

ROBERT MURPHY.

"The county was new. Very few settlers were here in 1834. James Griffis lived on the Williamson place; Smith Masterson lived west about a mile; William Kennon lived on State road, near Bartonia (father of Thomas S. Kennon); John Dixon lived one and a half miles northwest of me; Green resided on the State road. Kennon and Griffis had been here two years. Masterson came the same year but earlier than I did.

There were no roads, only 'blazes.' There were paths, tracks and 'blazes.' Hill Grove and Spartanburg both were towns, but few houses in either.

For milling, we had to go to Richmond or Stillwater. There was a mill at McClure's, which is standing yet. In dry times the water would fail. We had to go to Piqua, or Troy, or Dayton, for salt. Andrew Kennedy (Congressman) once said that the time would come when a bushel of wheat would bring a barrel of salt. No one believed him, but the day has come.

I once tried to go to the first house in Union City (there was only one) to appraise some property there (Star House). I struck the railroad track and went on east. Coming to a house, I inquired, 'How far east to Union City?' 'Half a mile west,' was the reply.

We had to cut up corn and haul it to the barnyard to keep the squirrels from taking it in the field.

There were no mills near, not even a corn-cracker. Cole's mill and Dean's mill (Ohio) were there. There had been one at Sharp Eye. A dam had been built, but the people thought it made them sick, and it had to be taken down. When I first came I moved into a cabin near by.

I came in March, 1834, and cleared seven acres and put it in corn that spring. I cut, rolled and burnt what I could, and the rest I killed by piling and burning the brush around them. I hired 2,000 rails made and fenced the land.

I have never bought in all, during forty-six years, ten bushels of corn. Two grists of corn and three bushels of wheat is all I have bought in that time.

I moved with three wagons, and afterward brought another load of bees, grain, etc. I had wheat in Darke county, and after harvest I hauled the wheat home.

I worked for one man (Mr. Teegarden) in Darke county one year, at $7 per month (some of the time at 31 cents a day). I have worked many a day at 31 cents a day. I never hunted or fished much. They must bite quick or show themselves, or I was o-p-h. I have killed only two deer. One night, fishing in a 'riffle,' in the 'Dismal,' we caught a basketful of suckers with our hands, many of them a foot long. One year, the creek froze and then raised above the ice with great numbers of fish, and the water froze again and fastened the fish between the ice, in great quantities. We could have caught lots of them, but we thought freezing the fish spoiled them.

I found a steel-trap in Darke county, and sold it to an Indian for six coon-skins to be brought at such a time. The time came, but no coon-skins, and I thought 'Good-bye steel-trap, good-bye coon-skins,' but he came and brought them afterward and said, smiling, 'Too good sugar-making—couldn't come.' Sugar-trees were plenty. We made all the sugar we needed, and some to sell.

The first school in the neighborhood was, say, in 1838. The first meeting-house was at South Salem.

I used to be a Presbyterian, but have joined the Protestant Methodists."

The following is a list of old men residing in Wayne township (age, 1880): John Hartman, 76; Jacob Baker, 79; Joel Elwell, 75; William A. Macy, 71; Ezra Coddington, 73; Francis Frazier, 79; Robert Murphy, 75; Isaac Clifton, 73; George Huffnogle, 80; William Pickett, 79.

Mr. Murphy is growing old and somewhat feeble and decrepit, but no more so than might be expected at his age.

PETER HOOVER, 1835.

Settlers when Mr. Hoover came: Robert Murphy; John Dixon came the fall before and bought out Mr. Kennon; James Griffis, William Kennon, Smith Masterson.

"People were sociable then. Men would go seven or eight miles to a raising or a log-rolling—to Sheets', north, or to Griffis' or Carnahan's, south, or even farther. People worked then. They did not eat and sit around. Twenty to thirty men were a large crowd. The first election (for Jackson and Wayne townships together) was held at Peyton's, west of Union City, in say 1836, and only seven votes were polled. The rest went to other polls to vote. A person could vote anywhere in the county then.

Mrs. Teeter came early; her husband had died in Pennsylvania. She raised a large family and died about 90 years of age."

P. FIELDS (1833).

"Settlers when I came—some of them were Burkett Pierce, west of Deerfield, very old and living still; George Ritenour, across the river, near Pierce's, an early settler, but is now dead; William Odle, Curtis Butler, living along the river below town, moved away, long, long ago.

There were none above (east of) town till a mile above me. Samuel Emery lived a mile up the river. He became very old and died a year or so since.

Mr. Bragg came the fall before I did, in 1832; he is dead.

Allen Wall was on the north side of the river, opposite Bragg's; he, too, is dead.

James Mayo, north of the river, also dead.

Aquila Loveall lived near Mayo's; he is not living.

Daniel B. Miller, up the river on the south side; he is quite old and resides at Winchester, having his third wife (he is now dead).

Robert Parsons lived a mile below Deerfield. He owned a corn-cracker; he is dead. Deerfield had not 'started' yet. One shanty stood there, but no town had been begun. A school shanty was standing one and a half miles above, on Congress land, on the north of Deerfield and Union City road.

There was one also near the old (Chapel) meeting-house west of Deerfield.

The Chapel meeting-house was built about 1835, and is the oldest one in the region.

Prospect meeting-house was not built till several years after I came perhaps about 1840. The cemetery at the Chapel is the oldest one in this part of the country.

When Lewallyn came to settle near Ridgeville, they unloaded their goods into the brush. Some stayed and went to building a 'camp' and the others went back to get the rest of the 'plunder.'

Lewallyn's daughter married one Mr. Renberger, who used to live near Ridgeville, and she may perhaps be living now.

I came from Hawkins county, Tennessee, sixty-four miles up Holston river from Knoxville. I sold 100 acres of land there for $400. We came here with one four-horse wagon and a carriage.

Lancelot Fields, my brother, had moved to this county before me, and had settled near New Pittsburg, not far from James Porter's. He had returned to Tennessee on business, and, when he came back to Indiana, we came along, too. There were thirteen in the company.

Deerfield & Union City road had been laid and 'blazed,' but it was not yet opened through. I helped open it to Middletown.

One Indian, called 'Old Duck,' lived in Allen Wall's yard, in a little shanty.

Cabins were made with 'knees' and weight-poles and latch-strings.

The people were social and friendly. We used to go six or eight miles to raisings and log-rollings, and to Richmond to mill.

Deer were plenty, though I did not care for hunting. I never killed but one deer in my life.

But venison was very easily gotten. There were plenty of hunters who were only too glad to shoot us all the deer we wanted. George Porter and his boys were hunters, and had no land. Zack Key, brother of Andrew Key, lived near us, and if we wished any venison, all we had to do was to speak to him, and he would shoulder his rifle and bring one down in a hurry. He would hang it up and tell me where to find it, and I would go out and bring the carcass in. The hunters cared nothing for the flesh. All they wanted was the skins, which would sell for from 25 to 50 cents.

Once I was hunting my horses. They had wandered far, and in looking for them, I came to Ephraim Bowen's. It was perhaps in 1835, not long after I came to the county. The settlers were far more numerous in that part of the county, but farther north it was wild enough. Mr. Bowen and his folks were very kind and hospitable. They could not tell me where to find my horses, but they did another thing which was first-rate for a tired and hungry man. They would not take 'no' for an answer, but insisted that I should stop and take dinner with them, which I did, and went on my wandering way much refreshed.

Horses had a wide range then, when running out, and sometimes gave immense trouble to their owners in hunting them."

JOHN R. WARREN.

"Settlers when I came were Daniel B. Miller, on the Miller place; Samuel Helms, two miles north of Saratoga; Andrew Key, three miles north of Saratoga; William Pogue (father of Robert Pogue, Union City), near Andrew Key; John T. Evans, west of Saratoga; Edward Evans, west of Saratoga; Abram Harshman, east of Saratoga; Alexander, near Harshman's;

William Bragg, below Andrew Key; Daniel Mock, west of Saratoga; George W. Barber, one mile west of Saratoga; William Simmons, on Mississinewa river; Samuel Sipe, near Perry Fields; John Sipe came shortly after I did.

The first school after I came was near Daniel B. Miller's, about 1840.

The first meeting-house was the one at Prospect, 1840.

The first grist-mill was west of Deerfield.

The first smith shop was kept by Jo Locke, north of Saratoga.

There was but one house in Deerfield.

A man told me I would not know when I got there."

EDWARD EDGER, DEERFIELD.

"When I came to Deerfield just three families resided there, viz: Henry Taylor, Henry Sweet and Jonathan Thomas. Henry Sweet was a blacksmith. Henry Taylor had a few groceries in a log cabin there. He also sold some whisky, and professed, besides that, to keep a hotel, too.

Curtis Butler had been doing business there, and had been acting postmaster at that place. Deerfield was by no means an unimportant place; in fact, small though it was, and deep buried in the thick forests of the Mississinewa. Although that valley had been settled more than twenty years, yet along its whole course that little Deerfield was its only town, and its only post office, and the only one, it may be said, between Winchester and Fort Wayne.

But Mr. Butler had moved to Marion, and left the post office in the hands of William Odle. The amount of business may be judged of when it is stated that the salary of the office was $1.75 per quarter. It rose afterward to $40 per quarter. I was appointed postmaster soon after my removal to Deerfield. Shortly after that, and for two or three years, an immense business was done in Randolph and Jay counties in the entry of land, especially in Jay county, and vast sums of (silver) money were sent by John Connor, the mail carrier, to Fort Wayne.

He used to have two horses—one for the mail and one for the money sack. He would have, sometimes, as much money (silver) as two of us could well throw upon the horse's back. He would lead the horses and walk, sometimes.

People would 'look land' and leave the money with me, and I would send it by Mr. Connor.

He has taken thus as high as $6,000 or $7,000 at one trip. We used to hide it in a hole in the ground, beneath the puncheon floor, under the bed.

We handled in that way, in all, many thousand dollars. I would receipt for the money, and take Connor's receipt, and he would pay it at Fort Wayne and obtain the patents, and bring them to me, and I would deliver them to the parties concerned, and they would pay at the rate of $1 for eighty acres.

Though Mr. Connor was poor, he was faithful and honest, and, during my whole course of business with him, for nearly twenty years, I never suffered a cent of loss.

He carried the mail for some twenty-eight years, up to about 1861. His appointment began about 1835.

The mail routes were as follows: Richmond to Fort Wayne, via Winchester; Greenville west to Winchester.

There were perhaps others. The mails were carried once a week from Winchester to Fort Wayne and back. Connor had to lie out in the woods one night on his trip going to and coming from Fort Wayne. The operation would not be considered very safe now, especially with hundreds and sometimes thousands of dollars in conveyance, but Johnnie Connor was never molested.

Between Winchester and Deerfield was a dense forest and much swamp.

There were only two settlers between Elias Kizer's (one mile north of Winchester) and Deerfield, viz.: Samuel Cain and John Kinnear. Mr. Cain's was two miles, and Mr. Kinnear's three and a half miles, south of Deerfield.

A large part of the land on both sides of the road northward from Winchester to Deerfield was held by James G. Birney, a non-resident, and the country remained unsettled for many years.

Deerfield became an important trading point, and it was for years a lively place.

David Connor, the Indian trader, left his post east of Deerfield some years before I came, though I think not very long.

I traded with the Indians for furs, as also in succeeding years in cattle, hogs, etc. I traveled extensivly, to Green Bay and the northwest for furs, etc., and in general trading, visiting every northern state and the South also.

The trade at Deerfield at one time extended over Jay and Blackford counties, and even much farther than that. I have sold as high as $15,000 in a single year, and have taken in as much as $700 in one day. One day I bought 160 saddle hams that had been killed the day before. There had fallen a snow several inches deep, a tracking snow, so called, because the hunter could track the deer in it.

George Shaneyvelt, of Jay county, killed nine deer in one day.

The furs were coon, mink, muskrat, wild cat, catamount, etc.

Wolves and bears and wild cats were common, and deer were very plenty.

Deerskins were of different prices, from 50 cents to $1. 'Short-blues' were $1, i. e., deer killed in the fall whose hair was short and whose skins had a bluish cast.

In early times great quantities of tree-sugar and molasses, and of venison hams used to be wagoned to Cincinnati; and salt and iron kettles, etc., would be hauled back. I sold four tons of sugar kettles in one winter. The cost of hauling was great. At one time a quantity of salt that was worth $18 in Cincinnati, cost $20 to get it hauled from there to Deerfield.

Four-horse teams would take two or three days to get from Winchester to Deerfield.

Teamsters would cut out a road and then throw brush across to hide it so that nobody else would see the track, that the ones who made the opening might have the use of it for several trips.

I had the first cook stove in the county. It was brought from Cincinnati. That and another cost $100 in silver at 10 per cent. premium, equal to $110 in currency. The other one was sold to Mrs. Kinnear, south of Deerfield.

Considerable flat-boating down the Mississinewa was done after I came to Randolph.

At one time the task was undertaken to take several loads of coal down the river.

A German named Keizer, who was poor, wished me to advance goods to him and take the coal for security. I would not, but Mr. Searl let him have the goods and took Frederick Miller as security. The coal was burned, the boats were built and caulked with tow, and the coal was loaded upon the boats, as also the goods which Mr. Searl furnished to Keizer upon Miller's security.

I had about two wagon loads of furs which I put upon one of the boats, and steered the boat on the trip down the river.

Mr. Holly steered another of the boats.

We came to Mr. McKinney's dam below Fairview, and Holly's boat got fast on a bar.

Mr. McKinney came out with his rifle and threatened to shoot if we attempted to jump his dam. We did attempt it, however, and he did not shoot.

But the boats could not cross the dam, and the merchandise was a total loss, except my furs, which I sent back by wagon to Deerfield. Mr. Searl lost about $2,000, which came near breaking him up. These boats were loaded at Ritenour's mill below Deerfield, a point at which many boats received their cargo.

At another time Joseph Hinchy and I took a boat load of flour and salt, etc., down the river. He and I built the boat, and we loaded it at Ritenour's mill. I steered the boat and we jumped four or five dams. One of them was Connor's, which was only a brush dam, and not hard to pass.

When we got to the 'Feeder dam' for the canal, they asked $10 to go through, and it would have taken all day to clear out the logs so as to permit the boat to pass. I offered $1.00 for a man to come on the boat with me and help me jump the dam. A man accepted the offer; we performed the feat and got the boat over safe. The boat was taken to Logansport, and the cargo was sold mostly to the Indians. This was done in 1839.

This Joseph Hinchy was a very eccentric man. He owned land in many places, and set out orchards far and near, planting and grafting the trees; and some of his old orchards are standing yet. He set out trees at Joab Ward's, at Wheeling, at Marion and many other places. He was a pump-maker also. [Mr. Aker says he hauled his tools for pump making on a sled with oxen. He wore only buckskin clothes.]

He used to have plenty of money, and would lend it to almost anybody that wanted it.

Deerfield was for years a place of large business. At first the trade was to and from Cincinnati by wagon, afterward to the canal at Piqua. We used to trade largely in swine. I once drove a herd of hogs from Kentucky to South Carolina, beginning to sell them in North Carolina, and so onward till they were all disposed of.

Once in driving swine from Deerfield with 2,000 in the drove, there came a terrible freshet (about New Year's). We swam Greenville creek twice. The hogs swam the creek. We lost none, but some we had to pull out by the ears. The trip to Cincinnati took twenty-one days. There were about ten hands with the drove. I got for the hogs $6 net. Pork, however, was very variable, and sometimes fell very low, and many have been bankrupted thereby.

I once traveled six weeks in Kansas, sleeping in a wagon the whole time. My companion most of the time was an Indian, who was a trusty, faithful man.

When a young man I traveled through the South, working at my trade; as also I was pilot on a steamboat from New Orleans to Louisville, spending five or six years in these ways. During these trips I passed through parts of North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas. When a boy sixteen years old, I went as an apprentice with my master, Benedict Thomas, to Texas, from Georgetown, Kentucky, with a flat-boat load of furniture and saddles and bridles and dry goods. We took them on a flat-boat to the mouth of the river, on a keel-boat to Natchitoches, and thence by wagon 160 miles to the old Spanish fort, between the two Trinity's (rivers). He traded his goods for mules and horses and for Spanish hides. He stayed in Texas and sent me to New Orleans to exchange the animals and hides for mahogany, coffee, molasses and sugar, which I did and returned home on foot. Another man came with me. We bought knapsacks and started, being twenty days on the road, and sleeping in the woods or with the Indians. One place was 140 miles (from French Camps to Fort Columbia on the Tombigbee); thence we came to Tuscumbia, and so, on home. We got provisions of the Indians—jerked meat, bear's flesh and venison, and also hominy and sweet potatoes and corn bread. We passed through the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations.

My brother, Archibald, walked from New Orleans sixteen times, and my brother, William, twelve times, from 1809 and onward. They would go down with flat-boats and return on foot. The flat-boats would cost $150 and would have to be sold at New Orleans perhaps for $10. They generally made two trips a year. One of them once tried three trips, but he got sick. They commonly traveled 'Carroll's Trace,' from Lake Pontchartrain to Colbert's Ferry, on the Tennessee river. The 'trace' stretched for miles and miles through deep, tall cane-brakes, a clear well-trodden path with thick canes on both sides of the path nearly impenetrable. The canes were sometimes thirty or forty feet high and as thick as they could grow.

In 1847 I went to New Orleans for hemorrhage of the lungs. Recovering my health, I returned home, and have lived since that time, thirty-five years, enjoying still a reasonable degree of health and strength."

JOHN HOKE, JACKSON.

"The settlers in 1836 were, west of Union City, Wayne township, Thomas Peyton, Converse place; Jacob Emerick, William Anderson's farm; John Emerick, Weimar farm; north of Union City; John Sheets, Smith farm; Eli Noffsinger, north of Smith's farm, on Little Mississinewa; near New Lisbon; Amos Smith, west of New Lisbon; David Vance, William Cox, Isaiah Cox, Thomas Wiley, at New Lisbon; Andrew Debolt, at Mt. Holly, all sons-in-law of Amos Smith; Jacob Johnson, west of Mt. Holly, 1833; Seth Macy, one and a half miles of Johnson's (west); James Skinner, one mile west of New Lisbon; John Skinner, near his brother James; James Reeves, father of the Reeveses, one-half mile north of Skinner's; James Wickersham, one mile south of New Lisbon; ———— Nickum, where Eli Mangas lives; Thomas Devor, one-half mile north of Allensville; John Thomson, north of Devor's; Jacobs, near Allensville, north of Mississinewa; Simmons, west, on Mississinewa; James Porter, south of New Pittsburg; Philip Storms had been at Mississinewa Crossing, but had gone away; James Warren, near Middletown, one-half mile south; John Warren, three miles west of Middletown; William Warren laid out Middletown.

I think these settlers had been here from two to five years.

For awhile people used hand-mills to grind corn-meal.

Mr. Skinner had a mill, perhaps the first, in about 1840. It was a corn-cracker and stood a few years.

Mr. Hinchy had a saw-mill and a corn-cracker one-half mile east of Allensville. They stood a long time.

Others, perhaps, had mills that I do not now call to mind. The Allensville mill was the first important and extensive mill in the region, and it is there now.

The Indians (Wyandots) used to come and hunt on Gray's Branch, but they had mostly stopped coming there two or three years before I came. A few came afterward.

The first settlers did little but hunt. They thought the country would never be filled up, but would remain a superb hunting-ground. Settlers began to come in and go to clearing farms, and then they began, too, somewhat. Hunters would come through my clearing and say: 'Are you going to clear out a farm?' 'Yes, I thought I would.' 'Well, maybe that's the best way.' The land at first was a good deal wet; half of it stood in water much of the time. Clearing and draining has dried it out pretty well."

THOMAS HUBBARD, GREEN.

"I entered 131 acres and bought, second-hand, 158 acres. I now own 150 acres. We came in a four-horse wagon, cutting our own road from White River, ten or twelve miles, taking two days.

A man, Neselrode, had a cabin and we took the cabin. I paid for my land and had $50 left. There was a cabin or two stuck around in the woods between here and White River. We came the road to Maxville, thence to Fairview. I did but little hunting, since I could get plenty of deer hams for 37½ cents a pair. I had to take a sled (I had a good team) to White River for corn, staying all night and till late next day. I bought the corn and got it ground on White River. Corn was 50 cents a bushel. I raised the first wheat in the settlement. I got a man to put in three acres for me, and when I came, in October, the wheat was up and looked nice. The crop was sixty bushels.

Flat-boats and pirogues were used to go down the river with pork, flour, apples, etc. One spring five boats went down loaded with charcoal. The boats were 'stove in' near here, and the coal was lost. The river was snaggy. One broke up in going over McKinney's mill-dam; the others were 'stove in' before that. Searl, of Deerfield, owned the coal, and he was nearly broken up by the loss. They intended to take the coal to New Orleans (about 1840).

We bought the trees for our orchard of Joab Ward, of Ridgeville, in 1840. There were 120 budded trees, and they made a good orchard. We gave $9 a hundred, and we brought them down the river in a canoe.

Mrs. Hubbard remembers seeing the soldiers at Chillicothe, guarding the British prisoners in the war of 1812. Her father had just moved from Pennsylvania, and he was poor, and her mother baked biscuits and pies, etc., for the soldiers, sometimes cooking all night to supply their wants.

A Methodist quarterly meeting was held in our house before the floor was laid. The sleepers were used as seats. Afterward the children played holding meetings, singing, praying, preaching, etc., going through the whole exercise in quite a business-like manner."

MRS. SHERMAN.

"We had a splendid spring in a 'gum' seven feet deep. We lived on the Sample Trace,' leading from Sample's mill, on White river, to Lewallyn's mill on the Mississinewa. And our spring was a noted point. We came February 20, 1837. The snow had been deep. The waters were high, and, in crossing White River we lost a bunch of keys. We never expected to see our keys again, but some one found them two or three years afterward, and they were returned to us, and we have the keys yet. My husband built a cabin on his land before we moved to it, and we lived in that cabin more than twenty years. He improved his own land somewhat, but he worked out a great deal, mowing, clearing, etc., on White river, in the older settlements. I wove, braided straw hats, etc.

Two Views of Finks Lake, Near Winchester, on the I. U. T. Co. System.

Near Source of the White River.

White River About 20 Miles From Source.

A Straight Stretch Near Lincoln School.

New Dayton church was built in 1877, but the graveyard has been there forty years or more.

The Methodists formed a society soon after we came, and meetings have been held, in dwellings, etc., from that day to this.

There was no school for some years after our settlement began. The people were poor and 'hard run,' and lived far apart.

William Wright taught once, and so did George McPherson.

Asenath Wright taught school about 1840 in a little old cabin on Reese Wright's farm, that had been a dwelling.

For fifteen years no teacher in this neighborhood could go beyond the 'Single Rule' in 'Old Talbot,'

George McPherson was an oddity in the school room. He would call 'to books,' sit down to read and let the school run itself. If anybody passed, the children would pop up and run to the window to see, and so on."

[Mrs. Sherman and her husband, Pardon Sherman, died in the winter of 1881-82, within a few weeks of one another, she going before her husband to try the realities of the unseen Spirit Land.]

SILAS DIXON, WAYNE TOWNSHIP.

"David Robison and Peter Hoover were here when I came; Ezekiel and George Gullett came when I did. The woods were alive with wolves and bears and turkeys and deer. We once killed two bears before breakfast. They came along down the furrows as we were passing back and forth. The dogs were called and they tried to catch the bears, chasing them and treeing them, and at length they were shot and killed.

We used to go to Moffat's mill near Richmond. I entered forty acres of land and bought forty more."

[Mr. Dixon died in the spring of 1881.]

ISRUM H. ENGLE.

"I followed brick-making in Cincinnati, also wood-sawing. I was unfortunate and lost all my property and had to begin anew. I sawed wood for several years in Cincinnati. One day I sawed and handled ten cords, sawing it once in two, and tossing it into a cellar. I was not especially tired, and thought nothing particular about the matter."

[Note.—I. H. E. is the best wood-sawyer and saw-sharpener I ever knew or heard of.]

"I have been a church member for more than sixty-five years, and an exhorter and class-leader for thirty-five years. The religion of Christ has been a wellspring of joy to my soul all that long time. I have had deep trials, but the Lord has given me triumph over all! I have taken every number of the Cincinnati Christian Advocate, now Vol. XLVII, No. 2,500, and before that the New York Advocate for several years. I have had abundance, and have been brought low; but my treasure is in Heaven, and my heart is there also; and soon, full soon, I shall see the King in His beauty, and He will give me the riches of the glory-land!"

[Mr. Engle has moved to Jay county to reside with one of his sons, and his aged wife died there in the spring of 1882.]

PHILIP BARGER.

"The county was all woods. A few settlers were scattered here and there, but they had only cabins with small clearings that hardly made a 'break' in the vast wilderness.

Settlers when Philip Barger came here:

Alexander Garringer, opposite Fairview, across the river; Martin Boots, opposite Fairview, across the river.

A Mr. Porter had lived where Fairview is, but he did not stay. Daniel Culver bought him out, and he had gone; Culver was living there when Barger came.

Neselrode lived where Hubbard is now: Hubbard bought Neselrode out in 1837, and lives there still.

Alexander Stevens settled in the east part of Green township in 1830.

John Bone lived below Fairview (living still).

Anthony (Wayne) McKinney came in 1837.

His son, J. B. McKinney, lives now opposite Fairview, and owns 1,400 or 1,500 acres of land.

Nathan Godwin came in 1837. His son, Thomas Godwin, lives in Fairview.

John Garringer was here in 1836, where Baldwin now lives.

Martin Smith bought Garringer out in the fall of 1836.

Bennett King lived in the northwest corner of the county. He is father of William O. King, near Deerfield. Bennett King went to Missouri and is living there.

Elijah Harbour lived west of Samuel Caylor's, fall of 1835.

The Browns lived across the river; Thomas Brown and three sons.

Jonathan Green married a Brown.

The Browns had been there two or three years when he came. They sold out to Zebulon Cantrell in 1839 and left for Iowa.

Israel Wirt entered land south of the Browns about 1836, and moved fall of 1837. He died August, 1880, eighty-four years old.

Tunis Brooks lived on Brooks' Prairie; had been there two or three years.

Samuel Caylor, 1837.

John Life came spring or summer of 1838.

Fairview was begun in 1837.

Alexander Garringer had a store across the river (at his cabin).

The first mail route was from Deerfield to Granville, Delaware county, once in two weeks, out and back, on horseback. I got the fifth number of the Winchester Patriot [H. H. Neff], and have taken the paper from that office ever since.

The first mill was built by Anthony McKinney on the river below Fairview, where Wolverton's mill now stands.

First he built a saw-mill, then he added a corn-cracker, then a grist-mill. He was putting in the dam in 1838. He started the saw-mill in 1839, the corn-mill in the fall, and the wheat-mill in 1841 or 1842.

The first smith-shop was by Martin Boots; he had a shop and was a smith himself.

Alexander Garringer had a smith shop, and Perry worked for him.

First school was winter of 1837, in a little round log cabin near the bridge, on the river bank at Fairview.

Horatio Pace was the teacher, and the school was very small.

First meeting was before I came, perhaps in that round log schoolhouse.

First meeting-house was a log house in Fairview (about 1839), Methodist Episcopal.

About 1844 a quarterly meeting was held at Thomas Hubbard's. Their house was new and had no floor, and the sleepers were for seats. Bruce was the preacher.

Methodist meetings used to be held at Nathan Godwin's.

New Light meetings were held at Martin Smith's.

Churches were afterward built at Fairview.

The schoolhouse now standing is the third, log, frame, brick.

The first brick house was either Samuel Caylor's or William Ore's.

First brick-kiln was by Thomas Hubbard; 30,000 or 40,000; for chimneys, $3 per thousand.

First reapers, J. B. McKinney and Philip Barger. Barger's started first. They were the Kirby reaper, 1855 or 1856.

First threshing machine run was by Philip Stover, of Delaware county—'falling beater,' 'chaff piler.' He threshed first for old Elijah Harbour, and then for Philip Barger.

First justice was John Garringer, 1838. They say he kept his docket on slips of paper, and stuck them in the cracks of his cabin. Nobody else could read them. After him were Jonathan Green and then Thomas Harbour.

First grave in Fairview graveyard was that of an old lady, Mrs. Shirley, mother-in-law of Reuben Eppart. Mr. Godwin laid off the graveyard.

Thomas Rowell was buried in what is now J. B. McKinney's pasture lot, but the exact place is unknown. It was before 1838.

Elijah Harbour, though a clergyman and an excellent citizen, was also a great deer hunter. He has often shot them from his own cabin door. One night three wolves chased some deer round his house through the snow, making paths in the snow as they went round and round.

The wolves were chased away, being followed down the river to Fairview. But father Harbour would never molest the deer on the Sabbath, and the deer would come on Sunday and graze quietly on the prairie as though they knew they would not be harmed on that day.

Mr. Harbour was famous also for holding meetings for worship and preaching, and many a Christian soul has been cheered by his warm and loving words and his fervent exhortations and prayers, and many a sinner convicted and converted through the blessing of the Spirit upon his earnest warnings and appeals.

His funeral was attended by a very large concourse of people, showing thus their respect and esteem for so useful a citizen and so loving and ardent a Christian."

AMOS ORCUTT, WARD.

"Deerfield was a small town with two little stores and a few log houses

The settlers were (1838) Isaac Cherry, on David Harker's place; Samuel Bryson; George Ritenour, near the old chapel on the river, west of Deerfield; Burkett Pierce, across the river, west of Deerfield.

There were doubtless others, but there are not now recollected. I was a boy thirteen years old when father came to Randolph. There were a large family of us, and we had a hard, rough time.

Father died the same year I was married, and mother was left with a family of seven or eight children, several of them being small and dependent.

The family was raised successfully, however. All but one lived to be married, and all but two are living still. Some of them are getting to be pretty well along in years."

JACOB CORL, JACKSON.

"Settlers in 1838: Daniel B. Miller, near Prospect; Abraham Harshman, near William Warren's; Reuben Harshman, Jackson township, now Union Ctiy; Jacob Harshman, Jackson township, dead; Andrew Key, Ward township, dead; James Porter, Jackson township, near Pittsburg; William Simmons, dead; James Simmons, dead; Joseph Lollar, near Saratoga, dead; Simeon Lucas, near Saratoga; Joseph Lucas, near Saratoga; Sam Emery near Jay county, very old, dead; George Chaneyvelt, one mile west of Pittsburg, dead; William Sizemore, near Middletown, nearly one hundred years old, dead.

There was an old settler, Mr. Nunamaker, at Pittsburg, eighty-four years old. He was a soldier in the war of 1812 and has received a pension for many years. He died in 1880."

JAMES KELLY, GREENSFORK.

"I came to Randolph county, Indiana, in 1842, twenty-eight years after the first settlement. Prices then were almost nothing. Wheat was 25 cents in trade, 32 cents in Cincinnati. It had to be hauled in wagons through the mud—though there were some pikes in Ohio.

Men would go with four-horse teams, hitch their horses before and behind the wagon to feed them and sleep in the wagon. I was offered pork (hogs weighing 200 pounds net) at 75 cents per 100 pounds, for money to pay taxes and I did not take it. Myself and wife went over to the Miami, helped butcher thirty-seven large hogs, cut the meat, chopped the sausage, stuffed them, rendered the lard and salted the pork. They gave us half a barrel of stuffed sausages, one large ham, one keg of lard, ribs, back-bones, etc., all we chose to carry home. We brought away meat enough to last till the next fall, all for two days' work of my wife and myself.

William Hill, father of Aaron Hill (now living south of Arba), made a pestle-mill to pound hominy. He fenced it and ran it by horse-power, getting some custom. Another man having a corn-cracker, also made a pestle-mill but did not fence it. He would let the mill run itself. In pounding, some kernels would scatter out and sheep would come and pick it up. One day when the mill was 'going it all alone,' a flock of sheep came picking around till a big buck, smelling at the log, climbed up and stuck his head into the mill-hole. 'Crack!' came the pestle and knocked the buck dead. The sheep climbed up, one by one, till twenty-seven sheep lay dead around the mill and the owner of the mill (and this was the pith of the joke) had to pay for the sheep.

Note.—I have given you the story as it was told. If any body doubts the tale I cannot help it.

Aaron Hill's father used to work oxen and sometimes ride them. One day Aaron rode an ox over to Eli Overman's on an errand. (One version says he went courting.) Said Eli, 'Did thee ride?' 'Yes,' said Aaron. Said Eli to one of the boys, 'Put up Aaron's beast.' The boy went out but came back, saying, 'I can't find any beast.' 'I thought thee said thee rode.' 'I did; I rode an ox,' piped out the bashful boy. 'Go turn it to the straw-stack,' said Eli.

[Aaron says the stories on him are 'bogus.']

James Clark was once driving to Whitewater when a big walnut struck him on the back. He was fire-mad in a second, thinking somebody had struck him. He wheeled, crying out, 'Who did that?' But 'nary man.'

A man—Mr. Cartwright—coming from North Carolina, had heard of white walnuts and that they were good to eat. He set upon a lot of buckeyes and went to eating them. Some one asked him:

'What are you eating?'

'White walnuts.

'Like them?'

'Not overly well, but think I will after awhile.'

A young fellow whom I will not name, once went went to Fort Wayne with his brother and brother-in-law with provisions for the Indian trade. The roads were terrible through the bogs and the marshes. The young fellow —only a lad, as it were, and a mild, gentle lad at that—could not get his oxen through the swamps.

His brother-in-law, a wild, rough, profane fellow, would come and whip and swear and thrash them through.

Finally at a bad crossing the wild fellow told the boy he would not swear for him any more; that he must get through himself. The lad tried, but 'no go.'

'You must swear at them.'

'I don't know how; besides, I don't wish to.'

'You must or stay here in the swamp,' was the unfeeling reply.

The boy, grown desperate, seized his gad, swung it over the oxen's head, and laying on with fearful blows, broke out into a sort of half swearing, yelling as if the Indians were after him. The oxen went through, whether by the whipping or the yelling or the swearing. But the lad was so mortified that he offered the other all his truck money ($3.00 or so), if he would not tell of it. The fellow took the money and made the promise but broke his word and told of it before he got to Spartanburg and kept the money to boot."

[Of course these tales, related by Mr. Kelly were obtained by him from early settlers since he himself came to the region at a comparatively late date, and it is no more than likely that they should have been stretched somewhat in the various tellings to which they had in the course of years been subjected.]

J. PAXSON, UNION CITY.

"At Canal Dover, Ohio, a merchant proposed that I be his clerk. I was surprised at the offer but 'took up' with it and held it till he sold out (two and a half years). At Union City I was putting up a store for Benjamin Hawkins. He bought goods at Cincinnati and came and put the bills into my hands, saying, 'When the goods come, I wish you to "open them out" and go to selling them.' I was astonished, for I was at the first of it, but I took him at his word and when the goods were 'hauled' from Greenville (for the railroad was not in running order yet), I went to work. Afterward we agreed for my wages and I stayed with him for some years. But he left and I concluded to set up for myself. I chose the boot and shoe trade. I went to Cleveland and bargained for $800 or $900 worth; I could pay only part cash. Said the dealer, 'That is a pretty large bill'; 'yes, but I need them. If you prefer, I will let you take a note I have for a farm I sold ($550.00).' 'Well, leave it.' I did so; soon sold out, so as to need a new supply, sent cash in part payment of the debt and for the new stock and soon, when that note came due, he sent it to me to collect, which I did, and paid him. From that time I could always get whatever I wished. My store was the first of the kind in the city, and, of course, it is the oldest in the town. I carry now $10,000 to $12,000 worth of goods, making large sales annually and have been mostly without a partner."

Note.—His failing health and feeble strength made him take in a partner a few years ago and finally to sell out entirely in 1880, the firm being now Gordon & McKee, and still later Gordon & Thomas.

WILLIAM STANTON, STONEY CREEK.

"We passed through Cumberland Gap; they hailed us, but allowed us to pass. At Cumberland Ford we encountered Zollicoffer's army. We asked to pass their lines. Zollicoffer said, 'No; you may get through, perhaps, but not here.' I said, 'We will not harm you; we have property north and we wish to go to it.' But still he said, 'No.' So we turned back through the Gap into Powell Valley, taking a circuit of thirty-five miles. We crossed Cumberland Mountains by terrible roads. It was a whole day's travel over a track but little used. But we met no army nor any soldiers. There were eight wagons in company; four stopped in Tennessee, turning aside to a settlement of Friends there. These stayed in Tennessee till spring. The other four wagons came directly forward through Kentucky.

We crossed the Ohio river at Madison. People welcomed us in a very friendly manner, one old blind man remarkably so. The people wished to make a dinner for us but we could not stop. We stayed an hour or two and when we started we found in each wagon nice things—pies, cakes, etc., as tokens of good will. There were about twenty persons in the company, my family having seven in number. We came through Rush county, Indiana, to see relatives there, then to West River, where we stayed two months at Absalom Dennis.' Afterward we came to Mark Diggs', arriving there in January. The main trip took us seven weeks. We got through safe and sound, thankful to find at last a quiet haven afar from storm and tempest, and a peaceful home among friends in a land of safety."

"Away from slavery." That refrain has been sung for three-quarters of a century and solemnly, mournfully marching to its steady chorus has been the ceaseless movement of the endless column, leaving the southern plains and valleys, crossing the mountain heights and threading the yawning "gaps," crossing the beautiful river and spreading itself at length like a fertilizing flood over the virgin Western plains. What wonder that, under the weakening power of this depletive process the Southern land should become enfeebled and decrepit, as though worn out with deadly infirmity. This avalanche of human beings poured in a limitless flow upon these wide-spread plains has been like the vital current giving life to the new created body politic. And what we have gained they have lost, and what a loss! Why may the process now not be reversed—that as the mighty virgin West once received her life and strength through the emigration thither of the best and worthiest of the dwellers in the Southern clime, so now the West may, now and in future years, give back to the depleted and enfeebel South, depleted by a process of impoverishment extending through several generations and enfeebled and well-nigh exhausted by a long and bloody and disastrous war—by hundreds and by thousands—the worthy and vigorous descendants of the sturdy pioneers who fled years ago from the plague and curse of the Southern land—the institution of human slavery? Slavery is gone and the emptied and impoverished South-land cries out to the wealthy and populous North and the hardy and vigorous West to send from their abundant and overflowing population to restore her waste and desolte places and to renew the prosperity of the elder, ancient time.

CHAPTER VI.

PUBLIC ROADS.

When the first white settlers entered the boundaries of what is now Randolph county, there were no roads, not even trails, except one or two made by the Indians in their travels from one village to another. The principal Indian village in eastern Indiana was at "Mont-See-Town," where the city of Muncie now stands. Another was near Camden, Jay county, and the third colony was in or near Greenville, Ohio. The trails that crossed the county led from Mont-See-Town to Greenville and from Greenville to Godfroy's, near Camden. The Mont-see-town—Greenville trail was traveled more than the other, because the Delaware Indians of Mont-See-Town and Strawtown (now Anderson) went to Greenville to receive the bounty which the government paid them after the Treaty of Peace in 1795 at that place. This trail crossed the county somewhere near Windsor, Huntsville, Springborough and South Bartonia. This, of course, is only approximate, as no definite records of this trail have been left by either record or tradition. Jesse Way, one of our earliest settlers, claimed that Springborough was south of the trail. Jere Smith claimed that the trail passed near Springborough. Each of these men were thoroughly familiar with the early times, so we see that a definite location of this trail is impossible. Relative to this subject, Tucker says: "On the third road (Winchester to Bloomingsport) is a point of some interest, Joseph Gass." Mr. Smith says: "His house stood on the north side of a brushy prairie in Section 29, Town 19, Range 14, some three miles north of Bloomingsport. He built there in early days on teh main Indian trail between Muncie (an Indian town at that time) to Greenville, where the Indian annuities were paid from Wayne's treaty in 1795 to 1815 or 1816, at which time the place of payment was changed from Greenville to Fort Wayne. The Indians traveled from Muncie (which they called Mont-see-town) up White river on the south side till they crossed Prairie creek at its mouth. They then took a 'bee line' for Greenville, which none but an Indian can do. The trail passed north of Huntsville and Spartanburg, and was about as straight as a surveyor could have made it. The trace was quite a plain one and was much traveled even by whites in those days.

"Joseph Gass was a brother of the Gass who went with Lewis and Clarke across the continent to the mouth of the Columbia river (1805-07), and who published a journal which he kept on that expedition. Joseph Gass built and settled on that trace at that point when there was no white settler from six miles west of Greenville to 'Mont-see-town,' and he lodged travelers who passed on that trace, and hence his house was a noted place to mention on the route of that road. Mr. Smith says he had often seen him and the house he built there.

"The town of Springboro was afterward laid out February 15, 1834, at the point where Joseph Gass lived, but the town was not a success, and it is now extinct.

"Mr. Gass probably settled there before he entered his land. He was there when the 'Way Company' came through from Carolina to White River, March, 1817. But the date of his land entry is August 11, 1817. How much earlier than March, 1817, Mr. Gass settled at that place we are not able to state. He seems to have been one of that enterprising class quite common in those days, whose activity took the form of trading with the Indians, which, perhaps, might have been well enough except that it often included the practice of selling strong drink to the poor redmen. That business, whether among white men or Indians, however lucrative it may be to the trader, brings evil and only evil to him who uses the fearful fluid. And as now, so of old, the traffic in strong drinks was one great source of trouble between the settlers and the savages. A sober Indian was commonly peaceable but a drunken savage was an object of fear and dread.

"However, in those days, the manufacture of intoxicating liquors and the traffic in them was not regarded as otherwise than proper and honorable." The other trail crossed the county through Jackson and Ward townships, but, like the other, left no impression upon the minds of the early settlers sufficiently to identify."

The early roads were nothing more than trails, traveled almost exclusively by men afoot or on horseback, and marked by blazes made upon the trees by scouting parties. Naturally, these parties would follow the lines of least resistance, traveling the high ground, thus avoiding swamps and crossing the streams at the easiest fords, which oftentimes necessitated irregular paths to get to these fords. These trails naturally led from one settlement to another, which would make them run in all directions, as no attention whatever was paid to section lines, or would lead from some community to a mill or to a church.

One of the first, and perhaps the first regular trail through the county, was what is known as "The Quaker Trace." This was a direct route from Richmond to Fort Wayne, and being the first established trail through the county, gained a reputation that made it the county's first thoroughfare. Of this trace, Squire Bowen says:

"The 'Quaker Trace' was begun in 1817. James Clark and twenty-five or thirty others took three wagons with provisions and a surveyor with his compass and chain and measured distances and blazed trees and marked mile trees, cutting out the road wide enough for a wagon to pass. They wound around ponds and big logs and trees, and quagmires, forded the Mississinewa and the Wabash, and so on to Fort Wayne. James Bowen went as one of the company twenty-five miles to beyond the Mississinewa crossing, till one wagon load had been used up. That team returned, and James came back with them. The route passed through Arba, Spartanburg, Bartonia, South Salem (west of) Union City, through Mount Holly, through Allensville, crossing the Mississinewa just north of that place, through North Salem, and crossing the Wabash at Jay City, Jay county, near Corydon. There was but one house between (what is now) Dan Comer's, one mile north of Spartanburg and Fort Wayne, viz., at Thompson's Prairie, eight miles north of the Wabash."

This is said to be the only thoroughfare of any consequence whatever in the county up until May, 1819. Of course, many paths led from one settler's home to another, but these were simply private paths and no more.

At an early meeting of the county commissioners in 1819, perhaps in March, (not definitely known, because no date appears in the record,) the county commissioners made the following record: "Jesse Johnson presented the petition of himself and Sundry Inhabitants of the south end of Randolph County Praying that a Public Road may be laid off Begining at the town of Winchester, thence Nearest and Best way to go Between Jesse Johnson an Paul Beard, thence Nearest and Best Way to the County line at the southwest Corner of Section 14 in Township 18 and Range 14. Ordered that Francis Frazer, James Wright and William Hockett are appointed to lay off and Mark Said Road and make Return of their Proceedings to the Board of Commissioners at their next session to be held for said County." It is certainly to be hoped that Jesse and Paul stood still the day the viewers were there to go between them. The viewers performed their duty and reported at the May term of 1819, to the county commissioners, as they make the following report: "Received the Report of Francis Frazier and William Hockett, who were appointed to Lay off and mark a Publick Road from the town of Winchester to Between Jesse Johnsons & Paul Beards, etc." This road followed in a general way the present Lynn pike, but, of course, was crooked, angling and "zigzaggy." But with all the latitude offered for judgment and discretion, the viewers failed to satisfy all those interested, as is shown by the record of the same date, as follows: "and on the Remonstrance of Albert Banta Stating that the Way the said Road is laid off and Marked through his land will be Injurious to him. Ordered that John Balanger, John William Haworth, Joshua Cox and Henry Hill are appointed to Review Said Road through the land of Albert Banta and assess the damages if Any that may be due to said Banta and the said Viewers are to meet for that Purpose on the last Saturday in June Next at the house of said Banta and make Report of their Proceedings to the Board of Commissioners at their August term Next." The viewers completed the work assigned them, and evidently did not agree with Banta concerning the damages, for in the August term we find the following entry: "Recd the Report of John Way, Joshua Cox and Henry Hill, who were appointed to Review that Publick Road laid off through Albert Bantas Land and assess the Damages, &c., Who Report that there is no damages Sustained By the said Banta." The road was established and the commissioners "Ordered that Paul Baird be supervisor of the Road laid off By Francis Frazer and William Hockett Through Greensfork Township." (Greensfork township at that time extended two miles west of where Lynn now is). This road, of course, was no exception and wound in and around hills where the path could easiest be made. It had not been used a great while until changes and alterations were asked for. But even these changes and alterations were very indefinite, but. no doubt, were made to suit the needs of the time. Just how indefinite they were is shown by the following report of the May term of 1834: 'In obedience to an order to us directed; from the commissioners Court, March term, 1834. to view and mark out an alteration in the Fort Wayne road, commencing where the said road crosses the south line of Richard Corbit; thence nearly north a Strait directeon in a few rods of his fince, thence east 18 or 20 rods to the old road through the lane to the north end of Sd lane. thence a Strait course to the prairee branch about 2 or 3 rods west of where the old road crosses Sd Branch, thence a Strait course & nearly north a few rods north a Malachi Nichols house, thence East 18 or 20 rods to the old road, intersecting said road where the said Nichols line crosses Sd. road, and we the commissioners after viewing the above named ground, believe the ground better than the ground where the old road now goes also we think it will be as convenient for the public, and as to the distance there will be but little if any difference. this 2nd May, 1834. (Signed) Isaac Wood, Jeremiah Horn, William Hill. And ordered that said road be opened a necessary width not exceeding 40 feet and made in all other respects convenient for the passage of travellers." It was straightened south of Lynn in 1849 and from Lynn, north. The last change was made on the farm now owned by Zimri Hinshaw in 1847. Evidences of the old road still exist on Mr. Hinshaw's farm, as the old house and barn on the south side of this farm were built parallel to the old road and are still standing in that position.

It will be noticed not only in the records of Randolph county, but in the state records as well, as we shall show later, that Winchester was the starting point for many roads. Settlers were entering the county very rapidly, which necessitated many new roads being formed. Great activity in that line is shown, as no less than three roads which eventually became real thoroughfares, were petitioned for in the August term, 1819. It will be noticed that upon the receipt of a petition, the commissioners appoint viewers to "lay off and mark said road and fix the time of their report to the commissioners." The second, third and fourth roads petitioned for, together with the disposition made of such petitions, will illustrate the usual form of such petitions and methods of their disposal. "Recd the Petition of sundry Inhabitants of Randolph Praying a Publick Road may be laid off leading from the town of Winchester of said County Directly West as near the Middle of Section 19-24-23, &c. as suitable Ground Can be an to the indiana Boundary with an offset of 28 rod North a few rod West of Henry H. Ways Dividing hedge, thence west on the line between said Ways and John Samples to the Boundry. Ordered that Judge John Wright, John Wright Senr, and Henry H. Way Lay off and Mark Said Road and Report to the Board of Commissioners at November term, 1819. Recd the Petition of sundry Inhabitants of Randolph County praying that a Publick Road may be laid off from the town of Winchester in said County the nearest and Best Way to go west of Joseph Guess and East of Jonathan Hoskins and on the West side of William Hocketts farm and on the best and suitabest Direction to the County line of Wayne one mile East of the thirteenth Range line. Ordered that Joseph Hockett, Jonathan Edwards and Nathaniel Kase lay off and Mark said Road and Report to the Commissioners at November term 1819. Reced the Petition of sundry Inhabitants of Randolph County Greensfork Township Praying that the Road Known by the name of the Lawrenceburg Road may be Continued from the house of Ephraim Overman to the house of William Yates and that Overseers may be appointed to lay off and mark said Road. Ordered that Ephraim Overman, Junr. and David Boivel, sen. lay off and mark said Road and Report to the Commissioners at November term 1819." The second road is what is known now as the Windsor pike from Winchester to a point north of the Lincoln school. The third road is what is known as the Bloomingsport pike, and the fourth road is the road north through Arba, as Ephraim Overman lived near Arba and William Yates lived northwest of Spartanburg on the north half of section 9, township 16, range 1.

In November, 1819, the southwest part of the county began to petition for roads as follows: "Recd the Petition of Sundry Inhabitants of Greensfork Township Praying that a Public (Road) may be laid off Beginning at the line of Wayne County where the Jacksonburg Road Intersects the same, thence by Way of William Smiths the nearest and best Way to the town of Winchester. William Blunt, William Smith and Paul W. Way are appointed to lay off and mark said Road according to Law." These roads and others later petitioned for, connected with the Jacksonburg road, so named because it lead to Jacksonburg, a small town in Wayne county. White River township was not organized until after these roads had been petitioned for, hence Greensfork township is the name used in these petitions. West River township was petitioned for during the same session of the commissioners that the fifth and sixth roads were petitioned for.

The sixth road was an irregular affair, which proved to be very unsatisfactory and was vacated in 1833, when a change was made in the Winchester and New Castle road. The seventh road, petitioned for in February, 1820, is what is known as the "Pocket Road," and was "laid off begining where the road from the town of Winchester to Jesse Johnsons &c Crosses the Congressional Township line between Township Nineteen and twenty, thence the neareist and Best Way that a Road Conveintly Can be made to the state line Where the Road from Greenville Intersects the same." The eighth road, petitioned for in February, 1820, went in a northeasterly direction, as is shown by the petitioned record, as follows: "Recd the Petition of sundry Inhabitants of Randolph praying that a Road may be laid off from the town of Winchester and to Run thence to James Masseys and to intersect near fort recovery With the St. maries Road the nearest and best Way. Ordered that Richard Beason, James Wright and James Massey Lay off and Mark said Road and Report to May term, 1820." James Massey lived in what is now Ward township, W. S. W. 11, 21, 14. This road was afterward abandoned.

The ninth road was petitioned for in May, 1820, and was to run from Sample's mill, located on the northwest quarter of section 22, township 20, range 13, south to Huntsville. The tenth road was petitioned for in May, 1820, and was to run from Winchester to John Foster's. Mr. Foster lived on the Griffis farm, on section 25, township 17, range 1, Wayne township. This land was entered in 1817 by Mr. Chenoweth. About this time the state had begun a policy of constructing thoroughfares throughout the entire state. Canals were built in many parts of the state, but none touched Randolph county. This part of the state was provided for in two ways; by the opening and building of public highways and by the maintaining of open waterways. The first road provided for by state legislation was what is now known as the Bloomingsport pike. This road was provided for on the 22d of January, 1820, and was to run from Lawrenceburg, on the Ohio, to Brookville, Franklin county, Connersville, Fayette county, Waterloo, Wayne county, Centerville, Wayne county, to Winchester. Three commissioners, of whom John Wright, of Randolph county, was one, were appointed to oversee the construction of the road. It was to be built by the nearest and best way and not to be over seventy feet wide. The extreme width allowed for was the importance that the state attached to this road as a thoroughfare. In fact, this was to be the principal road of eastern Indiana, and connected the civilization along the Ohio river to that of the northern part of the state, namely: Lawrenceburg to Fort Wayne. This road, however, was never built as a state road through Randolph county, although the state provided later on for its construction from Winchester to Fort Wayne, and named Charles Conway as the commissioner. On December 31, 1821, a law was approved providing for an east and west road known as the Winchester and Indianapolis state road. This law provided "that a road from the Ohio line dividing this state from Ohio from a direction from Greenville, in said state, to Winchester, to intersect the Richmond road to a point not exceeding twenty miles from Indianapolis, in length sixty miles, be, and the same is hereby established and that the sum of $2,672.56 be, and the same is hereby appropriated to the opening of the same, and that Joshua Foster, John Way and Ishem Puckett, of Randolph county, be, and they are hereby appointed commissioners on said road." These commissioners were further given the right to exercise their discretion in the location and building of all bridges. Mr. Puckett failed to serve as commissioner and Jesse Moorman was appointed in his place. These men made their report January 10, 1823. Of this road and its making, Mr. Jere Smith says:

"In May, 1820, viewers were appointed to mark out a road from Winchester to the state line, near Foster's (Griffis farm). The road was reported and established in August, 1820. John Coates was made supervisor from Winchester to the ford of White river, and Amos Peacock from White river to the state line. In 1822 or 1823 the Legislature authorized the laying of a state road from the state line near Foster's, through Winchester to Indianapolis. Joshua Foster, John Sample and John Way were appointed commissioners to lay the road. They took Paul W. Way for their surveyor, and started from Foster's to run to Winchester. But they ran too much south, so they made a 'bend' to the north before reaching White river. But being still too far south they veered again northward, west of George Hyatt's, and came in at the end of Broad (now Washington) street and ran on that street through Winchester. Then diverging to the south till they got opposite (west of) the middle of the public square in Winchester, they struck west on the route of the present state road (pike now) to the west side of the county. Thence down White river (south side) to Old Town (Indian town) six miles above Muncie, thence down the river by Anderson, Strawtown, etc., to Indianapolis. The county road from the state line west to Winchester was merged in this state road."

Other interesting stories are told concerning this road. It is said that when the viewers were "marking and laying out the road," the pioneer viewer, the one who went ahead to direct the blazers, carried a cowbell, which he would ring when he had decided on a certain route. The blazers would then travel toward the sound, blazing the trees as they went. It is said that the variance in direction, of which Mr. Smith speaks, was due to the fact that the blazers failed to locate the cowbell and that the bend in this road just out of Winchester is the result of such error. But this story, like many others, has to be taken with a grain of salt.

This state road was eventually built but was cared for by the county. Joshua Foster served on this board until his removal from the county in 1826, which made it necessary to appoint a new commissioner. This was done during the May term by the board of Justices, who "proceeded to Elect a commissioner to fill said vacancy, whereupon counting Ballots it appeared that John Nelson is duly Elected State road commissioner as aforesaid." Mr. Nelson served only two years, when his successor, John Sample, was elected. (July term, 1828.) It will be seen from the above that Mr. Smith's statement is not in accordance with the records, as the form of the report of the viewers and the disposition of the report by the commissioners, is shown by the following record of the report on road No. 2. "John Wright Senr. John Wright and Henry H. Way, who were appointed to lay off and mark a Public Road from the town of Winchester west to the Indian Boundry line Report that they performed that Duty according to order. John Wright senr. is hereby appointed Supervisor of said Road and all the hands in Whiteriver Township south of Whiteriver and West shugar Creek includeing David Wright and David Stout Except Ezekiel Williams Do Work on Said Road." This road gave a great deal of trouble, especially west of Winchester, due to the swampy conditions of the ground. It is said that at one time there was no less than one mile of continuous causeway of corduroy in this road. John Wright, the first supervisor, paid but very little attention to the building of this road, but, perhaps, he paid all the attention that could be paid by anyone at that time. That he did something, is shown by the following report: "Recd. the Report of John Wright, supervisor, Stateing that he had performed his duty and that all the hands had performed their service according to Law Except William Haworth son of George who is Delinquent four days." The commissioners evidently did not intend that Mr. Haworth should escape, because they immediately "Ordered that William Haworth son of George be supervisor in the Place of John Wright and that the hands south of said Road and west of Shugar Creek to the 13 Range line thence north with said Range line of Whiteriver Township thence west to the Boundry thence south with the Boundry line to Eight mile Creek thence up said Creek to the line of Whiteriver Township line thence a Direct line to where said Road Crosses the 13th Range line do work on said Road and order Issued." Just how long Haworth served can not be known, as the county records from February, 1821, to November, 1825, are lost, but Wright was reappointed. Later, when the road had been extended by the state, Littleberry Diggs was appointed supervisor in the place of John Wright on the state road "from the town of Winchester west to the 14 Mile Stake." This stake was located about two miles west of Winchester. The road had in the meantime been divided into sections of a certain number of miles each indicated by mile stakes. This road, like all the early roads, has been changed and straightened many times. The first change was petitioned for on Tuesday, November 14, 1820, the record of which is:—"Recd. the petition of Sundry Inhabitants of Whiteriver Township praying that from the Town of Winchester west may be so altered as to tern North between Henry Way and John Sample Eighteen poles Thence west by said Samples house to the Boundry line of the twelve mile Purchase Which is Granted and Paul W. Way, John Sample and Robinson McIntire appointed to lay off and mark said Road and Report to February term, 1821, and Order Issued." This board of viewers reported as instructed, the record of which is made in the February term of 1821, as follows: "Recd. the Report of Paul W. Way and Others who Were appointed to lay off and mark the Road from the house of Henry Way through the lane Bearing Eighteen poles North thence west by the way of John Samples to the Boundry line of the twelve mile Purchase and Ordered that the Supervisor work on said Road the way that it was last laid off." Strange to say, one of the latest, if not the last, change in this road, was made at the same place where the first change was made. This change is where the road angled suddenly to the northwest in the middle of section 22, township 20, range 13, east, where the house of Elmer Franklin now stands. The first change reported by Mr. Way, caused the road to leave the present road at a point near the east line of section 22, where the road runs south. From this point it angled in an almost direct line to the turn just north of the middle of the section. The last change was made about 1852. This was one of the most traveled roads of the county, because of the western emigration, and it is said that the travel on it at times, almost equals that of the National road.

The eleventh road, petitioned for in August, 1820, was "laid off Beginning at the south End of the main Street West of the Public Square in the town of Winchester thence along said street and in a Direction towards Fort Wayne to the North Boundry of the twelve mile Purchase." This road was more commonly called the Winchester and Ridgeville road or by some, the Winchester and Addington's Mill road. This road followed the Deerfield pike to the crest of the hill north of White river, thence in a northwesterly directon to Ridgeville. One small section of this road still exists near Stone Station, and another section, which was a continuation of this road, exists northwest of Ridgeville. Sample's Mill was the principal objective point of travel at this time. The tenth road passed it, running east and west, the ninth road ran south, and the next, or twelfth road, petitioned for in May, 1825, was to run from Sample's mill to Lewallyn's mill, which was at Ridgeville.

The twelfth road, petitioned for in May, 1825, was from the southeast corner of section 35, township 16, range 1 west, to Obadiah Small's. The point of beginning was on the county line, two miles east of Arba and Obediah Small owned the land where Spartanburg now stands. This road is thought to be the one that used to run from Bethel, Wayne county, by "pinhook," Charles Crist's and Jeremiah Middleton's to Spartanburg. This road is now abandoned. No doubt, many roads had been petitioned for and established, the records of which are contained in the book that has been lost.

We note that in the May term, 1826, "Nathan Hockett is appointed Supervisor on Hockett's road from the line of Wayne County to Joseph Gass old place and also on the Road that passes by cherry grove meeting house that lies in Westriver Township." "Benjamin Luallen is appointed Supervisor on Luallens road from the line Dividing Township Whiteriver and Ward and all the hands in Luallens Settlement including Kizers Settlement Except those attached to oldhams District do work on said road."

The next road, which we shall call the fourteenth, proved to be a road of a great deal of importance. Just when it was petitioned for is not known, but in May, 1826, the following record is made: "Recd. the Report of William Massey, Daniel B. Miller & John Odle, who were appointed to view and mark a public road from the State line in a Direction from Greenville in the State of Ohio to Luallens mill on Missessinewa Stating that they had performed that service whereupon William Odle is appointed Supervisor on said road from Luallens Mill to William Masseys Creek and ordered that all the hands in Ward Township from Burkett Peirces to the East and west line of the School Section in Township 21 do work on said road. Daniel B. Miller is appointed Supervisor on the Road from Luallens mill towards Greenville from William Masseys creek to the State line and that all the hands in Ward Township East of the School Section in Township 21 do work on said Road." Of this road, Mr. Jere Smith says:

"September, 1825, a road was reported beginning at the Greenville road northwest from Greenville (Connor's old trace to his trading post) by Daniel B. Miller's to Lewallyn's mill. This was not opened and worked till 1832. February 2, 1832, the Legislature passed an act appointing Daniel B. Miller commissioner to lay out a state road from the state line (same point as the thirteenth road) to Parson's mill, thence to Lewallyn's mill, thence to intersect the Miamisport road, near Sanders', in Delaware county. Judge Miller appointed me surveyor, and in August or September, 1832, we began the survey.

"We started where Connor's trace crossed the state line, a little north of Union City, went nearly straight to the east side of Deerfield, thence to Parsons' mill, half mile below Deerfield, thence to Lewallyn's mill, near Ridgeville, thence onward beyond Emmettsville, keeping in a straight line to Sanders' in Delaware county, passing north of Fairview. The county road from the state line to Lewallyn's mill was merged in this state road. The road remains substantially as we laid it out, having on it Middletown, Deerfield, Ridgeville and Emmettsville."

This road crossed the Mississinewa river near the Reitenour Cemetery, at the cabin of Burkett Pierce, going from there directly where Ridgeville now is.

The next road of record is in May, 1826, and is certainly a very peculiar record, and is as follows: "Recd. the petition of Sundry inhabitants of this county praying that a Public road may be laid off beginning at Hocketts road about ¾ of a mile North of Guesses, thence leading Down Sugar creek by the Likinses and D. Heastons, thence to the widow Pucketts lane by Dunkirk meeting house and on to the Southwest corner of Wm. Ways field, thence along the west side of said field to intersect the State road in meridian Street in the Town of Varnon. John Likins, David Heaston & Tarlton Moorman are appointed to view and mark said road and Report to July term, 1826."

The next road of record is in May, 1827, and ran from Dalton, Wayne county, through Losantville to Windsor.

Our sympathies are certainly with Curtis Clenney, Thomas Hester and William Peacock, whose duty it became to "lay out and mark" the following road in November, 1827: "Received the petition of sundry inhabitants of Randolph County praying that a Public road may be laid out beginning at the road leading from Richmond to Winchester at the line between Obadiah Harris and John Moorman, thence the nearest and best way to William Connors, thence the nearest and best way to Hezekiah Hocketts, thence through Samuel Smiths lane, thence to the end of Thomas Phillips lane, thence to the Meeting house near William Hunts."

For some reason the viewers did not report at the January term, 1828, as instructed, but made their report in the May term of said year, and Thomas Phillips was appointed supervisor on the road through White River township. This road was extended in September, 1828, as is shown by following record, November, 1828: "Jonah Heaton, Bazaleel Hunt and David Vestal, who were appointed to view and mark a public road from the meeting house near William Hunt the nearest and best way so as to pass some where near Joseph Rooks then the nearest and best way to the line dividing Randolph and Delaware counties in a direction towards Moncey town, now verbally report that they have performed that servise it is therefore ordered that the same be cut out as a public road or highway."

In January, 1830, another characteristic petition was received as follows: "Received the petition of Sundry citizens of Randolph county praying that a public Road may be laid out beginning at the west end of Hezekiah Hocketts lane the nearest and best way to the Wayne line at the Southeast corner of Martindales dedning. Which is granted, and Isaiah Rodgers, James Smith and David Frazier are appointed to view and mark said road and Report to this Board at March term 1830."

In November, 1830, the commissioners "Received the petition of Elijah Arnold and others praying for a public road to be laid off beginning at the North end of Wm. Smiths lane the nearest and best way to Jonathan Cleavengers on Rooks old place." Jeremiah Smith, Joshua Beer and Elijah Arnold were appointed to view and mark said road.

In March, 1831, John Wilson and others petitioned for a road "beginning at the Richmond road at or near John Moorman Sr. S. E. corner the nearest and best way to Arby meeting house, thence the nearest & best way to the State of Ohio line which is granted."

In May, 1831, Samuel Jackson, William Davidson and William Peacock were appointed to view and mark a road, the record of which is as follows: "Received the petition of Sundry citizens of Randolph county praying that a public road may be laid out Beginning at the South west corner of Samuel Smiths fence, thence the nearest best way to crossway south of Samuel Jacksons, thence the nearest and best way to the new road at the north end of William Smiths lane."

In September, 1831, a cartway was petitioned for, from Winchester across the ford of White river to Sample's mill. The distinction between a cartway and a road seems to be a difference in width, a cartway being what is ordinarily called a lane. Many roads of local importance only were petitioned for at each session of the legislature.

In January, 1832, another very interesting road record was made, as follows: "This day the petition of William Peacock and others was publickly read And John Boroughs, Jesse Johnson and David Moore are appointed to view and mark a publick road beginning at the west end of Hezekiah Hocketts lane from thence on the open line south of Samuel Smith's fence until it intersects the road leading from Johnson's mill to Sample's mill from thence the nearest and best way through Joseph Hollingsworth's lane, from thence the nearest and best way until it intersects the road leading from Economy to Winchester at or near Jackson's perarie and report to the next term of this board."

There seems to have been no definite records made of the location of roads by any survey until 1832. During that year Jere Smith was at that time surveyor, and recorded his "field" notes of that part of the state road, leading from Winchester to New Castle, which lies in Randolph county, Indiana. This was a state road. In October of the same year he filed his "field" notes of that part of the state road leading from Richmond to Fort Wayne, which lies in Randolph county, and the territory attached to it.

It will be interesting to note that this road went "to the township line between township 25 and 26 north, near the one-half mile stake on the south side of section 32 of township 26, range 14, it being the north line of the territory attached to Randolph county." This township line passes through the present town of Berne, and the one-half mile stake referred to is just east of that town.

On November 16, 1832. Mr. Smith filed his "field" notes of that part of the state road, leading from the Ohio state line to Saunders', which lies in Randolph county and the territory attached to it. This is the road of which Mr. Smith speaks, as running "from the state line to Parson's mill, thence to Lewallyn's mill, thence to intersect the Miamisport road near Saunders' in Delaware County." From that time on all state roads were surveyed and the surveys made a matter of record.

The early roads were petitioned for, largely to meet local conditions. Afterward, many of these same roads were taken up by the state and made state roads. For example, the Winchester and Addington's Mill road, petitioned for in 1820, was taken up by the state in 1839, and was known as the "State Road," from Winchester, Randolph county, via Ridgeville, Randolph county, Mt. Pleasant and Camden, in Jay county, to Bluffton, the county seat of Wells county. The road one mile west of Farmland was taken up by the state in 1840, and was known as the Hagerstown and Camden road. The Jesse Johnson-Paul Beard road became a part of the Richmond and Fort Wayne road. Many roads that were of importance have since been abandoned, because of the building of other roads. The Steubenville and Winchester road, which angled from Steubenville to Maxville, has long since disappeared, as has another road in the same part of the county, known as the Rockingham road, which leads from Rockingham, Green township, to Winchester, merging into the Steubenville and Winchester road. The road granted in 1840, running "to Jericho meeting house, from thence to the most approved route to White River meeting house," has long since disappeared, as has also the road approved in February, 1841, known as the road joining the Cherry Grove meeting house, Byum meeting house and Arba meeting house, "commencing on the Williamsburg and Winchester road, in Section 3, thence East by Cherry Grove meeting house on the line dividing the lands of Nathan Thornburgh and Elijah Hinshaw, thence on same course between Stilwell and Reece, thence the same course between Reece and Way to the corner thence angling south 30 rods across William & Obed Beards land to the West line a corner between Paul Beard senr. and Jesse Johnson, thence with their line East to the road thence south to Beards saw mill, thence the line between Paul Beard Jr. and Obed Beard east to near the Branch, thence up the Branch to the east fence, thence on a marked line on North side of Lynn Meeting house to the line Between Silas Johnson, Isaac Pearson, thence with said line east to David McCrackins' line until near the school house, thence North of said school house a few rods until it intersects the line between Johnson and Farmer, thence East with said lines to the line between Moody and Willis C. Willmore, thence same direction until it strikes the line Between Odle and Calfer, thence due East until it intersects the Boundry at a corner Between Overman and Semans as Specified in said order, thence south and west, the boundary to a point opposite John W. Thomas, thence nearly east a marked line to the mouth of said Thomas' lane, thence on same course across the creek, thence on nearly the neighborhood road a marked line to a lane Between the Lands of Jeremiah Horn and Cammack's heirs, thence East to where it intersects the Fort Wayne road near Arba Meeting house."

The winding path south from Huntsville has become the Economy and Huntsville road, while the road from Huntsville through Unionsport, Maxville and Fairview into Jay county, is only a matter of history. Many other roads and petitions for the same might be mentioned, but we have given sufficiently to show the nature of our early roads. These petitions seem queer and unusual, but they served their purpose and what more could be asked? The country was new, and roads of any consequence were impossible. Trails were all that was necessary, because travel was almost wholly by foot or horseback. When wagons were used, the loads were light, which was necessary if they traveled at all, a man putting his small grist upon the "hounds" and making his way to the nearest mill as best he could.

Of these roads, Tucker says:

"These roads, laid out, as we have said, by public authority, were opened and worked to some extent, yet for a long time most of them were but poor indeed. The trees were cut away somewhat, a few bridges were made, and log ways were built in some places, yet for the most part they were horrid enough. David Lasley relates in his 'reminiscences' how he (with another man) built three-quarters of a mile of 'log-way' on the road west of Winchester. As late as 1859 there was one and a quarter miles of log-way, nearly in one 'string,' north between Winchester and Deerfield. Often logs a foot or eighteen inches through would be laid down and sometimes absolutely nothing on them, and the wagon had to go 'bumping' across that continuous log-heap. Each new road would be divided into districts, an overseer appointed, and 'hands' given him for his 'gang' to open and work the highway."

Travel being heavy, the location of towns and distances from one to another being practically unknown, the Legislature as early as 1817, enacted a law requiring that road supervisors should place "at the forks of every public road or highway, directing the way and mentioning the most remarkable places on each road." Knowing the frailties of man, this law carried with it a penalty of a ten dollar fine for anyone convicted of destroying or altering these sign boards in any way. This law has never been repealed, but the sign board has long since ceased to exist. At the present time (1914), there is but one set of these boards left in place in the county, and these are at the site of the old town of Randolph, long since out of existence. These boards are one-half mile west of Bartonia, inscribed, "To Winchester, 7 miles, to State line, 2½ miles."

The author of this article recently had occasion to take a photograph of these sign boards, and while taking them was forcibly reminded of the progress made in community life since these boards were placed in position, years and years ago. Instead of "muddy roads," with their corduroy and almost bottomless mud holes, traveled over by the conestoga wagons, pulled by two six yoke of oxen, the traveler today travels a macadamized road in the most modern vehicles. While taking the picture a school boy rode to the crossing on a bicycle, thus reminding one of the new in that mode of travel, to deposit a letter in a free rural mail delivery box, thus calling attention to the modern means of communication by mail, then rode on to a modern, consolidated school, equipped with all modern appliances, maintaining a commission course, thereby reminding one of the old-time schools in its comparison with the new. Before the picture could be taken it was necessary to wait for the settlement of dust from a passing automobile, traveling, perhaps, fifty miles per hour. Only one thing was necessary to make the picture complete, and that would have been the shadow of a "Limited" aeroplane.

When the state was young it was thought that the rivers would be the great means of transportation, and to that end the Mississinewa and west fork of White river were declared navigable streams, and were put in the care of supervisors for that purpose. We do not know how far the west fork of White river was considered navigable, but it was as far up the river as Sample's mill. In the May term, 1826, the following entries were made: "John Samples is appointed Supervisor on the west fork of Whiteriver from said Samples mill to the mouth of caben creek. John G. Deeds is appointed Supervisor on the west fork of whiteriver from the mouth of Cabin creek to monsey town on said river." One year from that time, May 8, 1827, we find that the purpose of appointing supervisors for these districts was to clear the rivers of snags, cut out the shallow places and otherwise make the rivers so that flat-boats might be taken down them, especially in the spring. We do not know that this was ever done on White river, at least we have never heard any old settler ever speak of White river as being navigable. Yet, in May, 1827, the river was no doubt worked and certain hands were ordered out for that purpose, as is shown by the following: "Henry T. Sample is appointed Supervisor on Whiteriver from John Sample's mill to the mouth of Stoney creek and ordered that all the hands opposite said district and within 2 miles of said river do work thereon under the direction of said Sample." We have failed to find in the records any report of these supervisors on White river. The Mississinewa, however, was declared by law to be navigable, as far as the section line between range 14 and 15 east, which is the line dividing Ward and Jackson townships. There is no doubt about the Mississinewa having been "worked" and used as a navigable stream. We find that in May, 1835, it was "Ordered that Alexander Garringer, Supervisor in Green Township, work all the hands that live in his district and within one mile of Mississinewa river one day of their time on said River. Ordered that Jehu McPherson, Supervisor, work all the hands that live in his district within one mile of Mississinewa and west of Lawellins mill one day of their time on said River." The Mississinewa was used for transportation purposes as far up the river as Deerfield, but no further than that, as we have been able to learn, as is shown by the reminiscences of Mr. Edger, spoken of elsewhere. No mention is made of any appointments of supervisors to work the rivers after this time, it being seen, of course, that such was useless.

As the county became more thickly settled and commercial interests were correspondingly enlarged and complicated, more attention was paid to the subject of roads. It is said that the civilization of any nation can be determined by its roads. This saying is certainly true of the middle West.

It is only a step from the blazed trail to the path, from the path to the lane, the lane to the cartway, the cartway to the open highway, through its various steps of mud road, graded road, gravel road, crushed stone and macadam.

A problem through the forties and fifties was one of straightening old roads or establishing new ones upon section lines. The old roads had emanated from certain centers and the problem of establishing new ones in and around these centers became a very complex one. Among these centers were Rockinghams, in the eastern part of Green township; Robinson McIntire's farm, which is at Maxville, Huntsville, West River township, Cherry Grove, in Washington township, Arba, in Greensfork township, Cox's Mill, in White River township, John Massacs, Ward township, Lewallyn's Mill, Franklin township, and Marien's Mill and Georgetown, in Stoney Creek township, but this problem has been successfully solved, until today there are very few roads that do not follow section lines.

The establishing of roads has always been directly or indirectly in the hands of the county commissioners and must, of necessity, depend upon their judgment. It was seldom that a petition for a road was rejected, but one exception to this occurred the third of May, 1838. On that day petition for five roads were received, five of which were rejected, all of which were afterwards established. The commissioners, John Coats, Abraham Adamson and George A. G. McNees, were evidently not feeling very well that day.

As time went on it became evident to all people that the success of the country depended upon the condition of its roads. It further became evident that roads could not be built without money and it was further shown that laws must be enacted whereby the progressive few could compel the backward majority to build good roads. Out of this grew the gravel road law and the "three-mile road law." Another great movement in the road management is what is known as the toll road. These were a system of roads built by companies organized for that purpose for the use of which toll must be paid. These turnpike and plank road companies were organized, practically, all over the county in about 1856. Among them were the Union City and Spartanburg; Morristown and Fairview; Williamsburg and Bloomingsport; Winchester and State Line; Winchester and Bundy's Mill; Winchester and Jay County Line; Lynn and Winchester; Bloomingsport and Winchester; Salem and Jericho; Bloomingsport and Economy; Mt. Holly and Allensville, and Huntsville and Boundary. This is only a partial list.

It was soon learned by the people, however, that public roads should be built and maintained at public expense and that they should be open to any and all who cared to drive over them. Consequently, these roads were either voluntarily abandoned and the management assumed by the county or were sold to the various townships or the county. The last of these turnpikes disappeared in the early nineties.

Randolph county today has among the best roads of any county in the state.

In spite of the slipshod methods by which the roads have been handled there is no source of greater mismanagement of any public affairs than that of the roads. More money has been spent injudiciously and more work done without intelligent guidance and more time squandered upon the public roads than upon any other matter of public utility. This fact is recognized by everyone who gives the question any study. The problem of county management today is the management of its roads.

A solution of this has been attempted in the passing of a law whereby the county commissioners appointed a county superintendent of roads, who appoints sub-superintendents, who, with the county superintendent of roads, becomes responsible for the care and management of all county public highways.

In January, 1814, the county commissioners appointed Robert Jellison county superintendent of roads. Mr. Jellison proceeded immediately to the appointment of his various able superintendents and the work or organization was begun immediately. As to what the ultimate result of this management will be is of course problematical, but it must be said that the plan bids fair to be the best ever devised. The success of this plan, however, will depend largely upon the ability of the men appointed as various superintendents. If ability, knowledge and skill is to be the determining factor, the roads will be benefited by it.

At the present time Mr. Jellison has under his charge the following roads: Spence, No. 64, 6,700 feet stone; Fairview and Ridgeville, No. 8, 47,520 feet gravel; Camel, No. 148, 6,100 feet gravel; Woods, No. 11, 44,880 feet gravel; Kitselman, No. 25, 31,680 feet gravel; Stone Staton and Olive Branch, No. 21, 34,320 feet gravel; Gray, No. 57, 7,870 feet stone; Ridgeville and Farmland, No. 26, 31,680 feet gravel; Huber, No. 87, 14,800 feet stone; Harker, No. 10, 36,900 feet gravel; Sipe, No. 1, 30,360 feet gravel; Cummings, No. 135, 31,600 feet stone; Hoover, No. 19, 15,840 feet gravel; Warren, No. 131, 15,820 feet stone; Gettinger, No. 58, 5,480 feet stone; Saratoga and Stone Station, No. 28, 24,360 feet gravel; Hinkle, No. 14, 33,000 feet gravel; Stephens, No. 133, 10,430 feet gravel; Olive Branch, No. 144, 5,280 feet gravel; Armstrong, No. 112, 6,100 feet stone; Bosworth, No. 29, 39,600 feet gravel; Winchester and Deerfield, No. 2, 47,520 feet gravel; Shierling, No. 97, 13,050 geet stone; Schlecty, No. 87, 10,644 feet stone; Warren & Weimer, No. 27, 21,120 feet gravel; Harshman, No. 86, 15,836 feet stone; Hoover and Pittsburg, No. 18, 10,560 feet gravel; Rickert, No. 17, 26,400 feet gravel; Mundhank, No. 146, 12,330 feet stone; Devor, No. 34, 15,840 feet gravel; Salem and Union City, No. 5, 39,600 feet gravel; Hinchy, No. 15, 23,760 feet gravel; State Line North, No. 16, 39,960 feet gravel; Van Pelt, No. 23, 35,640 feet gravel; Manor, No. 125, 10,560 feet stone; Farmland and Shiloh, No. 24, 15,840 feet gravel; McGuire, No. 63, 11,250 feet stone; Windsor and Winchester, No. 3, 72,600 feet gravel; Goodrich, No. 143, 9,200 feet stone; Sanders, No. 96, 11,700 feet stone; Adams, No. 72, 16,580 feet stone; Murray Pike, No. 22, 29,040 feet gravel; Pogue, No. 93, 13,098 feet gravel; Heaston, No. 85, 11,620 feet stone; Romock, No. 95, 3,360 feet stone; Fitzmaurice, No. 82, 5,260 feet stone; Goodrich, No. 83, 2,288 feet stone; Burke, No. 77, 10,171 feet stone; Favorite, No. 81, 13,188 feet stone; Harris, No. 122, 13,091 feet stone; Hendrickson, No. 84, 15,760 feet stone; Bousman, No. 116, 14,063 feet stone; Winchester and Union City, No. 6, 50,160 feet gravel; Fraze, No. 66, 10,769 feet stone; Pierce, No. 100, 15,815 feet stone; Mangas, No. 90, 14,523 feet stone; Baird, No. 73, 15,820 feet stone; Cox, No. 80, 7,290 feet stone; Thompson, No. 111, 11,417 feet stone; Windsor S., No. 41, 19,800 feet gravel; Parker and Losantville, No. 40, 44,680 feet gravel; Cabin Creek and Bronson, No. 42, 34,320 feet gravel; Gilmore, No. 44, 9,240 feet gravel; Farmland and Modoc, No. 39, 66,000 feet gravel; Vanlandingham, No. 31, 11,880 feet gravel; Maxville and Unionsport, No. 43, 19,800 feet gravel; Moorman, No. 124, 10,890 feet stone; Lasley, No. 144, 12,320 feet stone; Buena Vista, No. 30, 13,184 feet gravel; Reinard, No. 126, 5,296 feet stone; Baldwin, No. 65, 13,200 feet stone; Beeson, No. 145, 14,520 feet stone; Bunda Pike, No. 32, 18,480 feet gravel; Clements, No. 103, 13,391 feet stone; Brooks, No. 75, 12,000 feet stone; Lynn and Winchester pike, No. 20, 46,200 feet gravel; Brown and Benson, No. 101, 5,333 feet stone; Butts, No. 33, 14,540 feet gravel; Moore, No. 91, 14,633 feet stone; Green, No. 120, 8,220 feet stone; Swank, No. 134, 21,696 feet stone; Chenoweth, No. 53, 13,200 feet stone; Thornburg, No. 110, 14,880 feet stone; Shockley, No.

109, 11,984 feet stone; Rowe, No. 94, 15,000 feet stone; Bickle, No. 78, 15,732 feet stone; Union City and White River, No. 12, 18,515 feet gravel; H. Bowman, No. 115, 10,919 feet stone; State Line S., No. 13, 31,680 feet gravel; Foutz, No. 105, 24,879 feet stone; Lumpkins, No. 62, 10,715 feet gravel; Brewer, No. 102, 15,735 feet gravel; Medsker, No. 45, 15,840 feet gravel; Cougil, No. 47, 9,240 feet gravel; Farquhar, No. 67, 11,800 feet gravel; Macy, No. 141, 9,240 feet gravel; Keever, No. 70, 10,560 feet gravel; Botkin, No. 140, 15,840 feet gravel; Sheppard, No. 99, 13,100 feet stone; Brosey, No. 74, 14,620 feet stone; Cady, No. 139, 11,880 feet gravel; Marshall, No. 142, 9,240 feet stone; Morrison, No. 108, 6,625 feet stone; Huntsville and Modoc, No. 46, 18,480 feet gravel; Adamson, No. 114, 13,221 feet stone; Jarott, No. 138, 39,040 feet gravel; Cox, No. 104, 10,621 feet gravel; Glover, No. 68, 12,156 feet gravel; Mills, No. 88, 12,100 feet stone; Hutchens, No. 61, 15,995 feet gravel; R. Bowen, No. 50, 12,320 feet gravel; Buckley, No. 37, 19,800 feet gravel; Jackson Pike, No. 9, 63,360 feet gravel; Burel, No. 51, 13,200 feet gravel.

Another great factor in the public highway question of this county has been its bridges. Formerly the streams were crossed at some suitable place called "fords," but the traveling public has long since demanded public bridges. Randolph county, having so many streams, makes the building of its bridges a very important one. Formerly all bridges were built of wood and the county had several "covered bridges" or bridges that were enclosed by roof and siding.

These bridges served their purpose well, but at this time, 1914, only two of any consequence are standing. These are the bridge southwest of Farmland across White river, and at the Steubenville crossing of the Mississinewa. These bridges were built in 1883 and are still in a splendid state of preservation.

The wooden bridges have given way to the steel structure, which in time must give way to those built of cement.

Among the important bridges of the county are those crossing the Mississinewa at Fairview, Emmettsville, Ridgeville, Ritenours, Deerfield, Shakerag and at each section line east to the state line. White river is crossed at Windsor, Dick's, Farmland, Maxville, Moormans, Harpers, Winchester and at each place where it is crossed by a public road. Stoney creek has two large bridges near Windsor and smaller ones further up stream. Cabin creek is spanned by three large bridges. Bridges of lesser size are to be found over West river and Nolan's Fork, Greenville creek, Little Mississinewa and various other streams. The smaller bridges are practically all built out of concrete and the wooden floors of the steel bridges are being replaced by reinforced concrete.

Bridges of modern times are of such stability that it is not necessary to slacken speed while crossing them. Formerly this was necessary, as early as 1868, when it was a fineable offense to cross a bridge "faster than a walk," and all bridges had fastened on them somewhere in public view the statement: "$5.00 fine for traveling over this bridge faster than a walk."

Notes from the Commissioners record:

The court house was begun December 6, 1818 and finished June 6, 1820. Second court house was built in 1826.

One hundred and fifty-eight acres of land was donated for county purposes. Paul W Way made first survey.

January 3, 1826, the commissioners made the following entry:

"Ordered that the county treasurer pay Paul Way, county agent, the sum of thirty-six dollars and twenty-five cents for running off 5 surveys at 3.00	$15.00 for laying off 28 lots in the town of Winchester	7.75

for plat of the same	2.25
for advertising the sale of lots	1.00 for 2 days attending said sale	2.00 for writing 23 deeds to close the late sale at 25 cents each	5.75
for writing 2 deeds for donation, 50	1.00 for 2¼ gallons whiskey give at the sale	1.00
Return of sale	.50
Total	$36.25

In the year 1825."

We suppose that whiskey helped sell the lots. Lot sales were ordered when the treasury became low, which was often.

Joseph Crown rented a room in the court house in 1829 to work at his trade.

In 1832 Elias Kizer was ordered to repair the stray pen and the court house.

The first stove was bought for the jail in 1837.

Paul Way was ordered to sell to the lowest bidder the erection of a stray pen in Winchester. "Ordered that Paul W Way as agent sell to the lowest bidder the erection of an estray pen in Winchester form as agreed on by himself and the board of commissioners, said estray pen to be completed against the first Monday in May next." We do not know what it cost to build it but it was sold in 1851 to Mr. Way for $4.00.

Nathan Garrett was ordered to secure the safety of the court house in 1837.

First county attorney was Smith Elkins, appointed in 1838.

The county agent was ordered in November, 1839 to: "Repair the upper story of the county jail by lining it with two inch oak plank; must be ploughed and grooved and the plank must be fixed in a perpendicular position and spiked fast to the wall with sufficient durable nails and also to have a good lock put on said jail door. It is further ordered that the trap door of said jail be sufficiently secured to guard against the escape of convicts." The trap door referred to was in the floor of the upper room and was the only means of putting prisoners in the lower story.

In May, 1840, David Moorman was allowed $4.43¾ "for taking off old lock and putting a new one on the jail."

Evidently things had been going wrong about the jail for at the same session it was "ordered that the county agent have the hinges on the jail door made sufficiently strong to secure all prisoners that may be put therein instanter."

In August, 1840, Jesse Way was paid $15.00, Anderson D. Way $15.00, Wm. D. Smith, $15.00 and Michael Aker $15.00, for assisting to convey prisoners to Jeffersonville. At the same time Elisha Martin and Jacob Remmel were paid $3.33⅓ each, "for assisting to convey prisoners as far as Centerville who were on their way to State prison." Evidently they were taking a "bad lot" for Michael Aker was "allowed out of the county treasury one dollar fifty cents for furnishing chains to secure prisoners, to take them to the State prison," and Jesse Way was "allowed $1.37½ for pitcher for jail and 3 pad locks."

PIONEER SOAP MAKING.

February, 1841, the Treasurer was ordered to "pay Stephen D. Cunningham $5.49 for furnishing and irons for the court house."

Three noted prisoners of 1841 were Austin, Munden and Combs. Thos. W. Coats was paid $30.00 for helping to take them to State prison. Joseph Kelly, Samuel Burres and Asahel Stone were paid $1.00 each for guarding these prisoners "in jail one night." George Clark and John Way were paid "one dollar each for their horses service in arresting David Combs."

Robert Irvin, jailor, is paid $1.00 for gloves and candles for use of Munden, Austin and Combs, prisoners.

In 1843, Asahel Stone was "allowed $30.50 for building a privy for the use of Randolph county." The building was situated on the northwest corner of the square.

In 1843, it was "ordered that the court house of Randolph county be kept for the purposes of holding courts therein and political speaking only and that the sheriff of said county have the care of the same.

In June, 1844, Paul W. Way, county agent, was ordered to "cause horse racks to be erected on each corner of the public square and other places where he may deem necessary on said public square in the town of Winchester."

June 9, 1844, Elias Kizer, one of the county commissioners, was "appointed to furnish a stove for the court house and piping for the same also to get piping for the stove for the jail within and for Randolph county. Also to repair said jail if needed and report to the next term of this board." Mr. Kizer, evidently did this work immediately as the next item is the order for $25.00, paying him for the same.

Abraham Adamson, one of the commissioners, protested against Henry Neff as treasurer in 1844.

A reminder of "old times" is shown in an order of 1846, when Thomas W. Reece was "allowed the sum of $1.10 for quills and sand boxes furnished for Randolph county up to February 17, 1846." Steel pens were not bought for the county until 1851, when A. J. Rust was allowed $1.50 for steel pens. Sand boxes were used to hold sand in which the quills were "stuck." The sand was also used for blotting.

December 11, 1846, the board ordered that "David J. Cottom procure a clear toned bell for the use of the court house, weighing two hundred and fifty pounds, the said bell to be paid for out of the first money paid into the county treasury." This bell was hung on the outside of the tower which is shown in the picture of the court house and was afterward removed and placed on the town hall and became the property of C. E. Magee when he purchased that building. Mr. Magee still owns the bell.

December 11, 1846, the board of commissioners entered into a contract with A. D. Way which said that he "be and he is hereby authorized to care and take charge of the keys of the court house for the term of five months from the date hereof for which he is to have the use of the jury room in the northeast corner of the said house, also he obligate himself to keep said house in good order." On the same day it was "ordered by the board of commissioners that division No. 26 of the Sons of Temperance have the privilege of holding their meetings in the second story of the court house for the term of one year for the sum of $12.00, also the said Sons of Temperance are to have the privilege of running a partition across the said second story of the court house for which they are to be allowed a reasonable compensation."

Elias Kizer furnished the wood for the court house in 1848 for $40.50.

In December, 1848, the board ordered "that D. W. Frazer be allowed to occupy the grand jury room up stairs in the court house (excepting when the circuit court is in session at which time said Frazer is not to be entitled to the use of said room) for the sum of one dollar per month."

A plague broke out in the town of Winchester in the summer of 1849. It was claimed by many to be cholera. People were very much frightened as a great many people died.

August 2nd of that year year a special session of the commissioners was held, a report of which is as follows:

"By a citation issued from the county auditor for the purpose of having the place of holding lections changed in White River township at the annual August election, A. D. 1849 Present the Honorable Philip Barger, Abraham Adamson, Esqrs. members of said board.

To the honorable the board of commissioners of Randolph county in special session we the undersigned citizens respectfully represent to your honors that sickness prevails in the town of Winchester the usual place of holding the elections in White River township to such an extent that it is thought to be dangerous to hold the coming August election in said town. We therefore pray your honors to change the place of holding said election to some suitable point in said township where the voters may not incur said danger and your petitioners will ever pray, etc.: Silas Colgrove, Jno. R. Turner, Edmund Thomas, D. J. Cottom, M. L. Jones, J. A. Steele, A. O. Neff, J. Y. Howard, J. M. Hill, A. J. Rush, H. Y. Kizer, Wm. Allen, M. A.

Reeder, B. C. Hoyt, Saml. Y. Ludy, Thos. Wallace, Wm. Darah, Wm. Frazee, E. Martin, W. G. Puckett, W. Y. Way, Y. W. Reece.

Whereas, by the foregoing petition we deem it a sufficient cause for the changing of said election; we therefore order that the next annual August election be held at a house on Jesse Smith's land near Isaac Ray's about one mile west of Winchester in said township.

Read, signed in open court and the board adjourned until court in course,

PHILIP BARGER,
ABRAHAM ADAMSON."

June 11, 1850, it was

"Ordered by the board that Paul W. Way be and he is hereby appointed to sell to the lowest bidder the fencing of the public square in the town of Winchester with a good and sufficient plank fence composed of post and plank, the post to be of good white oak timber to take bond and security of the undertaker for the faithful performance of his contract, said public square to be so enclosed as ten feet on the east side and ten feet on the north side next the streets unenclosed on the west side enclosed so as to take the market house into the enclosure and on the south side on the same line that the present fence now stands, and also that said Paul W. Way have the necessary removed and permanently set on some site as best suits his own judgment concerning the same and make report of his proceedings in the premises to the next term of this board."

In 1850, Martin A. Reeder was "appointed to take charge of the court house in Randolph county for the term of one year and keep the same locked up except on public occasions and the Union Sabbath school will be permitted to hold Sabbath school in the same."

At the same meeting it was "ordered by the board that the Sons of Temperance be permitted to occupy their rooms upstairs at the court house for one year at the former rate of rent provided that said Sons shall collect all their dirt and floors cleaning out of the court house."

In 1851, Haller Skagg was allowed $14.10 part pay for fencing the public square. John H. Leake was allowed $14.10 for the same. Ludy & Aker were allowed $6.35 for nails and spikes for fencing public square. Paul W. Way was allowed $5.50 "for his services superintending building new fence and selling old fence all round public square, etc." Solomon Yunker was allowed fifty cents, "pay for mending saddle bags for county treasurer." It must be remembered at that time the county treasurer collected the taxes by calling on the various tax payers over the county.

Thomas M. Brown rented the grand jury room in 1851, "for the term of twelve months (except when the grand jury shall be in session) for the sum of one dollar per month to be paid into the county treasury quarterly."

In 1853, the board of equalization was made up of township assessors.

The Sons of Temperance had to give up their room in 1853 and the county recorder "took that room as his office for the purpose of recording deeds, etc., and other instruments required to be recorded in the said recorder's office in the county of Randolph." The deed and marriage record was not indexed by general index until 1852. This work was done by Willis C. Wilmore for which he received $203.18.

In 1853, Joseph Anthony, circuit judge, reports having examined the records of the clerk's office and finds "on such examination the records to be kept in a fair and legible hand and the papers mostly neatly filed and in good state for convenience and preservation."

December 4, 1853, Wm. A. Peele appeared before the board of commissioners and moved: "The court to order what kind of animals should be allowed to run at large upon the unenclosed land or public country of any township, which motion is continued for further evidence to the term of this board."

It would be interesting to know what Mr. Peele's motion was but no record is made of it ever having been heard of again.

In December, 1853, Wm. Burris was allowed: "Sum of $118.12, pay for 78744 words in making up the general index of deeds and marriages of Randolph county."

The first iron safe bought for the county was purchased for the clerk's office in 1858; $100.00 was paid for it.

In 1858, Elias Kizer was to furnish twenty-five cords of wood for the county at $1.40 per cord, "to be corded up on the west part of the public square between the court house and the market house."

A small fire occurred in the court house in 1855.

Candles were purchased for the court room as late as 1865.

December 6, 1818, the first appointment of assessor was made as follows: "George Bowls appointed lister for the county of Randolph for the year 1819 who gave bond according to law and took and subscribed the following affirmation: I George Bowls do solemnly affirm that I will as lister for the county of Randolph to the best of my knowledge and judgment diligently and indiscreetly honestly and faithfully execute and discharge the duties of lister according to law. George Bowls." Mr. Bowls made his report during the May term of 1819 and received the sum of $10.00 for his services.

The first tax levy was made in 1819 and was as follows: "Ordered that the taxes for the year 1819 on each and every horse beast, 25 cents." A second tax levy was made in May, 1820, as follows: "Ordered that the following rates of taxation be paid for county purposes for the year on each horse creature over three years, etc., 37½ cents; on each house of entertainment, $10.00." The tax levy of 1826 was as follows:

"Ordered that the tax on tavern license be ---------- $ 5.00
The tax on merchandise ---------- 10.00
On ferrys ---------- 2.00
On horses, etc. ---------- .37½
On oxen ---------- .18¾
On town lots two per cent. on the value
On land half the amount of State tax
On pleasure carriages of two wheels ---------- 1.00
On pleasure carriages of four wheels ---------- 1.50
On silver or pinchback watches ---------- .25
On gold watches ---------- 1.00
On brass clocks ---------- 1.00
On stud horses, one, the price of covering by the season."

Grocers' license was raised to $10.00 in 1832.

The rate in 1835 was fixed in the January term of that year when it was "ordered that the rate of taxation for the year 1835 be as follows, to wit:
On grocery license by the year at the rate of ---------- $15.00
On license to vend wooden clocks at the rate of ---------- 10.00
On tavern license by the year ---------- 10.00
On horses, each ---------- .37½
On oxen, each ---------- .18¾
On town lots two per cent. of the valuation
On gold, silver and composition watches, each ---------- .37½
On pleasure carriages of four wheels ---------- 1.00
On pleasure carriages of two wheels ---------- .50
On first rate land, one cent per acre.
On second rate land, ¾ of a cent per acre.
On third rate land, ½ cent per acre.
On polls, 25 cents each.
On watches ---------- .37½."

The writer of this article, in looking through some rubbish in the attic of the court house in 1912, found the original tax duplicate of that year. It consists of a book of fifty-six pages, eleven and one-half by fourteen inches, bound in hog skin, sewed by hand, and made by C. Conway, clerk at that time. It contains the items of descriptions of land, number of acres, value of land and taxable buildings, names of towns, in lots and out lots and value of same, cattle over two years old, hogs over one year old, merchants' capital, value of corporation stock, value of law libraries, value of medical libraries, money at interest and aggregate value of all other taxable property not specified the number of polls, total amount of taxables and remarks. In that year there were 1,248 people assessed in the county. The poll tax was 37½ cents; value of land and taxable buildings, $232,184.00; value of lots and improvements, $6,931.25; value of horses and mules, $48,291.50; value of cattle over two years old, $10,363.50; value of hogs over one year old, $7,097.25; there were nine merchants, and their capital totaled $7,624.00; value of corporation stock, $682.00; value of law libraries, $150.00; value of medical libraries, $97.00; money at interest, $4,063.50; aggregate value of all the other taxable property not specified, $20,105.50.

November, 1828, "William Mann is acquitted of 75 cents tax on a horse improperly assessed for the year 1828." September, 1827, Albert Banta was acquitted of 13 cents tax on a town lot improperly assessed for the year 1827. In the same year John Coats was acquitted of 16 cents.

In 1830 it was "Ordered that county treasurer pay Isaac Overman 75 cents, the tax improperly assessed and collect on two work oxen for the year 1829."

June, 1830, David Frazer was paid "twenty-five cents for one quire furnished at election prior to date and fifty cents for making return of the election in the year 1829."

In 1826 Joseph Pierson was paid $7.80 for assessing Greensfork township. Robert Way was paid $11.20 for assessing White River township. Wm. Hunt paid $7.00 for assessing West River township. Riley Marshall $4.50 for assessing Ward township. These were all the townships in what is now Randolph county, but that same year David Vestal was paid $5.00 for assessing Liberty township, being part of Delaware county. May, 1827, James Clayton was given an order for $30.00 as assessor for the year 1827. In November, 1827, Mr. Clayton appeared before the board and the following entry was made: "This day James Clayton came before the board in open session and made affirmation that a county order granted to him for assessing the county for the year 1827 is lost or so mislaid that he can not get the same therefore ordered that an order issue in the place of the one so lost or mislaid."

The Treasurer reports in May, 1826, a balance of $9.19¾. A balance in January, 1829, of $7.04. In March, 1830, the treasurer reports $9.41¼. In May, 1832, he had $1.91. As late as May, 1840, the treasury was so depleted that it was "ordered that Goodrich Brothers & Company be allowed $6.00 for a record book for surveyors office out of the first money that comes into the county treasury." In August of the same year George M. Monks was to receive "$13.00 out of the first money that comes into the treasury for money by him expended for paper and books." When the treasury would get into this condition they would have a lot sale.

One hundred fifty-eight acres of land, donated to the county by the gentleman referred to in the first part of this chapter, was divided into town lots, the sales of which were to replenish the treasury of the county, all remaining lots in Winchester were also ordered sold in 1827. Paul W. Way had this in charge and Way received pay for selling these in 1828.

William Connor was the first to be granted license to vend merchandise. He paid $20.00 for a license for twelve months from November, 1818, to November, 1819.

To keep a tavern one had to have a license which must be obtained by twelve disinterested freeholders petitioning the county commissioners to grant license to some specified person. The conditions of these petitions is shown by the following entry, made in March term of 1840: "Herman L. Searls now comes and files a certificate of good moral character signed by at least twenty-four freeholders of Ward township, in the county of Randolph, Indiana, and also a petition praying the board of commissioners to grant him a license to keep a tavern in the town of Deerfield, in said county, for one year from this date. And the board of commissioners being satisfied that it is the bona fide intention of the said petitioner to keep a tavern for the accommodation of the public and that he is furnished with the spare rooms and bedding in his mansion house and stabling and good stalls for at least four horses and all things required by law for a tavern keeper and having filed a bond and security as required by law, and having produced the county treasurer's receipt for the sum of twenty-five dollars the tax legally assessed by the board of commissioners on tavern license. It is therefore ordered by the board of commissioners now here that the said Herman L. Searls have license to keep a tavern in the said town of Deerfield for one year from this date." Petition of Herman L. Searls. The rates were fixed by the county commissioners. The first rate was fixed in November, 1819, for Mr. McCool, who had the first tavern in Winchester:

"Dieting per meal	$0.25
Whiskey per ½ pt.	.12½
Rum per ¼ pt.	.37½
Brand per ½ do	.25
Gin per ½ do	.25
Fresock Brandy pr do	.37½
Beer or Cider per quart	.12½"

In 1828 the rates were changed as follows:

"Ordered that the following be tavern rates for the year 1828, to wit:

For dieting	$0.18¾
Whiskey by the half pint	.06¼
Peach Brandy	.12½
Rum and French Brandy	.18¾
Forage by the feed of one gallon	.06¼
Horse feed and grain all night	.25
Lodging	.06¼
Tavern license by the year	3.00"

In 1833, license for peddling wooden clocks was fixed at $10.00 per year. In 1847, non-resident peddlers were charged $10.00 per year. In 1844, Pomeroy & Fleming were granted a license to vend merchandise and wooden, brass and composition clocks in Randolph county for nine months. In 1833 John Beard paid $2.50 for a permit to sell goods in Ward township for three months. Robert Taylor was granted a license to keep a tavern in the town of Deerfield in 1839. Thomas & James Burk were granted a license to keep a grocery in the town of Winchester for one year, 1834.

Edmund B. Goodrich was assessor of 1834 and received $52.50 for his services.

The first attorney for the county commissioners was appointed in 1840. Mr. Smith Elkins at that time was paid $26.00 for thirteen days' services.

The first woman to be placed in jail was Jemima Mann. Jemima was evidently an "old offender," as in January, 1831, the county treasurer was "ordered to pay Wm. M. Way, jailer, the sum of $17.00 for confining Ishmael Bunch in jail and dieting same four days and confining Jemima Mann in jail two different times and dieting the same thirty-eight days, furnishing the noblocke for jail door and furnishing bed quilt for prisoners."

The Indian mound is referred to in 1832 as the old fort.

March, 1840, Nathan Garrett was "allowed $60.00 for apprehending two horse thieves, viz: John W. Keener and Philip W. Hester."

May, 1834, "Jacob Chrisman received $1.50 for three days extra service as supervisor and $1.50 for six finger boards."

The first weights and measures procured for the county was in November, 1819, when Charles Conway was "appointed to procure one measure of 1 foot English, one measure of three feet English measure and half bushel, one gallon measure and set of weights of lead avoirdupois weight and the an initials letters of the county for the use of the county of Randolph." In May 1840 Paul W. Way county agent, was ordered to procure a half bushel measure one foot one yard measure also scales and weights as provided for by law for clerks office.

An agricultural society meeting was held in 1840.

Formerly fines and forfeitures must be recorded with the county commissioners. The principal offense at that time seems to have been betting.

The report of January, 1841, is as follows:

"List of fines assessed in the Randolph circuit court since the first Monday in January A. D. 1840; at April term, 1840:

GEORGE W. MONKS, Clerk."

July, 1829, John Odle makes the following report:

"State of Indiana, Randolph County:

Be it remembered that John Stephenson did on the 13th day of June, 1829, come before me, John Odle, a Justice of the Peace for Randolph county, in the town of Winchester, who did then and there swear one fineable oath, swearing by God in a violent and angry manner for which I assessed one dollar as a fine. June 20th, John Stephenson paid me one dollar for his fine.

JOHN ODLE, (Seal.)
Justice of the Peace."

Mr. Odle of the September term fines the full limit of the law which at that time was as follows: (H. I.)

Isaac Barnes makes the following peculiar report, July, 1830:

"State of Indiana vs. Nancy Hoglin:

On a charge for committing as assault and battery on the body of Marget Cox of Randolph county, West River township, at the house of said Hoglin on the 14th day of December, 1829. One dollar fine assessed against said Nancy Hoglin of the above county and township on the 6th day of February, 1830, fine, $1.00.

"I do certify the above statement to be true according to the proceedings on trial on the said 6th day of February, 1830.

Given under my hand and seal on this 13th day of February, 1830.

ISAAC BARNES, J. P."

In September of 1830, William Hunt, justice of the peace, fined Harper Hunt $1.00 "on a charge of stripping and offering to fight."

Joel Ward made his report on March, 1832, as follows:

"January the 3rd, 1832, the defendant paid in the above fine and cost of suit. Paid over the above fine to Michael Aker, seminary trustee. I certify the above to be a true copy from my docket this 3rd day of March, 1832.

JOEL WARD, (Seal.)
Justice of the Peace."

It frequently happened that feuds would be carried on between men or families and difficulties were certain to arise whenever they met and this meant business for the squires. This was true of Edward McClue and Ezekiel Roe. November, 1832, they were fined one dollar and July, 1833, were fined one dollar. November, 1833, they were again fined one dollar and March of 1834, a fine of four dollars and in May, 1834, ten dollars.

In 1850, Robert P. Budd fined Mary Life "for committing assault and battery on the body of Catharine Woods in the sum of $1.00 and costs," but he offers the suggestion that "this is doubtful whether it will be collected."

The seal of the circuit court was adopted as the seal of the board of commissioners in November, 1819.

In May, 1830, a peculiar order for an election was made:

"Ordered that an election be held in Stoney Creek township for a justice of the peace on the last Saturday in this month if they should get their corn planted." George W. Smithson was appointed inspector of the election.

January, 1831, David Heaston was allowed $20.00 for keeping two estray horses for twelve months.

A partition was built in the jail in 1830. John Way received the sum of $1.87½ for mending the jail and making hinges for the partition door.

Horse thieves have always been the center of public attention. In 1817, the offense of stealing a horse was punishable by death.

As late as 1861 George Stevenson and others filed articles in association of the Bloomingsport Vigilance Society, which was inspected and approved by the board. The purpose of this society was to detect "horse thieves and other criminals." The "other criminals" are said to have been Knights of the Golden Circle.

State roads were provided for January 15, 1844. Under that act the Huntsville, Maxville and Fairview road was made a state road. The Mont-see-town and Camden road and the Deerfield and Steubenville roads were also state roads.

William Hunt's lane was located by the commissioners in 1844.

Mail route was established from Greenville to Centerville in 1845.

Bridge was built over White river on the old State road in 1846. Hands were allowed fifty cents per day, team and driver one dollar per day.

The Board of Equalization made its first report in 1841.

The first fire engine was purchased for the "town of Winchester" with the public buildings therein in 1841.

December 5, 1845, it was "ordered by the Board of Commissioners that the premium allowed for wolf scalps for the year 1845 be and the same is $1.50 for each seperate scalp." Jacob Linkle is allowed $1.50 for a wolf's scalp on that same day.

In 1847, W. F. Way paid twenty-five cents for fourteen dozen quills for the county.

The first license granted a woman to sell anything was granted in 1847 to Mrs. E. McCullough.

Originally the county commissioners appointed the jurors. The first set of grand jurors was appointed during the first meeting, August, 1818. "The following men are appointed grand jurors to the October term of the circuit court: William Diggs, John Wright, John Way, Jonathan Edwards, John Ballenger, William Wright, Jeremiah Meek, Gideon Frazer, William Haworth, Curtis Clenney, Isaac Wright, Jesse Johnson, William Canada, Travis Adcock, James Massey, William Way, Sr., Jesse Roberts, Armsbee Diggs." The following men were appointed petit jurors to the October term of the circuit court: "Meshach Lewallyn, Paul W. Way, James Jacobs, William Way, Sr., Abraham Wright, Solomon Wright, Jesse Green, James Wright, David Stout, Joshua Cox, Samuel Lea, Jonathan Heath."

In November, 1819: "The following men are appointed grand jurors to March term of the circuit court, 1819: John Way, James Massey, William Way, Jr., Tence Massey, John Ballenger, Jonathan Heath, William Diggs, David Stout, Samuel Lee, William Haworth, John Wright, Jesse Green, John Wright, Joshua Cox, William Wright, Armsbee Diggs, Isaac Wright, James Wright. The following men are appointed 1818, petit jurors to March term of the Circuit court, 1819: Meshach Lewallyn, William Haworth, Jesse Roberts, Jonathan Edwards, Solomon Wright, Daniel Petty, William Canaday, John Elzroth, James Wright, Isaiah Cox and Henry Wise."

Bill boards were removed around the public square in 1873.

Commissioners were very obliging in 1872 when they allowed George Irvin the privilege of setting his fence out seven feet in the Huntsville and Winchester road with the purpose of planting a hedge along said road. Mr. Irvin agreed to move the fence in case they wanted to greater improve the road but agreed to move it only long enough for such grading or improvement to be done."

CHAPTER VII.

OFFICERS.

One of the first provisions after the state was organized, was to provide for the transacting of the county business by a Board of County Commissioners, to be elected by the people. The method of procedure in the organization of a county has been explained in the chapter on "county organization." Under this act the first commissioners of the county were:

1818, August, Eli Overman, Benjamin Cox, John James.

1820, August, John Wright, Zachariah Puckett, John James.

We have no records of the county commissioners from 1820 to 1825. On the 31st of January, 1824, there were two acts approved by the Legislature, relative to county business. One was that, "each county in the state, a board of commissioners for transacting county business, to consist of three qualified electors, any two of whom shall be competent to do business, to be elected by the qualified electors of the several counties respectively, one of whom shall be elected annually, to continue in office three years, and until their successors are chosen and qualified. Sec. 2. At the first election, in pursuance of this act, there shall be elected three commissioners; the person having the highest number of votes, shall serve three years; the person having the next highest number of votes, shall serve two years; and the person having the next highest number of votes, shall serve one year; but if two or more shall be equal in number, their grade shall be determined by lot, and at all subsequent elections, where there shall be more than one vacancy, the term of service of the person elected, shall be determined by the same rule." This indeed, is a very strange procedure of the Legislature, because "This act shall take effect and be in force until the first day of September next, and no longer."

On the same day another act was approved as follows:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That there shall be a county board of justices established, in each and every county in this state, for the purpose of transacting county business; to be composed of the justices of the peace of the respective counties, who shall meet together and organize themselves, agreeably to the provisions of this act; and after being organized as aforesaid, shall be known and considered in fact, law, and equity, a body politic and corporate, by and under the name and style of "The board of justices of the county of "; and as such, and by and under such name and style, may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended, answer and be answered unto, in any court of justice whatever; and to do and transact all manner of business on behalf of their respective counties, that may be assigned them from time to time by law; and in all cases where the county may, or shall have been injured in its goods, chattels, lands, tenements, rights, credits, and effects, or contracts, such board of justices, shall by and under their corporate name and style (without setting out any of their individual names), bring such suit or suits, action or actions, either in law or in equity, as they may deem best calculated to obtain redress for any such injury, in the same way and manner, that a private individual might, could or would do; and in all cases where any person or persons, now have, or hereafter may have any claim, of any name or nature, against any county, suit may be brought thereupon in any court of law or equity, against such board of justices, in their corporate capacity aforesaid, and judgment and execution had thereon, as in other cases.

Ses. 2. It shall be the duty of each and every justice of the peace, to meet at the places of holding courts in their respective counties, on the first Monday of September next, and then and there proceed to organize themselves into a county board of justices, by electing some one of their body as president of such court, and causing their names to be entered in the record book of the county, as members of such board: Provided however, that in all cases where the circuit court shall be in session in any county in this state, on the first Monday of September next, it shall be the duty of the justices of the peace in such county, to meet on the Monday succeeding the term of said court, and perform the duties required by the foregoing provisions of this section.

Sec. 3. That the justice so elected as president, shall serve as such, for and during the term of one year, and until another shall be elected. It shall be his duty to sign all their proceedings, and pronounce the decisions of the court.

Sec. 5. The clerks of the circuit courts shall by virtue of their office attend the meetings of the county board of justices, and keep a record of their proceedings, and do such other business, as shall be required by law; and the sheriff of the county, shall also by himself or deputy, attend said board and execute their orders.

Sec. 6. And it shall be the duty of said county board, at their November session in each year, to make out a fair and accurate statement of the receipts and expenditures of the county for that year, and have the same set up at the court house door, or published in some newspaper printed in the county.

Sec. 7. The county board of justices, shall, at their January session in each year, appoint a suitable number of listers, constables, overseers of the poor, inspectors of elections, superintendents of school sections, fence viewers, a county treasurer, and a pound keeper; and it shall be their duty at other meetings, to fill all vacancies that may happen in any of their appointments.

Sec. 8. It shall be the duty of the county board of justices, at their May session in each year, to receive and inspect the listers books, and levy a county tax according to law, and cause their clerks to make out a duplicate for collection accordingly: Provided, however, That it shall require five members of said board to constitute a quorum to do business, at their May and November sessions; and in all cases when a quorum shall not attend, such as do attend, shall adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of absent members.

Sec. 9. Required them to be punctual.

Sec. 10. Authorized them "to sit three days at each session, if the business before them require it.

Sec. 11. Transferred the authority from the board of county commissioners to the county board of justices, "after the said first Monday of September next.

Sec. 12. Required the consent of three members to appropriate money.

Sec. 13. That justices of the peace shall, from and after the first Monday of September next, be exempt from militia duty, and serving on juries, and from working on roads and public highways, for a capitation tax, and shall receive no other pay for any of the duties enjoined upon them by this act.

Sec. 16. Transferred all powers and privileges and duties required of the board of county commissioners, to the county board of justices.

"Sec. 17. This act to take effect and be in force from and after the first Monday in September next."

Under the provisions of this act, we have the following:

BOARD OF JUSTICES.

1825, John Coats, president, Noah Johnson, Isaac Barnes, Joseph Hale, John Odle, 1826, January, John Coats, president, David Vestal, John Odle, Samuel Woodworth, Isaac Barnes, Joseph Hale, William Hunt.

1827, January, Samuel D. Woodworth, president, Isaac Barnes, George Reitenour, John Coats, Joseph Hale.

1827, May, Samuel D. Woodworth, president, John Nelson, George T. Wilson, David Vestal, Joseph Hale, William Hunt, William Massey, David Frazier, Isaac Barnes, George Reitenour.

1828, July, John Odle, president, David Frazier, George Reitenour, George T. Wilson, Daniel B. Millar.

1828, November, John Odle, president, William Hunt, David Vestal, Joseph Hale, Daniel B. Miller, Curtis Voris.

1829, September, John Odle, president, Joseph Hale, Curtis Voris, David Semans.

1829, November, John Odle, president, Joseph Hale, Curtis Voris, Jesse Wright, John Jones, Daniel B. Miller.

1830, May, William Hunt, president, Curtis Voris, David Semans, Horace S. Rawson, Joseph Hale.

1830, September, Horace S. Rawson, president, Alvin C. Graves, Joel Ward, Benjamin Wheeler.

1830, November, William Hunt, president, Alvin C. Graves, James Smith.

1831, January, Alvin C. Graves, president, Wm. Hunt, Horace Lawson, James Smith, Joel Ward, Benjamin Wheeler, Oliver Walker, James C. Bowen.

1831, July, Alvin C. Graves, president, Joel Ward, David Vestal, George W. Smithson, James C. Bowen.

Agreeably to an act of the Legislature of 1830, the board of justices in the May term, 1831, divided the county into three districts as follows:

"All that part lying east of the section line dividing sections 15 & 16 in the 14th range to be the first district and all that part lying west of the said line dividing sections 15 & 16 to the line dividing sections 15 & 16 in range 13 to be the second district and all that part west of said section line dividing sections 15 & 16 in the thirteenth range to be the third district."

The election was held, the results of which are indicated in the introductory paragraph of the September term, 1831.

"At a Randolph board of commissioners began and held at the court house in and for the county of Randolph on Monday the 5th day of September, 1831, present William Macy who produced a certificate of having been duly elected county commissioner for the county aforesaid for and during the term of three years and John James also appeared and produced a certificate of having been duly elected county commissioner for the county aforesaid for and during the term of two years who were severally qualified into office and took their seats."

Later in the meeting, "Elias Kizer appeared and produced a certificate of having been duly elected county commissioner for said county for and during the term of one year from this date who was duly qualified and took his seat."

Solomon Wright, David Heaston, Benjamin Ramsey, William R. Finn, Martin A. Reeder, John H. Peake, Joab Pierce, R. H. Grooms, Jonathan Edwards, Isaac R. Ford, John D. Carter, J. J. Evans, 1884; Cyrus Cox, 1888; J. J. Evans, 1890; John D. Carter, 1892; Oren Coats, 1894; J. J. Evans, 1896; Jacob E. Hinshaw, 1898; J. J. Evans, 1900-1913; David C. Roney, 1913; John S. Nixon, October 6, 1913, to December 31, 1914.

PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS.

The first prosecuting attorney was James Rariden, appointed by the court. After him, at various times, were Bethuel Morris, John Gilmore, Lot Bloomfield, Oliver H. Smith, Amos Lane, Charles H. Test, Martin M. Ray, James Perry, William J. Brown, Caleb B. Smith, Samuel W. Parker, Jeremiah Smith, Andrew Kennedy, Jehu T. Elliott, John Brownlee (up to October, 1839).

Elected—William A. Peelle, Thomas M. Browne, Silas Colgrove, J. J. Cheney (common pleas), Enos L. Watson (common pleas), William Garber, Thomas M. Browne, Daniel M. Bradbury, E. B. Reynolds, Alexander Gullett, A. O. Marsh, J. E. Mellette; Thomas A. Spencer, 1882; Emerson McGriff, 1885; S. A. Canada, 1886; J. B. Ross, 1888; B. F. Marsh, 1890; James B. Ross, 1892. Clarkson L. Hutchens, 1894-98; Alonzo L. Bales, 1898; Charles L. Watson, 1900-1905; W. O. Smith, 1905; Carl Thompson, 1907; W. O Smith, 1909; E. E. Chenoweth, 1911; Bert E. Woodbury, 1913.

DRAINAGE COMMISSIONERS.

James D. Bowen, 1881; Reuben C. Shaw, 1881; M. C. Gaffey, 1881; George W. Hamilton, 1881; Albert M. Russell, 1882; Walter C. Shaw, 1884; Charles C. Yunker, 1884; Ellsworth Hinshaw, 1888; J. E. Hinshaw, 1890-1900; Alonzo L. Wright, 1900-1909; Arthur B. Purdy, 1909-1915.

SCHOOL EXAMINERS.

Jeremiah Smith, George W. Monks, Samuel D. Woodworth, Moorman Way, Carey S. Goodrich, Isaac F. Wood, William A. Peelle, J. J. Cheney, Pleasant Hiatt, J. G. Brice, A. J. Stakebake.

The first county superintendent was Charles W. Paris, elected in 1873, and was succeeded by Daniel Lesley, in 1875. H. W. Bowers, elected in 1883; J. W. Denney, 1887, and served ten years, when Charles W. Paris was again elected and served until 1907, when the present incumbent, Lee L. Driver, was elected.

CHAPTER VIII.

MILITARY.

Randolph county not being entered by settler until 1814 could not of course have had any soldiers in either the Revolutionary War or the War of 1812.

It was only a few of the most adventurous of Revolutionary soldiers who pierced the great unbroken west through the spirit of adventure or of home seeking.

Those who had the spirit of adventure merely went from place to place stopping here and there and settling nowhere. Those who left the eastern colonies in search of fortune or homes came into the west and settled in Ohio or Tennessee and it was only the most venturesome that moved the second time and came from those two states into Indiana. It is impossible at this remote period to know who these heroes were or the motives that brought them from the civilization of the east to the wilds of what was then the extreme west, however, it is known that a few of these old men, for indeed they were old at the time of the organization of Randolph county, did enter this county, here to find a home in peace and happiness for the remainder of their days.

Being used to hardships and privations the new settlements offered no inconveniences or hardships which they were unwilling to endure. The only record we have of these heroes today is the little marker that stands at the head of the grave and in some cases these markers have been destroyed or removed.

In 1840 the county within its boundary had at least seven Revolutionary soldiers, who were drawing pensions as such. In that year, 1840, there were Samuel Ambrom (Amburn), age 79; Drummond Smithson, age 85, who lived at Stoney Creek township; Robert Lumpkin, age 84, lived in Nettle Creek; Wm. Fitzjerrel (Fitzgerald), age 97, in Washington; Chris Bordders, 79, Greensfork; Joseph Chandler, age 87, and Elias Porter, age 84, of Jackson township. The above list is taken from the official census of pensioners for 1840, and from that it would seem that no Revolutionary soldiers' widows were living in this county.

A Mr. McKinney, father of Anthony McKinney, of Green township, is buried at Fairview. He lived in this county but a short time. He had fought at Germantown and Brandywine and was such an admirer of Anthony Wayne that he named his oldest son, Anthony.

The cemetery at Windsor contained the body of at least one Revolutionary soldier, a Mr. Dudley.

Mr. Fitzgerald, mentioned above, lived to the ripe old age of one hundred five years, one month and fifteen days and even at that old age died through the effects of an accident. He had maintained his strength and vitality up to the time of his untimely death and did much manual labor in spite of the fact he was blind. His death was caused from a fall off of a load of oats and in the fall struck a log projecting from the corner of the stable. It is sad indeed that a man should come to such an untimely ending after having faced the enemy in defense of himself and liberty through such a war as the Revolutionary.

The Indian War of 1789-95 brought a great many people into Indiana and a few in the near neighborhood of Randolph county. No doubt a few of these Indian fighters settled in Randolph county having been attracted here by the fertility of the soil and the cheapness of the land. They had become acquainted with this part of the country during the year 1793-94-95 at which time the treaty of peace was signed at Greenville, Ohio. The great majority of the earliest settlers however were either Quakers or in direct sympathy with the Quakers, hence, were conscientiously opposed to war and we would expect but few of the early settlers to have participated in military affairs.

One of the "Indian Fighters" was David Thompson who served as a corporal under Mad Anthony from 1792 to 1795. John Martin, born in 1773, was with St. Clair and Wayne in 1795 and with Harrison at Tippecanoe and the Thames and with Colonel Crogan at Ft. Stephenson. Mr. Martin came to Randolph county in 1822 but removed from this county to Missouri where he died in 1839.

SOLDIERS AND WIVES OF SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812 WHO HAVE HAD PENSIONS.

Benj. Cummins was in the War of 1812 and lived near Salem; John Ruby, lived in Union City; Jacob Johnson, lived in Jackson township; a man by the name of Nunnamaker, lived in Jackson; Chas. W. Thomas, lived in Greensfork township; Walter Ruble, of the Ohio militia; Wm. Rash, John Irvin, David Riddlebarger, Virginia militia; John Grubbs, Ohio militia; Samuel Barker, Vermont militia; Mrs. Eleanor Ruby, widow of John Ruby; Rebecca Harris, widow of Wm. Harris; Polly Marquis, widow of Kid Marquis; Mrs. Lacey, widow of Mr. Lacey; Mrs. Mary A. Paschall, widow of Jesse Q. Paschall, Pennsylvania militia; Mrs. Sarah Bussear, widow of Martin Bussear; Mrs. Elizabeth Ann Poyner, widow of Peter Poyner, Ohio militia; Mrs. Sarah Baxter, widow of Joseph Baxter, Pennsylvania militia; Mrs. Jane Leeka, widow of Henry Leeka, Tennessee militia; Mrs. Mary Ann Mosher, widow of Solomon Mosher, Tennessee militia; Margaret Wine, widow of George Wine, Washington militia; Sarah E. Brown, widow of Wm. Brown, Ohio militia; Susannah Brooks, widow of Thomas Brooks, Ohio militia; Mary Whitenack, widow of Cornelius Whitenack, New Jersey militia; Nancy Stockdale. Other soldiers of 1812 connected with Randolph county are: Jesse Gray, who died in Jay county; Jonathan Lambert and Philip Lambert, buried at New Lisbon. David Heaston, buried at Winchester; John Dye, Jacob Cline, Samuel Wilson and John Hayes, buried at Windsor; James Lambert, Black Hawk War of 1837; John Bolender, Grenadier wars with Napoleon Bonaparte, buried at Windsor; Curtis Clenney, buried at Lynn.

The following is taken from Tucker's history and is indeed authentic:

MILITIA OF RANDOLPH COUNTY—1832.

"A very curious reminiscence of the military doings of "auld lang sayne" has been discovered among the old papers of Judge Edmund B. Goodrich, now in possession of Mrs. John C. Goodrich, widow of the ex-Clerk of Randolph county.

It seems there was a 'militia system' in the 'Hoosier State' many years ago, though how long it lasted we are unable to tell. That it was in active or attempted operation in 1832, at least, is shown by the relic referred to. It is an old paper, purporting to contain a list of persons fined for refusing to bear arms on account of 'conscientious scruples' against the practice; also a list of persons not scrupulous in that respect who were fined for absence or other dereliction of militia law. In the first list, the fine is $1.50 in each case; in the other, the amount varies from 25 cents to $10. The regiment concerned was the Seventieth, and there seem to have been six companies, with Jeremiah Smith as Colonel of that same regiment. The redoubtable Captains were Messrs. Comer, Butler, Denton, Hunt, Fleming, Heaston. Butler resided at Deerfield; Heaston, at Winchester; Hunt, probably near Huntsville; Denton's men were residents of Nettle Creek region; Fleming's men were from Stoney Creek, and Comer's from Greensfork, Jericho, White River, etc.

The 'conscientious' men were returned from three companies—Comer's, Denton's and Fleming's. There seem to have been none of that sort in either Butler's, Heaston's or Hunt's. How many Capt. Comer had of non-delinquents it would be interesting to know, as he returns sixty-one of the 'scrupulous' sort. Capt. Denton gives but four, and Capt. Fleming, twenty-one, or eighty-six in all. Of the other persons fined 'for cause,' there were in Butler's company, fifteen; Denton's, forty-three; Hunt's, forty-four; Flemings, Comer's, none; total, 154; grand total, 240; perfect ones, unknown.

One Captain was fined; one Lieutenant, three Sergeants and two Corporals.

It may not be amiss to append the names of those who refused to bear arms, as it will be a very fair index of the Quaker element at that time among those of military age:

Comer's Company—Moorman Way, Isaiah Cox, Simon Cox, Joshua Cox, Simon Pickett, Nathan Puckett, Zachariah Puckett, David Haworth, Henry Yeakley, Littleberry Diggs, Armsbee Diggs, William Diggs, Benjamin Diggs, Lewis Osborn, Jesse Way, Robert Way, Joshua Robertson, John Cox, Benjamin Davis, Nathan Barker, William Harris, Benjamin Harris, Silas Hiatt, Robert Woody, Joseph Picket, John Puckett, Thomas Buckingham, Moses Mendenhall, Joshua Trueman, Benoni Hill, Henry Hill, John Peacock, Elijah Case, William Case, John Pike, Thomas Hinshaw, Nathan Freeman, Stanton Bailey, Samuel Cox, John Rhoads, Nicholas Robinson, Amos Peacock, James Foust, Welcome Puckett, Thomas Green, Nathan Green, Jacob Yeakley, William Mann, Tyre Puckett, James Clayton, Jonathan Hiatt, Sr., George Hiatt, Martin Hiatt, Moses Hiatt Joseph Hiatt Jonathan C. Hiatt, Thomas Conner, Nathan Hiatt, Jacob Knight, George Knight, Jesse Wright —sixty-one.

Denton's Company—Jonathan Macy, Nathan Macy, William Lee, Alva Macy—four.

Fleming's Company—Joseph Thornburg, Isaac Thornburg, Amos Smith, Isaac Beals, Nathan Thornburg, John Diggs, Mark Diggs, William Holloway, Robert Fisher, John Holloway, Joseph Fisher, Thomas Fisher, Joab Thornburg, Job Thornburg, John Thornburg, Jacob Beals, Solomon Wright, Jonathan Thornburg, Mordecai Bond, Ornan Bond, Benjamin Car—twenty-one.

The Captain was fined $5; one lieutenant, $6, and one $10; two sergeants, $3, and two $2 each; two corporals, $1 each.

Among those fined "for cause," perhaps for want of a "primer" to their guns, or some other heinous military offense, occur such names as Elias Kizer, Daniel Worth, William Macy, Burkett Pierce, Temple Smith, David Bunker, Philip Brown, Isaac Amburn, James Porter, William Chamness, William Smith, Smith Masterson, Samuel Hawkins (then of Jay County), Samuel Simmons, Daniel B. Miller, Davis Pegg, Stephen Dye, Hamilton Snodgrass, Joseph Jay, John Borroughs, Lemuel Vestal, Andrew Aker, Henry D. Huffman, Jacob Harshman, William Lumpkin, Thomas Maulsby—and so on, to the tune of 154 in all.

The surviving veteran pioneers who find their names in the above list will doubtless chuckle with glee at reading this "reminder" of what must have been regarded, even at the time, as a huge joke.

The papers are made out in all due form, signed by Jeremiah Smith, colonel, and judge of the court of appeals, delivered to Edmund B. Goodrich, Paymaster of Seventieth regiment; and the list is receipted by Robert Irvin, Constable, with order to him to collect the fines aforesaid. Whether any at all were paid is not now known. Jesse Way says that Robert Irvin used to relate, years afterward, that, as he was on his collecting tour, he lodged with a good-natured Quaker, one of the number who were fined for "scruples," and that, on asking his host what was his charge—"I charge thee," was the reply, "that thee go home and find some better business, and never be caught in such a scrape again as long as thee lives."

Robert replied, "I believe I will do it," and he did it, and kept the advice, too. He used to laugh over the joke, and say that it was the best advice he ever got in his life.

War had, to Randolph county dwellers, been a thing well-nigh unknown. Until the struggle of the rebellion, only one other had called our nation to arms, and that was small and of short duration, viz., the Mexican conflict. And in that contest, barely three (as we have been told) were Randolph county boys—Allen O. Neff, Augustus Kane and William D. Stone. Capt. John Neff did, indeed, join the army at that time, and rendered service for several years, but he did not go to Mexico. Kane was much on the sick list, and Neff was shortly transferred to the band, so that the reputation of Randolph for warlike valor in this struggle would seem to have been left in the exclusive keeping of William D. Stone. He was in the war fourteen months, seeing, in that time, some severe service, and taking part in several hard battles, especially those fought by our gallant little army around the city of Puebla, as well as in some others.

When the regiment containing our "especial three" arrived at Vera Cruz, Gen. Scott had stormed San Juan de Ulloa and had captured Vera Cruz; had set his eager legions on their march into the interior; had climbed the frowning heights of Sierra Gorda and hurled backward in inglorious defeat the armed Mexican legions; had crossed the smiling Table Lands, occupied the unresisting city of Puebla, and captured the strong fortress of Perote; and had pressed still onward, till his gallant troops had invested the capital. They had fought and won the memorable contests at Churubusco and Chapultepec, and Molino del Rey, and had at length marched in triumph into the imperial city of the Montezumas, and were taking a brief respite from their warlike labors in that renowned metropolis.

The regiment to which that before-named "three" belonged had, after undergoing a somewhat romantic experience on their outward passage, landed at Vera Cruz. In company with other regiments, they took up their course of march for Puebla, drove off the Mexican army, who had for a considerable time been beleaguering that town in possession of the American forces, relieved the besieged garrison, and entered the city amid the plaudits of the rescued ones.

Peace at length was declared, and the army returned to their homes, since the causeless and cruel Mexican war at last was over.

REMINISCENCES—MEXICAN WAR—W. D. STONE.

In May, 1847, he enlisted in the Fourth Indiana Volunteers as a private. In the Gulf of Mexico, bound for Galveston, on board the Ann Chase, one of the boilers exploded. Several men were killed, and sixty-five went on boats and upon rafts to the Louisiana shore, nine miles away, landing near the mouth of Calcasieu river. Stone was one of that company. For some unknown reason, the steamer managed to repair somewhat the damage done, and went on her course, leaving that company of men in the swamps, helpless and desolate, to their fate. They would not give up, however, and footed it sixty-five miles, having no food nor any suitable drink, through swamps and jungles, during two days and nights, to Sabine City, La., at the mouth of Sabine river. Here they stayed a week. At this point, thousands of Texas cattle used to cross. The cattle had to swim, and the alligators would often catch them. Every little while, a bullock would give a spring and a plunge, and that was the last of him. An aligator had him.

The boys, to pass away the time, tried hunting alligators. Four of them took a skiff, with only one gun for them all, and rowed out into the river.

Presently a huge monster came swimming along, and Stone said, "Let's lasso him." "Agreed," said the rest.

So they fixed a rope to the skiff and threw it around the head and neck of the creature. The moment he felt the rope, he started for the gulf at full speed. He dragged the boat and its frightened crew half a mile or more in "double quick." The boys tried to get him to shore. After bringing him into about four feet of water, one of the men, Brewer by name, a big, burly fellow, tall and stout, jumped from the boat into the river to pull on the rope and help land him. Instanter the alligator "took for" Brewer, and the chap made some rather lively splashing through that water about that time.

However, they got him ashore and shot him. They thought him a "whaler," he being seven or eight feet long, or perhaps longer than that, and larger by far than they cared to encounter again, and so they gave up the business.

Three hundred men were still on board the steamer, and, managing to "rig up" in some way, as has been stated, the ship made for Galveston, paying no heed to the men on shore. They reported at Galveston that sixty-five men had made the shore, and that they were on the coast starving. A schooner was sent for them outright, and they were found at Sabine City. By that schooner the squad were conveyed to Galveston; thence to Brazos de Santiago. Most went by steamer, but fifteen of them went in another way, to wit, by an old yawl. What possessed them to go out on the gulf in such a crazy conveyance is "one of those things that no fellow can ever find out." But go they did, and a sorry time they made of it. When out on the gulf, the yawl would dip and veer, first one side and then the other, and they came near drowning many times; but, through God's mercy, they were spared to tread once more the solid land.

The men in the yawl had no gun, and could not shoot any of the sharks.

Mr. Stone says: "But we did one thing that was not planned. Col. Gorman, of the Fourth Indiana, had put a lot of hams into the bottom of the yawl to be conveyed to Brazos. We got at these, pitching them out, one after one, to the sharks."

From Brazos, the regiment was sent up the Rio Grande some two hundred miles by steamer to Gen. Taylor, but they were ordered to report to Gen. Scott, at Vera Cruz; and, marching back by land to Matamoras, they took passage over the gulf again to the Mexican fortress and seaport, San Juan de Ulloa (San Hoo-an' da Ool-yo-a), and Vera Cruz (Va'ra Krooss), which, however, had been reduced and captured before their arrival.

Most went by steamer, but a part were taken (by their own choice) in an old sailing vessel across the Mexican Gulf to Vera Cruz.

The Mexican forces, meanwhile, had retaken a part of the route from Vera Cruz to the metropolis, and had surrounded Puebla with an army of 7,000 men, under Gen. Ria, the place being held against them by the gallant Gen. Childs, with only a small garrison.

The little army fought every day, more or less, for twenty-nine days, all the way to Puebla. At Huamantla, 1,500 American soldiers routed 5,000 Mexicans, secured the pass in triumph, and raised the siege of Puebla.

Gen. Scott, before this time, had taken San Juan de Ulloa (at Vera Cruz), and had fought Sierra Gorda at the pass up to the heights of the Central Table Land; had taken Puebla and Perote, and had also, about this time, fought and won the terrible battles of Contreras, Churubusco, Chapultepec, and Molino del Rey; and had either just made or was then ready to make his triumphal entry into the imperial city of the Montezumas.

After Puebla, they fought at Tlascala to protect the "tobacco train," a bevy of wagons laden with a supply of that fragrant weed for the use of the American soldiers.

The bombardment of Atlixco on the march, though a cruel thing, was nevertheless a magnificent spectacle. The artillery was posted on the heights, and the town lay far down, hundreds of feet below in the valley. It was in the night, and the track of the shells through the starlit sky could be distinctly seen as they went speeding on their path of destruction. The shells would burst in the midst of the town, scattering death and ruin far and wide. The city could not long endure so unequal a contest, but surrendered at discretion.

These troops did not go to the City of Mexico, as Gen. Scott was in possession, and the actual war was over. The army remained in the conquered country during some months, till the treaty of peace had been made. The evacuation then took place, and the soldiers came home during the summer of 1848."

MEXICAN WAR.

Captain John Neff, Winchester.

He was commissioned captain in the United States army in 1846, during the time of the Mexican war. He did no service in Mexico but was stationed at St. Louis, under Col. Enos McKay, as assistant quartermaster. His labors were great and his responsibilities extensive. At one time his colonel wished transportation for $120,000 in gold and silver, chiefly the latter, to Fort Leavenworth. The steamboats refused to carry it for less than 2 per cent. upon the whole amount. The colonel would not submit to such extortion and directed Captain Neff to convey the funds to their destination overland, and asked him, "What escort do you wish?" "The less, the better," was his reply. He took four men and with a wagon loaded with the precious treasure, they drove through in fourteen days. When four days out the discovery was made that their guns were utterly useless; but they accomplished the journey without mishap, at a cost of about $130, thus effecting a saving to the government of $2,279.

It would seem that Captain Neff's duties did not embrace any direct connection with the Mexican war, but the time of his service was during its progress, and he was a resident of Randolph county and a faithful and efficient officer; and this brief account of his labors would appear to be not out of place at this point in our history.

WAR OF SECESSION.

It will be seen from the foregoing article that very few of the residents of Randolph county had ever seen or known the horrors or privations and butcheries of war, the story of revolutionary hardships, of Indian treachery, and Mexican intrigue, had been told at many a fire-side, children had listened in rapt attention to the stories of heroes until they had become, indeed, hero worshippers. Little did they think in those boyhood days that the lessons of patriotism and loyalty being so instilled would be called forth in action in their manhood by such a great war as the Civil war. They knew nothing whatever of war excepting what they had read and heard, even the play at school had lost its militia tendency, no longer did the school boys organize into companies and play at even Indian wars, no longer did a thought of a raid against man in battle strife claim the attention of the father or mother and yet this fearful cloud was formed that was to burst into terrific storm and claim as its victims hundreds and even thousands of Randolph county boys.

The spark of patriotism was kindled into a flame by the talk of secession and burst into a veritable furnas.

Upon the news of the fall of Ft. Sumter every nook and corner of the county offered its living sacrifice upon the altar of patriotism. Mothers gave willingly their first born, and their last born, that the country might live. She and her daughters, remained at home, toiling incessantly to maintain that home and laboring with their own hands to make garments for the comfort of loved ones on the battle field.

The father who was not accompanied by his son to the front, bade his son "God speed" and returned to labor, that the others might be supported. Those were times when the true nature of man came to the front, either in response to loyalty or by intrigue with those who were disloyal. None knew until that crisis what his country was, how much he loved it, or the sacrifice he was willing to make to save it. It was only necessary to ask in the name of patriotism and loyalty, to be met by a response of sincerity and devotion. Sedition and treason were to be put down and the loyal people of Randolph county realized it was an enormous task and would require all that could be gotten in any form.

Randolph county had been for years Republican in politics, strongly opposed to the institution of slavery. Abolition societies and anti-slavery societies of all kinds had thrived and met with hearty approval. But it must not be understood that the loyal people were all to be found within the ranks of the Republican party, for many, many other people of other political faith offered themselves equally as willing a sacrifice to the cause. Among those who went to the front, political lines were ignored and there was but one common thought and that was to put down the rebellion.

The one great blot upon the history of the county in that great period is the treachery and disloyalty of some who remained at home and whose actions and organization have been spoken of otherwise under the head of the Knights of the Golden Circle.

It is not known how many men and boys enlisted from this county but it is known that more than 2,000 were found in the ranks, many, of course, enlisted in other counties and in other states, and it is impossible to know who they were. The only source of information is the report of Adjutant-General Terrell to the governor of Indiana, shortly after the close of the war. General Terrell did, no doubt, do all in his power, with the material at his command, to make a complete list of all the participants but the task was so great, the data so inaccurate and the records so incomplete it was impossible for him to get all. It is a known fact that out of the 208,367 names of soldiers enlisted from Indiana in the war of rebellion nothing is to be known of almost 45,000 of these soldiers, as to where they came from, and of that number about 14,000 wholly unaccounted for. It is unfortunate that the state has not since that time made a systematic effort to gain the information for record of these thousands of men who were as loyal and patriotic as those whose records are known. No doubt, many of these unknown are from

Randolph county and while it is our effort to give the names and due credit of each and every soldier, we wish in this way to express our appreciation and esteem of those whose names we have been unable to obtain. As we have said it has been estimated that more than 2,000 man and boys joined the union army in the war of 1861 from this county. Work shops were silenced, mills were stopped, stores were closed, farms were deserted, many and many a wife with the daughter maintained the home and cared as best she could for what was entrusted to her care.

We are acquainted with one particular case, which is no doubt greater in number than the usual case but no less in per cent than hundreds of the others which will show the response to the call to arms. Joab McNeese, a resident of Stoney Creek township, near Georgetown, had one son, twenty grandsons, one great grandson, and the husbands of ten granddaughters in the Civil war; another remarkable thing of this record is that nineteen of the twenty grandsons and the one great grandson and nine of the ten husbands of the granddaughters enlisted from Stoney Creek township and Monroe township. This is rather a remarkable record but is only one of hundreds that show the loyalty of Randolph county families.

Randolph county had representatives during the progress of the war everywhere in the front. At the opening conflicts of Richmond Mountain, Bull Run and Ball's Bluff, with Lion at Wilson's creek, Milligan at Lexington, South Mountain and Antietam, Shiloh and Vicksburg, New Orleans, Chickamauga and Chattanooga; with Sherman to the sea; with Sheridan in the Shenandoah, with Grant to Richmond, and in fact, everywhere they were to be found.

The prison-pens were honored by having them within their confines, and many Randolph county men can trace broken health and physical debility to the prison-pens of Libby, Danville, Florence, Savannah and Andersonville.

"Tender boys who had never slept off a feather bed in their lives, and who had lived abundantly and daintily always, went cheerfully to the field, wrapped their frames, weary with long marching, contentedly and even merrily, in their blankets, and lay down without a murmur on the cold, damp ground, or upon the rails laid in the mud to keep their bodies from actually sinking in the mire, after a supper made of corn shelled from the cob and hastily parched in a scanty fire kindled upon the ground. Hardships and privations, forced marches and camping without food or water in the woods and trenches; fierce and sanguinary battles, wounds, imprisonment and death —all these were borne cheerfully, as though it were a summer pastime, or accepted meekly as a sacrifice needful to be made for the defense of a country, the richest, the noblest and the best beneath the circuit of the sun.

Through all coming time, the war of 1861 in the United States will be reckoned to have been a conflict waged by the people, and carried on to the very end by their indomitable will and their unconquerable spirit; by their relentless determination that traitors should be made odious and that treason should be crushed.

And thus it came to pass, that, in spite of political generals, and commanders ignorant or dissipated, or even secretly tainted with covert sympathy for treason and hostile to liberty, the spirit of the common soldiery triumphed over every obstacle, and bore the country straight forward to assured and abundant victory and triumphant success."

The news of the firing on Ft. Sumter as it flashed over the land thrilled the people of Randolph county to a tension impossible to imagine. No sooner had the news arrived than companies began to organize and get ready for the inevitable conflict. Meetings were held in various parts of the county and most of them centered in and around Winchester, the county-seat. Committees were appointed to wait upon people, to solicit necessary provisions, especially bedding, and clothing, the government was wholly unprepared for such a conflict and it was evident that those who went to the front must be cared for by those who remained at home. At Winchester a public meeting was immediately called, committees were appointed to solicit clothing and blankets, the country was divided into sections and men placed in command of each section. Mr. Butterworth and Mr. Kemp were appointed to solicit along the Greenville pike and their experiences will only show the experience of all others similarly appointed.

Messrs. Kemp and Butterworth started on Saturday morning with a two-horse spring wagon to solicit; every one donated and gave so liberally that these men were unable to cover half their territory because it was impossible to carry what they had received in the two-horse wagon. On Sunday a monster mass meeting was held, a picture of which is shown elsewhere; a flag was presented to the first company raised in this county; this was Company "C" of the 8th, three months' service, Captain Silas Colgrove. The picture shows the flag which is being presented to this company. It was presented by a Miss Bryce, daughter of J. G. Bryce, county examiner. This is indeed a remarkable picture showing the intensity of the feeling of that day. It will be noticed that the picture was taken from the rear of the crowd. At that time an exposure of a minute or more was necessary to take a picture and yet no movement on the part of any one in the picture can be detected, so intense was their interest in what was being said, for they did not know the picture was being taken. (In this picture the man in the wagon is James S. Cottom, the first man leaning against the fence is Enos L. Watson, the second is Henry Kizer and the heavier gentleman to the right is Jerry Smith.) How little did the audience appreciate on that memorable day how often a scene of this kind was to take place in the next four years; how little did the mothers know of the sacrifice they would be called upon to make in that memorable conflict.

On the 13th of April, 1861, Ft. Sumter was evacuated and upon the receipt of this news, Sunday morning, April 14th, Governor Morton proceeded to arrange for troops and on the morning of April 15th telegraphed President Lincoln as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Indianapolis, April 15, 1861.

TO ABRAHAM LINCOLN, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

On behalf of the State of Indiana, I tender to you, for the defense of the Nation, and to uphold the authority of the Government, ten thousand men.

OLIVER P. MORTON,
Governor of Indiana.

The same day, President Lincoln called for 75,000 troops, and the quota of Indiana was set at 4,683 officers and men, to serve for three months.

The next day, April 16, Governor Morton called for six regiments.

The day after the call, 500 men were in camp. By the 19th of April, 2,400 men were on hand, and they were pouring in by every train, and in less than seven days, more than twelve thousand men had been tendered—nearly three times the number called for. One company was there from Randolph of 140 men, April 18, Captain Colgrove.

Orders were received from the President, April 20, to organize six regiments, and the work began the same day.

One company from Marion county was partly mustered on that day, and the rest of the sixty companies were organized as follows:

April 21—Five companies.

April 22—Nineteen companies and a half.

April 23—Ten companies, and eleven companies besides, not mustered into the six first regiments.

April 24—Fourteen companies.

April 25—Eleven companies.

And also, on that last day, April 25, the whole six regiments were completed and mustered into service.

When this work had been accomplished, there remained in camp at Indianapolis twenty-nine companies besides, and sixty-eight companies had been raised and tendered that had not come forward. Out of these, Governor Morton determined to organize several state one-year regiments, and instructed to form five such regiments.

On the 6th of May, the legislature passed an act requiring six regiments of state troops.

On the 11th of May, 1861, five regiments were reported as complete—the Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and, shortly afterward, the Seventeenth was mustered into service.

These 120 companies forming the twelve regiments were recruited from different counties to wit:

Allen, four companies; Bartholomew, three companies; Boone, one company; Benton, one company; Clay, one company; Clinton, one company; Cass, two companies; Carrol, one company; Delaware, one company; Dearborn, five companies; Daviess, one company; Decatur, two companies; Elkhart, one company; Floyd, two companies; Franklin, one company; Fountain, one company; Fayette, one company; Grant, one company; Howard, two companies; Henry, two companies; Hamilton, two companies; Hendricks, one company; Hancock, three companies; Huntington, one company; Jefferson, five companies; Jennings, two companies; Jackson, one company; Johnson, one company; Jasper, two companies; Kosciusko, two companies; Knox, two companies; La Porte, three companies; Morgan, one company; Marion, eight companies; Madison, one company; Montgomery, four companies; Miami, one company; Martin, one company; Monroe, one company; Ohio, one company; Owen, two companies; Porter, one company; Putnam, four companies; Parke, one company; Rush, one company; Randolph, one company (146 men); Ripley, two companies; Shelby, three companies; St. Joseph, two companies; Tippecanoe, four companies; Tipton, one company; Union, one company; Vigo, three companies; Vanderburg, one company; Vermillion, one company; Wayne, one company; Wabash, one company; Warren, one company; Washington, one company.

Seventeen companies were formed by taking the men for each from more than one county. Doubtless many, probably all the counties in the state not named above, sent volunteers in connection with other counties. Many of them were represented in the mixed companies above specified. The forty extra men from Randolph were sent home.

Regiments containing Randolph soldiers are the following, so far as known:

Eighth, three months; Sixth, three years; Seventh, three years; Eighth, three years; Ninth, three years; Eleventh, three years; Twelfth, three years; Thirteenth, three years; Sixteenth, Seventeenth, Nineteenth, Twentieth, Twenty-first (First heavy artillery), Twenty-seventh, Twenty-eighth (First cavalry), Thirty-first, Thirty-third, Thirty-fourth, Thirty-sixth, Forty-second, Forty-seventh, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-seventh, Sixty-ninth, Seventy-first, Seventy-fifth, Eighty-fourth, Eighty-ninth, Ninetieth, Ninety-seventh, Ninety-ninth, One Hundred and Fifth, One Hundred and Sixth, One Hundred and Ninth, One Hundred and Seventeenth, One Hundred and Nineteenth (Seventh cavalry), One Hundred and Twenty-first (Ninth cavalry), One Hundred and Twenty-fourth, One Hundred and Thirtieth, One Hundred and Thirtyfirst (Thirteenth cavalry), One Hundred and Thirty-fourth, One Hundred and Fortieth, One Hundred and Forty-seventh, Fortieth Ohio, etc.

This list may be even now incomplete, since it is true that many are put down to the wrong county, as Randolph men to Wayne, Jay county men to Randolph, etc., and for great numbers their places of residence were left entirely blank—a defect much to be regretted, indeed, but which, at this late day, it is impossible to supply.

Many Randolph soldiers also enlisted in regiments from other states, or in the regular United States service. For instance, a large number joined the Fortieth Ohio regiment, of which Col. Jonathan Cranor was the commanding officer.

Besides, most of the colored volunteers from Randolph (of whom there were many) joined in such a way that their names do not appear on the record made by the adjutant general's office as enlisting from Randolph, or, indeed, from the state of Indiana at all.

Very many, also, of the soldiers now residing in Randolph, enlisted from other counties, and many, too, even from other states, which fact causes the preparation of a full and accurate account of the soldiers of and in Randolph to be a task doubly and trebly difficult.

As we have said heretofore, Governor Morton and all the people saw with the volunteering of men would come the necessity for supplies. The national government was wholly unprepared for such an emergency. It became necessary for Governor Morton to organize the state into a great relief association. He called to his assistance men of prominence and ability from all the loyal parts of the state and Randolph county was honored by having one of its citizens, Asahel Stone, appointed as commissary general. Mr.

Stone proved himself an efficient officer and was one of the best supports of Governor Morton in this great movement. The soldiers were hurried to the front without much thought of the necessary supplies, especially that of clothing. They were rushed into mountainous country of Virginia and it soon became necessary for them to have extra clothing to protect them from the inclemency of the weather of that portion of the state.

Governor Morton immediately went to Washington and finding the government wholly unprepared, telegraphed to Indianapolis to "urge Major Montgomery, United States Quartermaster, to get overcoats of any good material and not wait for a public letting, do have them at once, the men are suffering and I am distressed, perhaps a few thousand can be forwarded by Captain Dickerson, at once, from Cincinnati." This was August 20th, 1861, and the men were already, as we have said, very much in need of these supplies. Montgomery failed to follow instructions. Dickerson, however, sent 4,000 overcoats to General Rosecrans, then in command in Western Virginia. Transportation was poor and careless and the overcoats were not delivered. Later in the year, September 14th, General Asahel Stone was ordered to give the matter his personal attention. He did so and found 1,200 of them and forwarded them as soon as possible to the iron brigade under the command of Brigadier-General Reynolds.

Morton resumed all responsibility for the pay of these supplies and through the state purchasing agent, Robert Dale Owen, purchased 29,000 overcoats, "regulation price," $7.75, but it was necessary to pay $9.25 for a part of them. Quartermaster General Meigs refused to allow Morton more than $7.75 to which Morton replied in his characteristic way, "if the United States will not pay for them, Indiana will, the troops must not suffer."

October 16, 1861, Governor Morton made an appeal, "To the patriotic women of Indiana for additional blankets, socks, gloves, mittens, shirts and drawers" and asked that these supplies be furnished immediately, which appeal the wives, mothers and daughters responded to with a lacrity to such a degree that in May, 1862, the state Quartermaster General, J. H. Vauejen reported: "This proclamation met with a most cordial response and many thousands of dollars worth of blankets, socks, gloves, mittens, shirts and drawers were forwarded, as also, sheets, pillows, pads, bandages, lint and dressing gowns, for hospital use, in so much that a circular was issued announcing that the supply was enough." It was through the energy and patriotism of Governor Morton that Indiana was the first to organize for temporary relief and General Stone was placed at the head of this department. The duty of this agency was "To render all possible relief to our soldiers, especially to the sick and wounded, whether in transit or in the hospital or on the battlefield."

It was a well-known fact that during the war Indiana relief was usually the first to appear and when it did appear Indiana soldiers were not the only ones to receive succor for the hearts of the people who sent it and the spirit of the governor who guided it went out to all men, regardless of the state they represented.

The state sanitary commissioner was also established in February, 1862. This organization received many and valuable contributions during the remainder of the Civil war. The Free Masons alone contributed $10,000.00 at one time and a great deal more at subsequent intervals. A fair was held in the fall of 1863 which netted $40,000.00. Boat loads of supplies were sent out to the front, one of these City Bell, under the control of General Stone, reached Vicksburg July 4, the day of its surrender. The recorded contributions of this state are known to be over five millions of dollars and no doubt the enormous amount of which no record was ever kept or could be kept reached into the millions, also, every possible means was employed to contribute to the relief and comfort of those directly interested, personally, in the "boys in blue".

The towns at all railway stations were organized for the purpose of feeding, and giving comfort to all soldiers who appear in their midst. At Winchester and Union City soldiers were transferred from one railroad to another. It was the pleasure of the citizens to feed them while there and thousands and thousands of meals have thus been served to soldiers entransit.

RELIEF FOR FAMILIES OF VOLUNTEERS.

A great majority of the people favored public relief and support for the families of all volunteers and it must be said to the everlasting credit of the county that no soldier's widow or orphan was allowed to be in need.

In June, 1861, the county commissioners instituted a movement for the "provisions for the support of the families of volunteers" and made the following entry in their minutes:

The following appointments of agents for the relief of the families of volunteers in the present war was passed by the board, to wit:

"WINCHESTER, IND., June 12th, 1861.

At the June term of the board of county commissioners the following persons were appointed agents for the relief of the families of the soldiers of Randolph county who have or may hereafter volunteer in defense of our country. The duty of said agents will be to inquire into and administer to the wants of such families and make report to this board at its next regular term to commence on the 1st Monday in September, next, when an allowance will be made for the payment of expenses so incurred. They will also carefully scrutinize the applicants for relief in order to guard the county against imposition.

White River township, Thomas Ward and Thomas L. Scott; Wayne township, H. L. Searl; Jackson township, James Simmons; Ward township, Robert Murray; Franklin township, J. H. Sanders; Green township, Philip Barger; Monroe township, Peter S. Miller; Stoney Creek township, Owen O. Thompson; Nettle Creek township, Samuel Burroughs; West River township, Stephen Keever; Washington township, David Semans; Greensfork township, Gideon Shaw.

(Signed) HICKS K. WRIGHT,
C. F. ALEXANDER,
Commissioners.

Attest:
GEORGE O. JOBES, Auditor."

It will be seen that each township was provided with an agent and it may be said that these agents or their successors were kept in service until the close of the war. Others who have served as agents of the relief fund were William Burress, Monroe township; B. F. W. Stewart, Dr. J. N. Converse and David Polly, Wayne; David L. Hiatt and John Johnson, of Washington; Thomas W. Kizer, John B. Goodrich and Arthur Quick, of White River; Olney Whipple, Ward; William Freeman, Nettle Creek; David Kitselman, Elisha T. Bailey, of Franklin, and perhaps others whose names we have been unable to secure.

Provisions and clothing were furnished to the families of the volunteers. For this purpose in the year ending June 1st, 1862, the county paid out $1,937.99.

For the year ending June 1st, 1863	$4,527.93
For the year ending June 1st, 1864	8,590.23
For the year ending June 1st, 1865	4,021.00
For the year ending June 1st, 1866	20,320.00
For the year ending June 1st, 1867	2,460.55
For the year ending June 1st, 1868	1,271.40

For the year ending June 1st, 1869	438.00
For the year ending June 1st, 1870	162.00
For the year ending June 1st, 1871	15.00
Making a total of	$43,744.10

It will be noticed that the heaviest relief was paid in 1866. The funds of the county during that year were very low and in the opinion of the commissioners, it became necessary to make a new rule of distribution. Consequently, January 9th, 1866, the following entry was made and observed during the remainder of the time for which bounty was paid:

"It is ordered by the board that the disbursing officers of the Soldiers' Relief Fund for the various townships, be instructed or notified by the auditor to curtail their disbursements in the following manners, to wit: "Persons who have been or who are receiving a pension in any amount are not to receive relief from the relief fund of said county and all others to receive only fifty per cent. or one-half of what they have been receiving heretofore, as allowed by law. The provisions of this order to be complied with from this date, January 9th, 1866.

C. F. ALEXANDER,
H. K. WRIGHT,
NATHAN REED."

There is no doubt of the sincerity of the commissioners in the above action as they showed themselves at all times to be willing and ready and anxious to provide for the relief of worthy applicants. It is only natural to presume that some abuse would be made of the privilege of furnishing provisions but only in one case was any deduction made from the bill of any one selling to families receiving aid under this provision.

The adjutant general's report as to relief shows that Randolph county paid a total of $94,447.53, being exceeded by only eleven counties in the state, these counties were Decatur, Delaware, Hamilton, Jackson, Laporte, Marion, St. Joseph, Tippecanoe, Vigo, Wabash and Wayne.

COUNTY BOUNTY.

"Thursday, July 24, 1862.

"Pursuant to summons issued by the Auditor in conformity with law the board met in special session present A. McKew, C. F. Alexander.

"The board having been convened for the purpose of taking such action as they may think best in regard to offering a bounty to persons who may volunteer in the United States army and also to take such action as they may think best in regard to providing for the families of such volunteers.

"It is ordered by the board that the auditor be instructed to issue an order for ten dollars to each person who may volunteer in Randolph county to be paid to such volunteer when accepted and sworn into the service of the United States Army for three years or during the war. (Commissioned officers not included.)

A. McKEW,
C. F. ALEXANDER."

Evidently through discussion of the public the court was convinced that $10.00 was not as much as the county could afford to pay, hence on Tuesday, July 29:

"At a special session of the board of county commissioners of Randolph county begun and held in Winchester in July 29th, 1862, there was present A. McKew, C. F. Alexander and A. DeVoss.

"Ordered by the board that there be an allowance of twenty dollars in addition to that heretofore appropriated to each person who may volunteer in the service of the United States, one-half to be paid in one year with interest from date and the balance from two years with interest from date. The orders to be issued when the volunteers has been (been) accepted and sworn into the service, and the auditor is hereby authoried to issue said orders when the above conditions have been complied with.

A. McKEW,
C. F. ALEXANDER,
A. DEVOSS."

This order remained in force until a special session held November 21, 1863, when the following order was made:

"It is ordered by the board that the county pay to each person who has or who may hereafter volunteer in the United States Army for the term of three years or during the war the sum of thirty dollars as a bounty to be paid as follows: ten dollars in cash, ten dollars in one year with interest from date and ten dollars in two years from date with interest, said interest to cease on both orders as soon as the county treasurer advertises that there are funds on hands to redeem said orders and provided that said persons to be entitled to the above bounty must be citizens of Randolph county at the time of volunteering and provided further that any tax that may be due the county by said volunteer shall be deducted from the amount of said bounty and the commissioned officers of the company or regiment are not to be entitled to the said bounty.

"The above bounty is to be paid only to those who volunteer to fill the quoto of Randolph county in the call of the President for three hundred thousand additional volunteers and dated ————————, 1863. The orders to be issued when the volunteer is mustered in the service.

C. F. ALEXANDER,
A. DEVOSS,
A. MCKEW."

This order remained in force until January 16, 1865, when the following order, which is self-explanatory, is made:

"It was ordered by the board that there be a county bounty of forty dollars paid to each person who may Volunteer in the United Sates services under the call of December 19th, 1864, provided said bounty is not to be paid until after such volunteer shall have been mustered into the services and credited to Randolph county. Twenty dollars of said bounty to be paid in cash and twenty to be paid in one year from date, of said muster in—With interest from date and it is further ordered that each township shall be entitled to said amount of forty dollars as above for each person necessary to fill the quoto of said township under said call.

A. MCKEW,
C. F. ALEXANDER,
H. K. WRIGHT."

Under these various orders county bounties were paid for the year ending June 1st, 1863, $18,450.00; for the year ending June 1st, 1864, $8,700.00; for the year ending June 1st, 1865, $7,420.00; for the year ending June 1st, 1866, $950.00; for the year ending June 1st, 1867, $2,050; for the year ending June 1st, 1868, $240.00; for the year ending June 1, 1869, $60.00; for the year ending June 1st, 1870, $60.00; totaling $37,930.00. No bounty was paid after that time.

The largest number to apply for bounty at one time was when the forty-two members of the 7th Indiana cavalry applied for bounty March 14, 1866. The petition was "not allowed because contrary to law."

However, December 7th, that year, the board made the following entry:

"It is hereby ordered by the board that the application for county bounty of persons who enlisted in July and August, 1863, for three years or during the war, and who served during their continuance in said service as enlisted men, in the Seventh Ind. vol. cavalry, and who were credited on the quoto of said Co. be allowed, and that they be paid the sum of thirty dollars each under and according to the provisions of an order of this board dated November 21st, 1863."

The total of the amounts for relief of volunteers of county bounty, although amounting to thousands of dollars, is a mere pittance for the services rendered by these noble men, who gave their services and lives for the cause of the union. It is said that the United States pays more bountiful in pensions than any other nation the world has known. This is a mark of honor, distinction, and appreciation.

"Such struggles, such burdens born, such sacrifices made, men, money, means, so freely, so lavishly, so persistently given—such hardships, perils, sufferings, wounds and imprisonment and death so heroically endured, such fearful things undergone through four long bloody years over the face of a vast continent."

Each and every citizen of the county will always be interested in a detailed account of the heroes of Randolph county and we give the following most of which is taken from the adjutant-general's report to the governor:

ACCOUNT OF REGIMENTS.

Eighth Regiment Infantry, three months—The Eighth Regiment of Infantry of Indiana Volunteers was mustered in the service April 25, 1861, William P. Benton, colonel. The muster-in took place at Indianapolis, and the muster-out at the same place, August 6, 1861. The statistics of the regiment are as follows:

Companies, 10, A to K inclusive; officers, 37; men, 747; total, 784; died, 7, deserters, 15; accounted for, 784.

Each company consisted of seventy-four men. They were enlisted as follows:

Company A, April 21, Wayne county.
Company B, April 23, Grant county.
Company C, April 24, Randolph county.
Company D, April 21, Delaware county
Company E, April 22, Madison county.
Company F, April 25, Henry county.

Company G, April 22, Wayne county.
Company H, April 25, Wayne county.
Company I, April 21, Hancock county.
Company K, April 23, Wabash county.

The regiment was made up of three from Wayne, one from Grant, one from Randolph, one from Delaware, one from Wabash, one from Madison, one from Hancock and one from Henry.

They remained in camp at Indianapolis until June 19, 1861, when they were ordered to Western Virginia, which was reached by rail via Cincinnati, Marietta and Parkersburg. Remaining at Clarksburg two days, the regiment marched thirty miles to Buckhannon, to find the rebels, who had, however, moved to Rich Mountain. Thither the troops marched July 9, and lay in camp July 10 in front of the foe, ascending the mountain the next day; fought the battle of Rich Mountain July 11, 1861, driving the rebels from their position on the mountain, and sustaining a loss of three killed and seventeen wounded.

Going into camp at Beverly for two weeks, on the 24th of July, they returned to Indianapolis, and were soon afterwards mustered out of service, August 6, 1861.

The troops in the campaign in Western Virginia performed good service. At the expiration of the term, Maj. Gen. McClellan addressed Governor Morton as follows.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF OCCUPATION,
WEST VIRGINIA, CAMP NEAR BEVERLY,
July 21, 1861.

Gov. O. P. MORTON, Indianapolis, Ind.:

Governor—I have directed the three months' regiments from Indiana to move to Indianapolis; there to be mustered out and re-organized for three years' service.

I can not permit them to return to you without again expressing my high appreciation of the distinguished valor and endurance of the Indiana troops, and my hope that a short time only will elapse before I shall have the pleasure of knowing that they are again ready for the field.

I am, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN,
Major General United States Army

Brig. Gen. Morris also issued an address to his brigade, an extract from which is here given:

"The General tenders to all his thanks for the soldierly bearing, the cheerful performance of every duty and the patient endurance of the privations and fatigues of campaign life which all have so constantly exhibited. * * * They have cheerfully endured the fatigues of long and dreary marches by day and night, through rain and storm; they have borne the exhaustion of hunger for the sake of the country. Their labor and sufferings were not in vain. The foe they met and vanquished. Your friends welcome you with pride and exultation. Your state and country acknowledge the value of your labors."

After the dissolution of the regiment, the great body of its members reentered service in the Eighth Indiana Infantry, enlisted for three years. The officers and men from Randolph county belonging to the Eighth Indiana Three Month's Regiment are as follows: Lieutenant Colonel, Silas Colgrove, mustered out; re-entered service as Colonel Twenty-seventh regiment. (Where no time is given the person was mustered out at the close of service.)

Company C, Eighth, three months—Captain, Silas Colgrove, promoted lieutenant colonel April 26, 1861, Thomas J. Lee, resigned; first lieutenant, E. M. Ives, mustered out, term expired; second lieutenant, Allen O. Neff, mustered out, time expired; re-entered service as sergeant in the Eighth regiment, three years; promoted second lieutenant.

Non-commissioned officers—Jonathan B. Harrison, first sergeant; Samuel Humphrey, Michael P Voris, Thomas S. Kennon, sergeants; John McConnell, Benjamin Shoemaker, James Addington, Sylvanus White, corporals; Jackson Keller, John W. Thomas, musicians.

Charles Souke, Edward Stanton, Charles M. Stine, Jefferson Stoner, Samuel Strahan, David B. Strahan, James M. Thomas, Henry T. Way, Jesse Way, Samuel H. Webb, William H. Weaver, Samuel Williams, William H. Williams, John Yost.

Company G—Second Lieutenant, George W. H. Riley, promoted captain Company C. Captain in Eighth Three Years' Infantry; also lieutenant colonel, One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Indiana regiment. No losses or casualties occurred in Company C. Every man came back safe and sound as he went out, leaving his country better for the peril he had undergone in her behalf, and happy in the experience he had gained in the brief campaign spent among the bluffs and mountains of Western Virginia.

SIXTH INDIANA INFANTRY (THREE YEARS).

Was mustered in at Indianapolis, September 20, 1861; Colonel, T. T. Crittenden. Mustered out at Chattanooga, September 22, 1864. Officers, 46; men, 950; recruits, 126; died, 242; deserters, 48; unaccounted for, 10; total, 1,118.

The Sixth regiment was re-organized from the Sixth Three Months' regiment September 20, 1861. Its first service was to cross to Louisville, Ky., then threatened by Buckner, which it performed the very day of its organization, being the first body of troops to enter Kentucky from a northern state. They marched to Muldraugh's Hill, forty miles distant, camping near Elizabethtown. The Sixth was assigned to Rousseau's brigade, of McCook's division, and marched with the division to Munfordsville and Bowling Green, and, in March, 1862, to Nashville; March 29, 1862, they left for the Tennessee river, reaching Shiloh April 7 and fighting bravely in the battle of Shiloh, April 8, saving a battery from capture, and with a determined charge aiding to turn the tide of victory. The regiment was in the siege and battle of Corinth.

They then marched with Buell's army through Tuscumbia, Huntsville, Florence and Stevenson to Nashville and to Louisville, arriving October 2, 1862. Thence they returned to Tennessee, marching with Rosecrans upon Murfreesboro, and fighting in the battle of Stone River December 31, 1862, January 1 and 2, 1863.

The regiment campaigned between Murfreesboro and Chattanooga during the summer of 1863. It was at Chickamauga, September 19 and 20, Col. Baldwin being killed on the first day. It skirmished at Brown's Ferry, October 27, and fought at Mission Ridge November 25. They marched into east Tennessee and remained till the spring of 1864.

The gallant Sixth returned to northern Georgia for the Atlanta campaign, taking part at Tunnel Hill, Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Buzzard Roost, Dallas, New Hope, Allatoona Ridge, Kenesaw Mountain, Marietta and before Atlanta.

They returned to Chattanooga in August and the body of the regiment was mustered out September 22, 1864. The veterans (few in number) and the recruits were transferred to the Sixty-eighth Indiana. When that regiment was mustered out, nineteen of the old Sixth were found still in service, and they were again transferred to the Forty-fourth, and were mustered out with that regiment September 14, 1865.

The engagements of the Sixth were as follows. Philippi, Va., June 3, 1861 (three months' service); Carrick's Ford, Va., July 12, 1861 (three months' service); Shiloh, Tenn., April 6, 7, 1862; Corinth, Miss., siege, April 11, to May 30, 1862; Stone River, Tenn., December 31, 1862, to January 1, 2, 1863; Chickamauga, Tenn., September 19, 20, 1863; Brown's Ferry, Tenn., October 27, 1863; Mission Ridge, Ga., November 25, 1863; Tunnel Hill, Ga., May 7, 1864; Rocky Face Ridge, Ga., May 6, 1864; Buzzard's Roost, Ga., May 8, 1864; Resaca, Ga., May 15, 1864; New Hope Church, Ga., May 25, 1864; Dallas, Ga., May 27, 1864; Allatoona Ridge, Ga., 1864; Kenesaw Mountain, Ga., June 27, 1864; Marietta, Ga., July 3, 1864; Atlanta, Ga., July 21 to September 2, 1864.

The service rendered by the Sixth was honorable and faithful, and it was nobly and cheerfully performed.

MEMBERS FROM RANDOLPH COUNTY.

Company H, Sixth Indiana, three years—William H. Johnson, wounded at Chickamauga, Tenn., September 20, 1853.

Hiram Phillips, appointed corporal, mustered out September 22, 1864.

James Chandler, died October 1, 1863, wounded at Chickamauga.

SEVENTH INDIANA INFANTRY (THREE YEARS).

Mustered in at Indianapolis, September 13, 1861; Colonel, Ebenezer Dumont. Mustered out in the field September 20, 1864. Officers, 45; men, 1,001; recruits, 207; veterans, 46; died, 212; deserters, 26; unaccounted for, 27; total, 1,299.

The Seventh regiment was re-organized for three years September 13, 1861, under Col. Dumont, and moved immediately to Western Virginia, joining Gen. Reynolds at Cheat Mountain, October 3, 1861; it was in the battle at Greenbrier, Va., and shortly afterward marched into Shenandoah Valley, camping there through the winter.

The regiment fought at Winchester Heights, March 30, 1862, and at Port Republic, Va., June 9, 1862, and at Front Royal, Va., June 12, 1862. Marching under Gen. Shields to Fredericksburg and back to the Shenandoah, it was assigned to Gen. McDowell's division. They were with Pope in the army of Virginia, being engaged at Slaughter Mountain, August 9, 1862, and at Second Bull Run, August 30, 1862. They pursued Lee into Maryland, and fought at Antietam, Md., September 17, 1862, with a loss of two killed and eight wounded. At Ashby's Gap, Va., their loss was four killed and six wounded. It took part in the great battle of Fredericksburg, Va., under Burnside, December 13, 1862. They were at Chancellorsville, Va., May 2 to 5, 1863, and at Gettysburg, Penn., July 1 to 4, 1863, losing heavily in both battles. The regiment was engaged at Mine Run, Va., November 30, 1863. After camping at Culpepper, Vt., till the spring of 1864, they moved with Grant in the fearful campaign of that awful year through the "great and terrible Wilderness" and most of the sanguinary battles during that fearful summer. They fought in the campaign of 1864 in front of Richmond, as given below:

Wilderness, May 5, 6, 1864; Laurel Hill, May 7, 1864; Spottsylvania, May 10, 1864; Po River, May 10 to 12, 1864; North Anna, May 25, 1864; Bethesda Church, May 30, 31, 1864; Cold Harbor, June 3, 1864. The assault on Petersburg was made June 16, 1864, and the Seventh was in that fierce but unsuccessful attack. It remained in the siege of Petersburg till August 18, and then moved to cut the Weldon railroad, and took part in the fight at Yellow House, Va., August 19, 1864. On the 23d of September, 1864, the Seventh was consolidated with the Nineteenth, under the name of the Nineteenth, and this new regiment again with the new Twentieth (made up of the Fourteenth and Twentieth united) October 18, 1864.

Its members were mustered out with the Twentieth Indiana, July 12, 1865, returning to Indianapolis for payment and final discharge. Its battles were these:

Greenbrier, Va., October 3, 1861; Winchester Heights, Va., March 23, 1862; Port Republic, Va., June 9, 1862; Front Royal, Va., June 12, 1862; Slaughter Mountain, Va., August 9, 1862; Second Bull Run, Va., August 30, 1862; Antietam, Va., September 17, 1862; Ashby's Gap, Va., November 2, 1862; Fredericksburg, Va., December 13, 1862; Chancellorsville, Va., May 2 to 5, 1863; Gettysburg, Penn., July 1 to 4, 1863; Mine Run, Va., November 30, 1863; Wilderness, Va., May 5, 6, 1864; Laurel Hill, Va., May 8, 1864; Spottsylvania, Va., May 10, 12, 1864; Po River, Va., May 8 to 10, 1864; North Anna, Va., May 25, 1864; Bethesda Church, Va., May 30, 31, June 1, 1864; Cold Harbor, Va., June 3, 1864; assault on Petersburg, Va., June 16, 1864; siege of Petersburg, Va., June 17, August 18, 1864; Weldon Railroad, Va., August 18, 1864; Yellow House, Va., August 19, 1864.

A formidable list of battles indeed for a single regiment! Twenty-three engagements, and among them Second Bull Run, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Cold Harbor and Petersburg. The blood curdles at the heart only to think of so fearful an experience of three such long years of hardship, peril and bloodshed as was undergone by the heroic and unconquerable Seventh Indiana.

The men in the Seventh Indiana (three years) from Randolph county are as follows:

Company B, Seventh Indiana Infantry—John M. Bray, discharged February 9, 1862; disability.

Wesley Bray, transferred to Twentieth regiment; died.

li Gregory, transferred to Twentieth regiment; captured; died in Salisbury, Prison, November 22, 1864.

EIGHTH INDIANA INFANTRY (THREE YEARS).

Mustered in at Indianapolis, September 5, 1861; Colonel, William P. Benton. Mustered out at Savannah, Ga., August 28, 1865. Officers, 46; men, 1,000; recruits, 177; re-enlisted, 480; unassigned recruits, 17; died, 245; deserted, 75; unaccounted for, 47; total, 1,672.

The Eighth Indiana regiment of infantry left Indianapolis, September 10, 1861, arriving at St. Louis the next day. Joining Gen. Fremont's army shortly, they marched to Jefferson City, reaching that town September 14, staying there a week, and while there being united with the brigade commanded by Col. Jeff. C. Davis, of the Twenty-second Indiana volunteers. September 22, the regiment set out for Springfield. Reaching that place in fourteen days, they returned to Otterville in seven days. At Warrensburg, Mo., they aided in capturing 1,300 rebels, December 17, 1861. Returning to Otterville, the regiment encamped till January 24, 1862, and then joined Gen. Curtis at Springfield, continuing the march to Cross Timbers, Ark., soon after which the Eighth participated in the great battle of Pea Ridge, Ark., March 6, 7 and 8, 1862. Remaining at Cross Timbers nearly a month, the regiment crossed the Ozark Mountains, marched down White river valley, and so to Batesville, Ark. They made a halt for two months at Sulphur Rock. Helena on the Mississippi was reached July 13, 1862. This march was a severe journey, provisions being very scarce and hard to get. Four ears of corn and a little meat were often a day's rations. On this march the battle of Cotton Plant was fought.

In August, the battle of Austin took place; October 6, 1862, they were put under command of Gen. Steele, went to Sulphur Hill, near St. Louis, thence to Ironton, where they arrived October 11. The regiment was kept on the march to and fro in southeast Missouri till March 5, 1863. They were then sent to Milliken's Bend, where they were assigned to Benton's Brigade, in Carr's Division of the Thirteenth corps, McClernand commanding. April 29, 1863, the regiment crossed the Mississippi, and helped to fight the battles near Port Gibson, losing thirty-two; they were at Jackson May 14; at Champion Hills May 16; at Black River Bridge May 17, and in the siege of Vicksburg from May 19 till July 4.

July 5, the regiment went again to Jackson. The place was captured and the troops returned to Vicksburg, July 24, remaining there till August 20. They were then ordered to Carrollton, near New Orleans, by steamer, as also across the country through the Teche region, under Gen. Banks, and thence via Berwick City over the waters of the Gulf to Texas. November 17, the fort on Mustang Island, near Aransas Pass, was taken by the Union troops, and, November 27, Fort Esperanza was captured.

They went thence to Indianola, and there re-enlisted as veterans, January 1, 1864, 417 out of 517 being mustered into the new organization. Before this time, the losses by death in the regiment were as follows: Killed in action, 48; died of wounds, 32; died of disease, 137; total, 217. Of course, a larger number still had been discharged for disability, while yet many recruits had joined their ranks.

The regiment in the spring received a furlough and reached Indianapolis, April 22. In May, they returned to the south, went to Morganza Bend, July 27, and defeated the confederates at Atchafalaya July 28. Soon afterward, this veteran regiment was transferred from the extreme South to the army on the Atlantic seaboard. They reached Washington City, August 12, 1864, being sent immediately to Berryville, Va., and joined the Nineteenth corps. They were with Sheridan in the Shenandoah valley camping, being present in the battles of Opequan, Fisher's Hill and Cedar Creek, September 19 and 22 and October 19. January 16, 1865, the regiment left for Savannah, Ga., by way of Baltimore, reaching the former place January 26, 1865, after a rail and steamer trip of ten days. It was retained on duty in Georgia till August, 1865.

They were mustered out (probably at Savannah) August 28, 1865. They arrived at Indianapolis, September 17, 1865, under Col. John R. Polk, with fourteen officers and 245 men.

Gov. Morton addressed the returned veterans in words of blended welcome and farewell, as they were assembled in his presence in the capitol, and that heroic band of faithful comrades, many of whom had gone through fire and flood together and traversed a continent in company, gave each to each the parting hand and sought each for himself his home and family and friends.

The travels of the Eighth were a marvel. To St. Louis, Jefferson, Springfield; to Cross Timbers, Pea Ridge; across through the Arkansas swamps to Helena; back to St. Louis again; down the river to Vicksburg, thence to New Orleans; through Louisiana to Texas, home on a furlough, and to New Orleans; thence by a single movement to the eastern slope of the Alleghanies and the sea; to the Shenandoah and to Georgia, and at last, "when that cruel war was over," they made just one more movement, from the waters of the Gulf to the lovely valley of the Ohio, and to the homes of their childhood and the abodes of their youth and manhood.

The engagements in which the Eighth took part are given below in a connected view:

Warrensburg, Mo., December 17, 1861; Pea Ridge, Ark., March 6, 7, 8, 1862; Cotton Plant, Ark., July 7, 1862; Austin, Miss., August, 1862; Port Gibson, Miss., May 1, 1863; Jackson, Miss., May 14, 1863; Champion Hills, May 16, 1863; Black River Bridge, May 17, 1863; siege of Vicksburg, May 19 to July 4, 1863; siege of Jackson, July 9 to 16, 1863; Mustang Island, Texas, November 17, 1863; Fort Esperanza, Texas, November 17, 1863; Atchafalaya, La., July 28, 1864; Opequan, Va., September 19, 1864; Fisher's Hill, Va., September 22, 1864; Cedar Creek, Va., October 19, 1864.

The officers and soldiers from Randolph county in the Eighth Indiana infantry (three years), are as follows:

NINTH INDIANA INFANTRY (THREE YEARS)

Mustered in at LaPorte, Ind., September 5, 1861; Colonel, Robert H. Milroy. Mustered out in Texas September 28, 1865. Officers, 47; men, 1,010; recruits, 747; veterans, 291; died, 351; deserted, 125; unaccounted for, 18; total 2,195.

The regiment went first to Western Virginia, encamping on Cheat Mountain summit for winter quarters, participating in the battle of Greenbrier, October 3, and of Alleghany, December 13, 1861. January 9, 1862, they marched to Fetterman, Va., remaining till February 19, 1862. They were then sent by rail to Cincinnati and to Nashville by steamer, joining Gen. Buell's army. March 29, 1862, the regiment marched to Tennessee river, taking part in the second day's fight at Shiloh, April 7, 1862; thence to Corinth, Miss. They marched thence to Athens, Ala., and Franklin and Murfreesboro, Tenn., to Nashville; thence to Bowling Green and back to Nashville; thence by Louisville and in pursuit of Bragg to Perryville; thence by Danville and Crab Orchard to the Wildcat Mountains and to Nashville.

In these marches, the Ninth regiment was engaged in the battles of Perryville, Danville and Wildcat Mountain. They afterward marched to Murfreesboro and were at Stone River, Tenn., marching thence over the Cumberland Mountains and the Tennessee river to Chattanooga. They fought at Chickamauga, Lookout Mountain and Mission Ridge, thence across the Cumberland range again to Bridgeport and to Whiteside, Tenn. Here the soldiers of the Ninth re-enlisted as veterans, December 12, 1863, taking veteran furlough, and left Valparaiso, Ind., for the front February 21, 1864, passing through Indianapolis, Louisville, Nashville and Chattanooga to Cleveland, Tenn. The regiment went through the entire Atlantic campaign, during the spring and summer of 1864, marching through Ringgold, Dalton, Resaca, Kingston, Cassville, around Allatoona Mountain, to Ackworth, Big Shanty and Marietta and in the flank movement around Atlanta; through Jonesboro and Lovejoy, and back to Atlanta. In this campaign of months of solid fighting, the soldiers of the Ninth fought at Taylor's Ridge, Buzzard's Roost, Dalton, Resaca, Cassville, Dallas, New Hope Church, Kenesaw, Marietta, Peach Tree Creek, Atlanta, Jonesboro and Lovejoy. They pursued Hood to Dalton, marching thence to Athens and to Pulaski, Tenn, arriving November 1, 1864. It was engaged at Columbia, Tenn., at Franklin and at Nashville, and chased Hood's flying legions to Huntsville, Ala., remaining there from January 6 to March 13, 1865. They then passed into East Tennessee, beyond Bull's Gap, and back to Nashville, reaching it May 25, 1865. It was sent thence to New Orleans and to Texas, remaining as part of Sheridan's Army of occupation till September, 1865, when it was mustered out of service, in Texas, and the soldiers were sent to their respective homes.

The battles of the Ninth Indiana infantry are as follows: Greenbrier, Va., October 3, 1861; Alleghany, Va., December 13, 1861; Shiloh, Tenn., April 7, 1862; Corinth (seige), April 11, to May 30, 1862; Perryville, Ky., October 8, 1862; Danville, Ky., 1862; Wildcat Mountain, Ky., October 21, 1862; Stone River, Tenn., December 31, 1862, January 1, 2, 1863; Chickamauga, Tenn., September 19, 20, 1863; Lookout Mountain, Ga., November 24, 1863; Mission Ridge, Ga., November 25, 1863; Taylor's Ridge, Ga., May, 1864; Buzzard's Roost, Ga., May 8, 1864; Resaca, Ga., May 15, 1864; Cassville, Ga., May 19, 1864; Dallas, Ga., May 27, 1864; New Hope Church, Ga., May 25, 1864; Kenesaw Mountain, June 27, 1864; Marietta, Ga., July 3, 1864; Atlanta, Ga., July 21, September 2, 1864; Jonesboro, Ga., September 1, 1864; Dalton, Ga., August 15, 1864; Lovejoy, Ga., September 2, 1864; Columbia, Tenn., November 26, 1864; Franklin, Tenn., November 30, 1864; Nashville, Tenn., December 15, 16, 1864.

The Ninth regiment, it will be noticed, did their full share of fighting, being engaged in twenty-six battles, to say nothing of skirmishes, etc. Many of them were chief among the engagements of the war—Shiloh, Perryville, Stone River, Chickmauga, Lookout Mountain, Mission Ridge, Resaca, Kenesaw, Franklin, Nashville—ten large battles make a strong showing for the record of the Ninth Indiana.

The members of the Ninth Indiana (three years) from Randolph county are as follows:

Company A—Charles Anderson, mustered out June 20, 1865; Francis M. Singer, assigned, never reported.

Company C—Samuel Armstrong, died May 23, 1865; Eli Cadwallader, Job Horner, Jeremiah Horn, mustered out July 9, 1865.

Substitutes—William C. Blizzard, mustered out September 27, 1865; Eli Burkett, died of disease December 18, 1864; Silas S. Clark, Peter Funderburg, mustered out September 28, 1865; Thomas K. Karnes, record indefinite; James McFetridge, died June 17, 1865, disease.

Company G—Col. N. Steele, mustered out June 20, 1865.

Company H—Wilson Benning, mustered out September 28, 1865; Jonathan Edwards, mustered out June 19, 1865; Robert Engle, record indefinite; Daniel Fry, mustered out August 13, 1865; Henry Garrett, William F. Stillwell, mustered out June 19, 1865; James N. Wright, mustered out June 19, 1865; Jacob D. Bales, mustered out May 30, 1865; Austin F. Conyer, James P. Ellis, Philip W. Miller, mustered out September 28, 1865; James Nicholas, died January 15, 1865; Aaron Oren, mustered out May 30, 1865 (the last six were substitutes).

Company I—John W. Clark, mustered out June 21, 1865; Josiah French, died at Nashville, Tenn., January 5, 1865, disease.

Company K—David Boocher, mustered out September 28, 1865, absent, sick; Joseph Devoss, mustered out June 20, 1865; David A. Green, discharged May 25, 1865, disability; Joshua Green, mustered out May 23, 1865; John A. Green, Elias Phillips, David A. Switzer, mustered out June 20, 1865; John W. Switzer, discharged June 8, 1865, disability; Isaiah Woodard, died at Knoxville, Tenn., April 30, 1865; Sylvester Willey, discharged June 8, 1865, disability; Darius Orr, mustered out May 20, 1865.

BATTLES—TWELFTH REGIMENT.

Richmond, Ky., 173 killed and wounded; regiment mostly taken prisoners; Col. Link killed.

Battles of the Vicksburg campaign, Mission Ridge, Atlanta Campaign, Griswoldsville, Savannah, Columbia and Bentonville.

The regiment returned to Indianapolis 270 strong, and were publicly received by Gov. Morton, June 14, 1865.

The recruits and drafted men were transferred to the Forty-eighth and Fifty-ninth regiments, and kept in service another month, being mustered out July 15 and 17, 1865, at Louisville, Ky.

Men belonging to the Twelfth Indiana from Randolph county:

Company A—Joseph Urick, mustered out June 8, 1865; Benjamin Mann, mustered out June 8, 1865.

THIRTEENTH INDIANA INFANTRY, THREE YEARS.

Mustered in at Indianapolis, June 19, 1861; Colonel J. C. Sullivan.

Mustered out at Goldsboro, N. C., September 5, 1865.

Officers, 41; men, 1,006; recruits, 232; veterans, 148; died, 136; deserted, 103; unaccounted for, 25; total, 1,427.

The Thirteenth was one of the earliest six regiments for three years from Indiana, viz.:

Twelfth, May 11, 1861; Sixteenth, May 11, 1861; Fourteenth, June 7, 1861; Seventeenth, June 12, 1861; Fifteenth, June 14, 1861; Thirteenth, June 19, 1861.

It left for the field July 4, 1861, reaching McClellan's forces at the base of Rich Mountain, July 10, going into the action of Rich Mountain the next day, with eight killed and nine wounded. September 12 and 13, the battles of Cheat Mountain and Elkwater were fought, and the Thirteenth was engaged in both.

The regiment fought at Greenbriar and Alleghany, and at Winchester Heights, March 22, 1862, losing six killed and thirty-three wounded; also pursuing Stonewall Jackson to New Market and Columbia Bridge. At Summerville their loss was four wounded and twenty-four prisoners. They marched over the Blue Ridge to McDowell, and were sent back to Shenandoah Valley, June 28, 1862; they were sent to Harrison's Landing on the James, and afterward to Fortress Monroe and to Suffolk on the Nansemond river. There they stayed nine months, engaging in numerous operations. Among them were reconnoissances to Blackwater, October 3, November 7, December 15; battle of Deserted Farm, January 30, 1865.

Repulse of Gen. Longstreet from Suffolk, April 10, May 3, 1863; tearing up forty miles of track from the two railroads May 13 and 19, 1863. They marched 400 miles and lost two killed, nineteen wounded and seven prisoners.

After destroying railroads north of Richmond, the regiment was dispatched to Charleston harbor, reaching Folly Island, August 3, 1863, and taking part in the siege of Forts Wagner and Gregg, entering the first into Fort Wagner in the assault against that fort September 7.

The regiment veteranized on Folly Island, December, 1863, and the veterans reached Indianapolis on home furlough January 1, 1864.

Returning to their flag, the regiment was with Gen. Seymour at Jacksonville in Florida until April 17, 1864, and was then transferred to Gen. Butler's army in front of Richmond, arriving at Bermuda Hundred, May 5, 1864.

They were in the actions of Wathal Junction, May 7, Chester Station, May 16, and Foster's Farm, May 20, losing in the three engagements about two hundred men. They were at Cold Harbor, June 3, and in various actions with the Potomac Army until June 12, and then returned to Bermuda Hundred, aiding in the assault on Petersburg, June 16. The non-veterans left the regiment June 19, going to Indianapolis to be mustered out.

The regiment was at the fatal charge on Petersburg after the explosion of the mine July 30, 1864, as also at Strawberry Plains, Chapin's Bluff and the attack on the rebel works before Richmond, October 10, 1864. They were ordered to New York to assist in preserving order at the elections in November, and returned December 3 to join the expedition against Fort Fisher.

When the non-veterans left, the regiment was formed at first into a battalion of five companies, but was afterward made a full regiment by adding five companies of drafted men.

January 3, 1865, the regiment sailed against Fort Fisher, assisting to capture that stronghold, as also Fort Anderson on the 19th of February, 1865. They were a part of the forces that occupied Wilmington, February 22, and after some weeks marched to Raleigh, arriving April 14, and remaining there until July 20, 1865. Thence they went to Goldsboro, and were mustered out at that place September 5, starting for Indianapolis, September 7, and arriving September 15, 1865, with twenty-nine officers and 550 enlisted men.

Men from Randolph county in the Thirteenth:

NOTE—A larger number is unaccounted for than in any other regiment.

The Nineteenth had not nearly so large a field of operations as some others, spending its whole four years in the Army of the Potomac. But what it lacked in extent of territory was made up in severity of service. In sickness, in loss by killed and wounded and prisoners and death by disease, the sufferings and hardships of the old Ninetenth were wonderful. Its first experience of battle was at Lewinsville, but by no means its last. At Gainesville and Manassas Junction, South Mountain and Antietam, and the terribly fatal attack on Fredericksburg, at Gettysburg and the fearful Wilderness campaign, ever in the post of danger and of death, the brigade composed in part of the Nineteenth, long before the battle of Gettysburg had richly earned the name by which it was known throughout the Potomac Army —"The Iron Brigade."

The history of the Nineteenth Indiana may be given in brief as follows:

Leaving Indianapolis August 5, 1861, it joined forthwith the Potomac Army August 9. At Lewinsville they were engaged with a slight loss of three killed and wounded, and three prisoners. They were in the engagement at Falls Church September 28, and wintered at Fort Craig, on Arlington Heights. The regiment spent the spring and summer until August in reconnoissances in Virginia, marching to Fredericksburg, to the Shenandoah Valley, to Warrenton, to Fredericksburg again, Spottsylvania and Cedar Mountain. At Gainesville, their loss was heavy—187 killed and wounded, and thirty-three missing.

Maj. Isaac M. May fell in that action. They were engaged at Manassas Junction, and not long after at South Mountain, September 14, 1862, with forty killed and wounded, and again in the world-renowned conflict of Antietam September 17, 1862, with fearful hardships and heavy loss, their Lieutenant Colonel, Alois O. Bachman, being killed on that awful field of blood and slaughter.

October 6, Col. Meredith was promoted Brigadier General, and Lieut.

Col. Samuel J. Williams became Colonel. The regiment fought in the attack on Fredericksburg December 13, 1862, and wintered at Belle Plain.

They marched to Gettysburg, arriving on the morning of July 1, 1863. A large part of the regiment was captured in that battle, and the poor sufferers spent weary months in those dens of unspeakable horror, the rebel prison-pens. The "Iron Brigade" opened the battle of Gettysburg about 9 o'clock in the morning of July 1, the Nineteenth being the regiment first engaged.

In the campaign of the Wilderness, during the summer of 1864, the Nineteenth was conspicuous in the sanguinary contest of that memorable period.

During the winter of 1864, a portion of the remnant of the Nineteenth re-enlisted as veterans. Col. Williams was killed in the Wilderness, and Lieut. Col. Lindley took his place.

The old regiments had become so reduced that a consolidation was effected in the fall of 1864. The Fourteenth and Twentieth were united as the new Twentieth. The Seventh and the Nineteenth were joined as the new Nineteenth September 23, 1864.

The two new regiments were again consolidated as the Twentieth, October 18, 1864, with Col. William Orr as the commanding officer. The Twentieth was mustered out at Louisville July 12, 1865.

These regiments had in truth undergone a hard, severe, laborious, deadly service.

Great numbers were killed and wounded, and a far greater number died of disease, and still more were discharged for disability. Four regiments were consolidated into one, and only a meager few remained even then to recount the story of their achievements. Out of 5,801 men who had belonged to the four regiment, there were present at the final muster-out of the Twentieth Regiment barely twenty-three officers and 390 men. The soul shudders at the incalculable sacrifice of health and life, and the unspeakable burden of human suffering wrapped up in the bare statement of statistics given above—5,801 men reduced to 410. Alas! alas! how little knew or cared the reckless men who struck the fatal blow that opened the mortal strife what a bitter fountain of poisonous, deadly waters was by their fratricidal hand unsealed to pour its fatal flood widespread over the horror-stricken land!

TWENTIETH INDIANA, THREE YEARS.

We put the original Twentieth and the reorganized Twentieth in its various forms into one description.

STATISTICS.

Mustered in at Indianapolis July 22, 1861; Colonel, W. L. Brown; mustered out at Louisville, Ky., July 12, 1865.

Officers, 42; men, 1,009; recruits, 410; veterans, 282; died, 228; deserted, 60; unaccounted for, 176; total, 1,743.

The first duty performed by the Twentieth was to guard the Northern Central railroad in Maryland. September 24, 1861, it was sent to Hatteras Inlet, N. C. Remaining there till November 9, they returned to Fortress Monroe. Lying in camp there till March, 1862, the Twentieth moved to Newport News, taking part in the conflict between the steamers Merrimac, Cumberland and Congress, keeping the rebel captors from taking possession of the Congress after she had struck her colors. May 10, 1862, it assisted in capturing Norfolk, joining afterward the Potomac Army in the Peninsula. On the 24th of June, it was severely engaged at the "Orchards," with a loss of officers and men. The regiment was in all the battles of the "Seven Days" except Glendale, or Frazier's Farm, losing heavily. Forming part of the flank guard of the Potomac Army across the Peninsula to Yorktown, they were sent to Alexandria, to the Rappahannock and to Manassas Plains, taking part in the battle there August 29, 1862, losing Col. Brown early in the action. September 1, the regiment was in the battle of Chantilly, moving thence to Arlington Heights. October 11, they undertook to intercept Stuart's cavalry raid, but were too late by ten hours. They were at Fredericksburg December 13, and took a chief part at Chancellorsville. They captured the Twenty-third Georgia, stronger in numbers than themselves. They moved to Gettysburg in time for the second day of that great battle, losing there the officer in command, the gallant Col. Wheeler. They joined in the pursuit of Lee to Manassas Gap, and were ordered to New York City to prevent threatened draft riots in that metropolis. The regiment returned to the Potomac; was engaged at Locust Grove and Mine Run, and went into winter quarters. January 1, 1864, the regiment veteranized and the veterans took their home furlough.

They crossed the Rapidan with Grant's army, and helped fight the battles of the Wilderness, Todd's Tavern, Po River, Spottsylvania, Tollopotanni and Cold Harbor. There the Fourteenth and the Twentieth were consolidated. They then crossed the James to the battles of Deep Bottom and Strawberry Plains, and then to the trenches before Petersburg, under fire every day, losing many men. Here Lieut. Col. George W. Mikel lost his life. October 18, 1864, the consolidated Nineteenth was united with the new Twentieth, taking the name of the Twentieth, and the commanding officer, Col. James Orr, from the Nineteenth. The new regiment lay in the works before Petersburg until spring, except in the advance on the Weldon railroad. It took part at Preble's House and Hatcher's Run, and in all the engagements on the left from Hatcher's Run to the capture of Richmond. The last engagement by the regiment with the enemy was at Clover Hill, April 9, 1865.

The regiment shortly moved to Washington, and thence to Louisville, Ky., June 14, 1865. The men were mustered out July 12, 1865, numbering twenty-three officers and 390 men.

The following are the engagements of the Twentieth Indiana Infantry:

Hatteras Bank, Merrimac and Congress, Fair Oaks, Orchards, Gaines' Mill, Malvern Hill, Manassas Plains, Chantilly, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Manassas Gap, Locust Grove, Mine Run, Wilderness, Todd's Tavern, Po River, Spottsylvania, Tollopotanni and Cold Harbor; assault and siege of Petersburg, Weldon Railroad, Prebble's House, Hatcher's Run, Clover Hill.

In comparing different regiments, it would be difficult to tell which one endured the hardest lot in the prosecution of the great Civil war. In fact, comparisons are needless. The history of the whole war presents a wonderful and perhaps unprecedented record. The wars of Napoleon, or of Alexander the Great, of the Russian Czar Peter, of Frederick the Great, of Russia and the allies in the Crimean war, of the Austrians against the French, or of the French against the Prussians, scarcely rival our great North American war. War is terrible anywhere; but for long marches, bravery of attack, heroism of endurance and perseverance in execution, the war for the Union stands high in the annals of the world.

TWENTIETH REGIMENT, REORGANIZED.

Regimental Officers—Major, Joseph T. Ives; mustered out as Captain Company A, December 5, 1864.

Company A—Captain, Joseph T. Ives, mustered out December 5, 1864; William W. Macy, transferred from Company I; mustered out with regiment.

Flood, mustered out June 13, 1865, as Corporal; Isaac R. Ford, mustered out May 31, 1865; Spottswood T. Foster, mustered out July 12, 1865; Joel Green, mustered out May 31, 1865; William R. Green, mustered out July 12, 1865; David Garringer, Corporal, mustered out July 12, 1865; William H. Harrison, mustered out July 22, 1865, as Corporal; James H. Hawkins, mustered out June 5, 1865; Peter Hester, mustered out July 12, 1865; William Houren, died October 18, 1864, of wounds received at Petersburg; Rufus King, Corporal, mustered out as First Sergeant July 12, 1865; Thomas Kirby, First Sergeant, promoted First Lieutenant, mustered out with regiment; Henry Knight, mustered out July 12, 1865; Henry Kirby, mustered out July 12, 1865; Thomas R. McGuire, mustered out July 12, 1865, as Corporal; Elias G. Moore, mustered out July 12, 1865, as Corporal; John Miller, mustered out April 25, 1865, disability; Henry Marshall, died at Salisbury Prison, N. C., February 12, 1865; John Mendenhall, discharged, disability; John Murray, Sergeant, captured at Yellow house August 19, 1864; Edward Packenham, from Nineteenth Regiment; John A. Pegg, mustered out February 1, 1865; David F. Pursley, mustered out July 12, 1865; Lafayette Pursley, mustered out July 12, 1865; George W. Rains, mustered out July 12, 1865; Milton Rains, mustered out July 12, 1865; Charles O. Rider, wounded at Wilderness; Benjamin F. Semans, mustered out; Michael Seagraves, mustered out July 12, 1865; Patrick Sullivan, record indefinite; Andrew J. Wood, Sergeant, transferred to Veteran Reserve Corps January 19, 1865, mustered out July 22, 1865; Levi Yost; William Zimmerman, mustered out October 29, 1864, as Sergeant.

Company C—Grear N. Williams, veteran, mustered out as Corporal July 12, 1865.

Company E—Elijah Bales, mustered out with regiment July 12, 1865; John Hank, mustered out July 12, 1865; Thomas Harris, mustered out July 12, 1865; James Lamly, mustered out July 12, 1865; John W. Moore, promoted Second Lieutenant; First Lieutenant; mustered out with regiment; Martin Phillips, wounded in the Wilderness, discharged May 22, 1865; William Phillips, record indefinite; Hugh M. Strain, mustered out July 12, 1865; Thompson Smelser, mustered out July 12, 1865; John Thomson, mustered out July 12, 1865.

Company I—William W. Macy, Captain, transferred to Company A, mustered out with regiment.

TWENTIETH REORGANIZED—CONSOLIDATED.

First, the Fourteenth and Twentieth were united, making the Twentieth. Then the Seventh and the Nineteenth were consolidated, making the new Nineteenth. Lastly, the new Nineteenth and the new Twentieth were united, making a new regiment, still called the Twentieth, under Col. William Orr, formerly Lieutenant Colonel of the Nineteenth, the final consolidation occurring October 18, 1864. The new Twentieth remained in the works near Petersburg until the spring of 1865, except that they were sent on expeditions to cut the railroad communications of the enemy. Toward the Weldon railroad it advanced to Stoney Creek, engaged in the actions at Preble's House and Hatcher's Run. Thence to the fall of Richmond it was in the advance division of the Second Corps, and in all the battles till the surrender of Lee, the last being that at Clover Hill, Va., April 9, 1865. They marched to Washington City, moving thence to Louisville, arriving June 21, 1865, and being mustered out July 12, 1865, with 390 men and twenty-three officers.

Returning to Indianapolis under Col. Albert S. Andrews (Fourteenth Regiment), Gov. Morton gave them a characteristic public welcome, speeches being made also by Gen. Hovey, Dr. Everts and Chaplain William C. Porter, and a few days after, they were discharged for their homes.

STATISTICS—TWENTIETH REGIMENT, REORGANIZED.

Officers, 38; men, 868; recruits, 33; died, 44; unaccounted for, 56; total, 939.

TWENTY-FIRST INFANTRY, FIRST HEAVY ARTILLERY.

Mustered in at Indianapolis July 24, 1861—James W. McMillan, Colonel; changed to heavy artillery February, 1863; mustered out at Baton Rouge, La., January 13, 1866.

Officers, 80; men, 1,283; recruits, 2,028; veterans, 448; died, 392; deserted, 228; unaccounted for, 200; total, 3,839.

The following are the movements of the Twenty-first Indiana:

The first movement was to Baltimore, August 3, 1861, remaining till February 19, 1862.

The second movement was with Gen. Butler to reduce New Orleans, March 4, 1862. A part of the Twenty-first were the first to touch the wharf at New Orleans, May 1, 1862.

The third movement was to Baton Rouge, where the regiment remained till August, being engaged in the battle of Baton Rouge, August 5, 1862, losing 126 men in three and a half hours.

The regiment spent the time from September, 1862, to February, 1863, in Louisiana and Texas, scouring the country and fighting rangers.

The regiment was mounted in February, 1863, and onward; and in July and October, 1863, two companies, L and M, were added. Ten companies were at Port Hudson, spending forty-two days in the siege.

Company F was mostly captured at Brashear City June 23. In the winter of 1863-64, a large number re-enlisted as veterans. They were furloughed home, and a magnificent reception was tendered them at Metropolitan Hall, Indianapolis, February 19, 1864. Companies G and H were up Red river with Banks.

In April, 1865, six battalions assisted in the investment and reduction of Mobile, with Forts Morgan and Gaines, and Spanish Fort.

After the war, the batteries were stationed at various places—Forts Morgan, Pickens and Barrancas, at Baton Rouge, as follows:

Companies B and C, at Fort Morgan.

Companies H and K, at Fort Gaines.

Companies F and L, at Fort Barrancas, Fla.

Companies I and M, at Fort Pickens.

Companies H, E and G were at Baton Rouge.

Company D was at Port Hudson.

In November, 1865, the regiment was ordered to rendezvous at Port Hudson. December 24, 1865, the first grand parade of the whole regiment of twelve batteries took place; and January 10, 1866, at Baton Rouge, La., the men were mustered out of service, the regiment containing some nine hundred and thirty men. Two hundred and forty of them came to Indianapolis for discharge, but seven hundred preferred to remain and be discharged in Louisiana, and it was so done.

The Twenty-first traveled, during its term of service, more than fifteen thousand miles, and was remarkably successful as to preserving the health and general efficiency of its members.

The only men known to be connected with the Twenty-first from Randolph county were some unassigned recruits, of whom not much information is given—none except what follows:

William J. Bremer, mustered out July 28, 1865; George Denney, died at New Orleans February 26, 1865; Charles H. Freeman, mustered out July 27, 1865; Harrison Hull, not known; John C. Leonard, unaccounted for; Stephen C. Lewis, record indefinite; William J. McQuistan, mustered out July 27, 1865; Jeremiah Rawlings, mustered out July 27, 1865; Mannon Street, record indefinite; Sanford A. Stephens, mustered out July 27, 1865; Samuel P. Strahan, mustered out July 31, 1865, as Corporal.

There are also two Randolph men in Company C, viz., Jacob Conkle, mustered out January 13, 1866; William A. Crouch, died December 15, 1864.

TWENTY-SEVENTH INDIANA INFANTRY, THREE YEARS.

Mustered into service at Indianapolis September 12, 1861—Colonel, Silas Colgrove; mustered out at Atlanta, Ga., November 12, 1864.

Officers, 40; men, 912; recruits, 116; veterans, 154; died, 275; deserted, 47; unaccounted for, 52; total, 1,322.

The regiment left for active service September 15, 1861, only three days after their muster-in, and were soon transferred to Banks' army of the Shenandoah Valley. During the winter, they were encamped near Frederick City, Md., in huts built for the purpose.

The regiment moved, in March, 1862, into the Shenandoah Valley, joining in the pursuit of Jackson after the battle of Winchester Heights.

They were engaged at Front Royal May 23, 1862, retreating toward Winchester, and fighting in the fierce battle at that place May 25. Gordon's brigade, to which the Twenty-seventh belonged, was assaulted by twenty-eight rebel regiments. The brigade withstood the attack for three and a half hours, and repulsed it; but the force of the rebel army was so great that the Union troops were finally defeated. The regiment crossed the Potomac at Williamsport May 26, 1862, and, not long afterward, it marched back into the valley, and to Culpepper Court House, joining Pope's army, of Virginia. August 9, they were engaged at Cedar Mountain, as also at Antietam, September 17, 1862, sustaining a heavy loss. After Antietam, they picketed the Potomac from Harper's Ferry to Opequan Creek, and lay, during the winter, near Fairfax and Stafford Court Houses. In the spring, the regiment crossed the Rappahannock and fought in the great battle of Chancellorsville, suffering great losses. It pursued Lee northward, and marched with the Twelfth Corps to Gettysburg, taking a prominent part in that great contest, and joining the pursuit of Lee to the Potomac.

In September, they were sent to the west with the Twelfth Corps, but joined the Twentieth, and were stationed a Tullahoma, Tenn., until spring. Some of the men re-enlisted January 24, 1864, and were furloughed home, coming back in time for Sherman's advance, upon Atlanta. At Resaca, the regiment defeated the Thirty-second and Thirty-eighth Alabama, taking about one hundred prisoners, including the Colonel of the Thirty-eighth, and its battle-flag, its own loss being sixty-eight killed and wounded. They were in the whole Atlanta campaign.

November 4, 1864, the non-veterans were mustered out, and the veterans and recruits were put into the Seventieth, serving with that regiment through

Georgia and the Carolinas, and, when the Seventieth was discharged, the men from the Twenty-seventh were attached to the Thirty-third till the muster-out of that regiment at Louisville, July 21, 1865.

The following were the officers in the Twenty-seventh from Indiana:

Colonel, Silas Colgrove, honorably discharged December 30, 1864, time expired; brevetted Brigadier General of Volunteers August 7, 1864.

Adjutant, Theodore F. Colgrove, promoted Major, mustered out November 4, 1864; re-entered service as Captain Company A, One Hundred and Forty-seventh Regiment; promoted Lieutenant Colonel.

Assistant Surgeon, Willis H. Twiford; promoted Surgeon; resigned July 16, 1864.

Col. Colgrove was the first Colonel of a three-years regiment that served through his term to the time of muster-out. There were nine in all of this kind, to wit: Col. Colgrove, Twenty-seventh; Col. Baker, Twenty-eighth; Col. Coburn, Thirty-third; Col. Ben Harrison, Seventieth; Col. A. O. Miller, Seventy-second; Col. Fred Kneffler, Seventy-ninth; Col. M. C. Hunter, Eighty-second; Col. Charles Murray, Eighty-ninth; Col. D. C. Thomas, Ninety-third.

TWENTY-EIGHTH INDIANA, FIRST CAVALRY.

Did service in detached parts in Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, West Virginia, Virginia, etc., doing much severe work and takng part in many battles.

Mustered in as follows:

Eight companies (A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H) at Evansville, August 20, 1861; Colonel, Conrad Baker.

Companies I and K were independent companies.

Company I was organized as a state company, for one year, April 15, 1861.

Mustered into United States service for three years, July 4, 1861.

Company K was organized at Indianapolis June 20, 1861, and afterward assigned to the First Cavalry.

Companies L and M were made up of drafted men, who served only nine months from November 1, 1862.

The only member from Randolph county in the Twenty-eighth was Assistant Surgeon George W. Bruce, mustered out June 5, 1864.

Officers, 51; men, 988; recruits, 301; veterans, 5; died, 131; deserted, 65; unaccounted for, 319; total, 1,488.

The members of the regiment were discharged at various times, as follows:

Companies L and M were discharged August, 1863.

Company K was mostly mustered out June, 1864.

Company I was discharged August, 1864.

Body of regiment was discharged September 6, 1865.

Companies A and B (recruits), discharged June, 1865.

Part of Company K (forty-three recruits), discharged in summer of 1865.

THIRTY-FIRST INDIANA INFANTRY, THREE YEARS.

William G. Smith, Company F, promoted Second Lieutenant, First Lieutenant. (Put down as private from Randolph County; as Second and First Lieutenant from Bloomfield.)

THIRTY-THIRD INDIANA INFANTRY.

Company G—Levi J. Linsey, mustered May 29, 1865.

Organized at Indianapolis September 19, 1861; John Coburn, Colonel.

Route of regiment—Louisville, Camp Dick Robison, Crab Orchard, Camp Wild Cat, London, Crab Orchard, Lexington, Cumberland Ford, Cumberland Gap, East Tennessee, Manchester, Oak Hill, Ohio, Danville, Lexington, Louisville, Nashville, Franklin, Columbia, Thompson's Station, Tullahoma, Shelbyville, Murfreesboro, Manchester, Estill Springs, Cowan, Tracy Station, Christiana. Re-enlisted, 450 veterans, on veteran furlough—Buzzard's Roost, Atlanta campaign, with Sherman through Georgia and the Carolinas, Richmond and Washington City, reaching that place May 21, 1865; Louisville, mustered out July 21, 1865.

Commanders—Cols. John Coburn and Henderson, Maj. Miller, Col. Burton. Consolidated with it were the Twenty-seventh, Seventieth and Eighty-fifth; on the rolls, 1,500 men. The Thirty-third was a strong regiment, kept recruited and well together.

Officers, 43; men, 948; recruits, 886; veterans, 449; unassigned recruits, 492; died 267; deserted, 113; unaccounted for, 117; total, 2,875.

THIRTY-FOURTH INDIANA INFANTRY, THREE YEARS.

Mustered in at Anderson September 16, 1861; Asbury Steele, Colonel.

Re-enlisted as veterans, New Iberia, La., December 15, 1863.

Mustered out at Brownsville, Texas, February 3, 1866.

Arrived at Indianapolis with eighteen officers and 346 men February 18, 1866.

Publicly received at Soldiers' Home February 19, 1866.

Welcoming address by Gov. Baker.

Discharged from service February 19, 1866.

Officers, 42; men, 969; recruits, 357; veterans, 438; died, 236; deserted, 44; unaccounted for, 15; total, 1,806.

The route of the Thirty-fourth Regiment is given herewith:

Jeffersonville, New Haven, Camp Wickliffe, Green River, Ky., Elizabethtown, Cairo, Ill., New Madrid, Fort Pillow, Memphis, White River, Aberdeen, Ark., Helena, Yazoo Pass, Milliken's Bend, Port Gibson, Champion Hills, Vicksburg, Jackson, New Orleans, Brashear City, Leche County, Carrion Crow Bayou, La., New Iberia, Pass Cavallo, Texas, New Orleans, Indianapolis, Home Furlough, New Orleans, Brazos Santiago, Texas, Palmetto Ranche, Brazos Island, Brownsville, Ringgold Barracks, Brownsville, Indianapolis.

The Thirty-fourth Regiment was employed in difficult, laborious service of many kinds. At the siege of New Madrid, Mo., they helped to clear a passage through a forest covered with water, for the guns, cutting down many trees several feet under the surface of the water.

They were at work for two weeks clearing the Yazoo Pass of the heavy timber felled by the rebels into the stream. They helped to build the bridges for the passage of Grant's army from Milliken's Bend to below Vicksburg.

They were everywhere an active, hardy, reliable body of men, a faithful, energetic, thoroughgoing regiment. The number of re-enlisted veterans from this regiment was greater than any other except two, viz., the Thirty-third and the First Heavy Artillery, and it had the greatest proportion of veterans of any regiment in the field.

The following are the men from Randolph county in the Thirty-fourth Indiana:

Company B—Benjamin Fouch, discharged February 4, 1865; Charles C. Heck, veteran, died at Brazos Santiago, Texas, January 17, 1865; Nicholas Heifner, veteran, mustered out February 3, 1866; Wesley S. Iliff, mustered out February 3, 1866, as Sergeant, veteran; William S. Reeves, veteran, mustered out February 3, 1866.

Company D—Edwin Parker, mustered out February 3, 1866.

Company I—William B. Evans, died at New Madrid, Mo., May 25, 1862, accidental wounds; Nathaniel H. Gable, veteran, mustered out February 3, 1866, as Sergeant.

THIRTY-SIXTH INDIANA INFANTRY, THREE YEARS.

Regiment mustered in at Richmond, September 16, 1861; Colonel, William Grose.

It left for the field soon after, with the Army of the Ohio, to Nashville, February, 1862; to Tennesse river and battle of Shiloh, March, 1862; loss, nine killed, thirty-eight wounded, one missing—total, forty-eight; siege of Corinth till the evacuation; eastward to Northern Alabama, and back to Nashville and to Louisville; pursued Bragg through to Kentucky; returned to Nashville; battle of Stone River—loss, 132; camped near Murfreesboro and at Cripple Creek; marched against Chattanooga; battle of Chickamauga, loss, 137; re-enlisted as veterans at Tyner's Station, Tenn.; went home on furlough February, 1864; moved in the Atlanta campaign with Sherman. Non-veterans mustered out at Indianapolis August 13, 1864. Pursued Hood's army north, and fought at Nashville, and chased him to Huntsville, Ala.; was joined with the battalion of the Thirtieth Regiment and went to Texas in July, 1865.

Mustered out at Victoria, Texas, November 25, 1865; reached Indianapolis December 6, 1865, with twenty-two officers and 180 men.

Public reception, December 7, 1865.

Final discharge of the members of the battalion.

Members of the Thirty-sixth Indiana from Randolph:

Assistant Surgeon Richard Bosworth, mustered out with regiment; had been Surgeon-at-Large for the State of Indiana, appointed in 1862.

Captain Company E, Samuel G. Kearney; resigned March 22, 1862.

Second Lieutenant, James R. Jones; resigned December 2, 1862. John Erwin, mustered out with the regiment.

Company K—Second Lieutenant, John S. Way; resigned February 6, 1862.

It may be that some of the men in the Thirty-sixth Regiment were from Randolph county, but none are so designated, and at least one company and many of the recruits have no residence assigned.

FORTY-SECOND INDIANA INFANTRY, THREE YEARS.

Mustered in at Evansville October 9, 1861; Colonel, James G. Jones.

Re-enlisted as veterans (215) January 1, 1864, at Chattanooga, Tenn. Mustered out at Louisville July 21, 1865.

Publicly received at Indianapolis July 25, 1865.

Addresses by Governor Morton and Gen. Sherman.

Officers, 43; men, 976; recruits, 929; veterans, 215; died, 254; deserted, 60; unaccounted for, 119; total, 2,163; killed, 86; wounded, 443; prisoners, 100; mustered out, 846.

Number of engagements, twenty.

Field of operation: Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia.

Company A—Andrew J. Fisher, mustered out June 18, 1865.

Company B—Ellis W. Scott, mustered out July 21, 1865; James A. Stitsworth, mustered out June 18, 1865; William Stoner, died at Chattanooga April 1, 1865; James A. Jarnagan, mustered out July 21, 1865; John A. Juddey, mustered July 21, 1865.

Company I—Antony Reitenour, mustered out July 21, 1865.

FORTY-SEVENTH INDIANA INFANTRY, THREE YEARS.

Regiment mustered in at Anderson October 10, 1861, James R. Slack, Colonel.

Veteranized at New Iberia, La., December, 1863. Number of veterans, 409.

Public reception on home furlough at Indianapolis (Twenty-first and Forty-seventh Regiments) in Metropolitan Hall, February 19, 1864.

Mustered out at Shreveport, La., October 23, 1865.

Publicly received at Indianapolis November 1, 1865—thirty-two officers, 530 men. Officers, 41; men, 936; recruits, 362; veterans, 409; died, 312; deserters, 62; unaccounted for, 20; total, 1,748.

Men from Randolph county in Forty-seventh Indiana:

Company B—Israel I. Rickerd, died at New Orleans, La., September 14, 1865.

Company C—James Overly, veteran, mustered out October 23, 1865, as Sergeant.

FIFTY-FOURTH INDIANA, ONE YEAR SERVICE.

This regiment was composed chiefly of nine-months drafted men and substitutes. It was organized in October, 1862, and mustered November 16, 1862, with Fielding Mansfield as Colonel. It was mustered out of service at New Orleans December 8, 1863.

Field of operations. Against Kirby Smith, Kentucky, 1862 (three months); Arkansas Post and Vicksburg, 1863; Louisiana, 1863.

The Fifty-fourth Regiment (one year service) moved from Indianapolis December 9, 1862, about three weeks after its muster-in, to Memphis, and was assigned to the Thirteenth Army Corps. December 20, 1862, it embarked with Gen. Sherman's army for Vicksburg, and reached Yazoo river December 26, 1862, taking part in the engagements at Chickasaw Bluffs, losing 264 killed, wounded and missing. After the capture of Arkansas Post, it moved to Young Point and Milliken's Bend, and, being assigned to Osterhaus' division, helped to lead the advance against Vicksburg. They were at the battle of Thompson's Hill (Port Gibson); were placed as garrison for Fort Raymond; escorted prisoners to Yazoo river and to Memphis; returned to the siege of Vicksburg; advanced to Jackson, and helped to capture that place.

Soon after, they were taken to New Orleans, going with the expedition up Teche river to Opelousas and Vermillionville. They were mustered out at New Orleans, December 8, 1863, and returned to their Northern homes.

A considerable number of Randolph men were attached to this regiment in Company I, under Capt. Henry Carter, of Winchester.

Company I—Captain, Henry Carter, Winchester, commissioned November 1, 1862, mustered November 16, 1862; wounded at Vicksburg, and resigned February 13, 1863. First Lieutenant, Samuel P. Strahan, Winchester, commissioned November 1, 1862, mustered November 16, 1862; mustered out with regiment December, 1863; re-enlisted as private in Twenty-first Regiment (First Heavy Artillery) September 8, 1864; mustered out as Corporal July 31, 1865. Second Lieutenant, William P. Beeker, Winchester, commissioned November 1, 1862, mustered November 16, 1862, resigned April 24, 1863.

Men belonging to Fifty-fourth Indiana (one year):

Company I (Mr. Harshman says it was Company G)—Company mustered November 16, 1862. Thomas G. Mullen, Sergeant, mustered out December 8, 1863; Newton W. Needham, Sergeant, left service January 21, 1863; Andrew J. Daly, Corporal, died January 20, 1863, of wounds at Chickasaw Bluffs; William C. Heaston, mustered out December 8, 1863; Nathan Coats, Corporal, mustered out December 8, 1863; Elisha Lambert, Corporal, mustered out December 8, 1863; William M. Hughes, Corporal, died October 6, 1863; Joseph S. Jellison, Wagoner, died March 1, 1863; George S. Barker, left service January 21, 1863; George W. Boyer, discharged December 9, 1862; Lorenzo Byram, died March 20, 1863; Erastus Carwin, mustered out December 8, 1863; Gabriel Coats, killed at Chickasaw December 28, 1862; Elisha Conner, discharged December 6, 1862; Elihu Coats, mustered out December 8, 1863; Peter Coblentz, died May 26, 1863; Harrison W. Dille, mustered out December 8, 1863; Andrew J. Fisher, mustered out December 8, 1863; John Goodman, died July 15, 1863; Samuel P. Heaston, mustered out December 8, 1863; William R. Hollowell, mustered out December 8, 1863; Joseph G. Hindsley, mustered out December 8, 1863; Manasseh Johnson, mustered out December 8, 1863; Wesley Johnson, mustered out December 8, 1863; absent, wounded; Robert N. Porter, left the service November, 1862; Vincent Smith, left the service January 18, 1863; Edward Sizemore, discharged July 20, 1863; Daniel Vardeman, mustered out December 8, 1863, as Corporal; Walter Vardeman, mustered out December 8, 1863; John Wright, mustered out December 8, 1864; Samuel Witter, mustered out December 8, 1863; William Wickersham, died October 10, 1863; David Warren, died February 22, 1863; Edward J. Harshman, December 1, 1862, mustered out December 8, 1863; William Kizer, October 25, 1862; Albert Coats, December 1, 1862, mustered out December 8, 1863.

The officers were one Colonel, two Lieutenant Colonels, two Majors, two Adjutants, two Quartermasters, two Surgeons, four Assistant Surgeons, ten Captains, ten First Lieutenants, ten Second Lieutenants—in all, forty-five. The Colonel was Fielding Mansfield, Madison, commissioned Colonel October 29, 1862; mustered November 17, 1862; mustered out with regiment.

Twenty-seven of the forty-five officers continued through the whole term of service, being mustered out with the regiment; eleven resigned, one declined and four died—two of wounds and two of disease.

Officers, 41; men, 915; recruits, 33; died, 216; deserters, 81; not accounted for, 358; total, 989.

The Fifty-fourth had more men of whom no account is given than any other except the Nineteenth, which has 451 of that class.

FIFTY-FIFTH REGIMENT INDIANA INFANTRY (THREE MONTHS).

The regiment was mustered in at Indianapolis June 16, 1862, John R. Mahan, Colonel. Mustered out at Indianapolis at the expiration of the term of service. Duties performed, guarded prisoners at Camp Morton, and marched into Kentucky to assist in repelling the incursion of Kirby Smith.

Company F—Reuben B. Farra, Captain, mustered out with regiment; James Addington, Second Lieutenant, mustered out with regiment.

Probably a large number of Randolph men were enlisted in Company F of the Fifty-fifth Regiment, but the places of residence are not given and the men can not be designated. Officers, 36; men, 603; recruits, 19; died, 4; no deserters; unaccounted for, 19; total, 658. The men in Company F, perhaps from Randolph county, are as follows:

John J. Adams, William Addington, Harris H. Abbott, Solomon Bartholomew, Joseph Biddle, Isaac Blansett, John W. Bolling, Joshua Boyds, George Bonnywell, Franklin Broy, James G. Bush, Harmon B. Bolling, James M. Clark, Thomas J. Clevenger, Beda B. Cowgill, Isaiah Cowgill, William Cook, Joseph Coffin. Price Craig, Samuel B. Crosier, Dennis Carter, James Dailey, James H. Dearmond, Samuel Dougherty, Benjamin Dowden, Peter Dailey, Andrew Evans, John R. Fisher, John Foust, Adam Fraze, Peter F. Funderburg, John Francisco, John Gordon, Archy M. Gelly, Mordecai Harris, Thomas F Hammond, Wilson J. Hiatt, Clark Hobbs, George Huffman, Patrick H. Hutchens, Luster Harris, William Hollowell, Anderson C. Hopkins, James A. Jarnagin, James M. Karnes, Thomas Karnes, Hiram Kale, Slatis Keene, James J. Kerr, Stephen Kennedy, Robert Kennedy, James M. Kirk, Asa Little, Corban Little, Milton Miranda, Robert McCracken, William G. McGuire, Jacob Miller, Luther G. Moorman, Jacob Mood, John W. May, Jesse Pegg, Franklin Pence, Thomas A. Pirth, William S. Price, George W. Price, Mahlon Ranier, Granville Rhodes, James H. Rice, Walter Ruble, Alfred Runyan, Henry H. Sumption, Adolphus C. Shaffer, Samuel S. Sherrard, Charles Sheltmyre, Thomas Short, Calvin K. Taylor, Wilson Thomas, Noland Thomas, Jeremiah Vance, Noah Wirt, Samuel Winship, John Winship, Elijah Wood.

FIFTY-SEVENTH INDIANA INFANTRY (THREE YEARS).

Mustered in at Richmond November 18, 1861; Colonel, J. W. T. McMullen. Re-enlisted as veterans in East Tennessee January 1, 1864. Veteran furlough March and April, 1864. Mustered out at Victoria, Texas, December 14, 1865. Reached Indianapolis January 1, 1866, 23 officers and 168 men under Col. John S. McGraw. Officers, 50; men, 923; recruits, 464; veterans, 215; died, 267; deserters, 54; unaccounted for, 24; total, 1,652.

The Fifty-seventh was mustered into service at Richmond November 18, 1861. Moving to Indianapolis and remaining till December 13, it reported to Gen. Buell at Louisville; thence the regiment was ordered to Bardstown to join the Army of the Ohio, Sixth Division; soon it was moved to Lebanon, then to Munfordville by rail and to Nashville on foot, arriving in March. March 21, the Army of the Ohio set out from Nashville to join Gen. Grant. The regiment arrived only on the afternoon of April 7, the second day of the battle, but engaged immediately, losing lightly. It remained through the siege of Corinth, and then marched into North Alabama, and about the middle of July, to Central Tennessee again, remaining near Tullahoma and McMinnville till September 1. Bragg's attempt on Louisville aroused fresh activity, our troops were ahead and Bragg fell back to be pursued through Kentucky and defeated at Perryville. The Fifty-seventh took part in all this work, and marched again to Nashville. Although the Fifty-seventh had been in a few battles, yet its work was severe; guarding trains, foraging, skirmishing, kept the regiment busy and produced much hardship.

At Stone River a loss was suffered of seventy-five out of 250 engaged. Col. Hines and Lieut. Col. Lennard were both seriously wounded. Until the spring of 1863, they were encamped near Murfreesboro, scouting, foraging, picketing, skirmishing and drilling severely and constantly. Before the capture of Chattanooga and the battle of Chickamauga, the Fifty-seventh was north of the Tennessee, but when the rebels left the town, the brigade to which they belonged took possession, and the regiment was selected as Provost Guard. They were relieved in time to take a prominent part at Mission Ridge.

After Chickamauga, the Fifty-seventh was assigned to Sheridan's Division and continued so to the end. That division went into East Tennessee against Longstreet for the relief of Knoxville. That winter campaign among the mountains of East Tennessee can hardly be equaled in the annals of the war. The army went stripped of baggage into the fight around Chattanooga, and marched forthwith from the pursuit of the foe, starting on their perilous journey of hundreds of miles with no preparation and scanty supplies. One mess of seven in one of the regiments had nothing to cook on but two old canteens, torn open and flattened out as a sort of pan. But it mattered little, as they had almost nothing to cook. They had to depend on the country and a poor show they found it. Cattle indeed were somewhat plentiful, and the beef supply was pretty good; but breadstuffs were scarcely attainable at all. In some cases, wheat bran was their only resource. And before the army returned to their comrades in Northern Alabama, many had marched their shoes off and nearly their clothes as well. But they had done what they had undertaken—cleared out Longstreet and relieved Knoxville; and the brave loyalists of that mountain country and the "Union" boys felt happy. As soon as they reached the main body of the army, abundant supplies were obtained.

January 1, 1864, the regiment veteranized almost to a man. Their veteran furlough was postponed till March, and from that they returned just in time for Sherman's advance upon Atlanta. In all that wonderous campaign, the Fifty-seventh was unwearied in their exertions to push the rebels to their utmost. At Rocky Race Ridge, Adairsville and New Hope, in the deadly struggles around Kenesaw, this regiment was among the bravest, and lost many officers and men.

After Atlanta, the Fifty-seventh was dispatched northward against Hood and made a part of Thomas' heroic army at Franklin and Nashville. When Hood's forces had been dispersed, this regiment camped at Huntsville for several months, moving to Bull's Gap, in East Tennessee, in April, 1865. After moving to Nashville in April and remaining there till July, they were transferred to Texas, and, on the 14th of December, 1865, were mustered out of service at Victoria, Texas, reaching Indianapolis January 1, 1866, with 23 officers and 168 men.

Worthily does the report of the adjutant general pay a glowing tribute of praise to their achievements in the following noble words:

"The Fifty-seventh has seen much arduous service; its losses in battle have been heavy and its marches have been especially and exceedingly severe, having crossed the entire breadth of Kentucky three times and of Tennessee six times. It has behaved with great gallantry on every occasion, and has achieved an enviable record and an honorable fame."

Its officers were excellent men and thorough soldiers and the regiment proved itself worthy of such commanders. Cols. McMullen, Hines, Lennard and Blanche have been seldom equaled and still more rarely excelled.

The members of the Fifty-seventh Regiment from Randolph county are as follows:

Company B—Daniel F Anthony, discharged April 4, 1862, disability; Allen L. Chamness, veteran, mustered out December 14, 1865, sergeant; William Fogleman, veteran, mustered out December 14, 1865, corporal; Abraham L. Manning, veteran, mustered out December 14, 1865, corporal.

Company C—John Hartman, corporal, died near Union City, Ind., March 19, 1864, buried in Union City cemetery; Thomas J. Boram, veteran, mustered out December 14, 1865; Joseph W. Cox, discharged July 14, 1862; Sylvester W. Dunn, discharged July 5, 1862, disability; John House, died at Louisville January 13, 1862; Albert L. Leavell, killed June 18, 1864, at Kenesaw; William I. Miller, died at Nashville April 17, 1862; George W. Markle, transferred to Veteran Reserve Corps September 30, 1863; John W. Starbuck, transferred to Veteran Reserve Corps in the spring of 1863; John Wintermote, veteran, mustered out December 14, 1865, as corporal; George W. Louder, recruit, mustered out December 16, 1865, as corporal.

Company D—First Lieutenant, Robert H. Morgan, resigned February 28, 1863, disability; Charles Shoemaker, sergeant, discharged August 14, 1862, disability; John B. Dravenstradt, corporal, discharged January 28, 1862, disability; William Addington, Spartanburg, record indefinite.

Privates—Calvin W Arnold, killed at Stone River December 31, 1862; Lewis Carroll, discharged March 20, 1863, disability; Benjamin Chenoweth, discharged May 20, 1863, wounds; Isaac W. Elliott, died December 28, 1863, wounds; Warren Elzroth, veteran, killed in battle November 30, 1864; Thornton Freeman, killed at Stone River December 31, 1862; Marion W. SIXTY-NINTH REGIMENT INDIANA INFANTRY (THREE YEARS).

The regiment was mustered in at Richmond August 19, 1862; colonel, William A. Bickel. Mustered out at Mobile, Ala., July 5, 1865. Public reception at Indianapolis July 18, 1865, with 16 officers and 284 men. Welcoming address by Governor Morton. Officers, 42; men, 960; recruits, 98; died, 326; deserters, 61; unaccounted for, 21; total, 1,100.

The Sixty-ninth Regiment was hurried into the field, leaving the very next day, August 20, for Lexington and Richmond, Ky., and fought in the battle there, August 30, 1862, with a heavy loss of 218 killed and wounded, being finally captured in a body and paroled on the field. They were sent to parole camp at Indianapolis, but were exchanged in a few weeks, and, on the 27th of November, 1862, the regiment was sent to Memphis and down the river with Sherman to Vicksburg. They were in the battle and repulse at Chickasaw Bluffs, behind Vicksburg, losing slightly. They helped to capture Arkansas Post and camped at Young's Point, losing over 100 men by disease at that deadly spot.

March 30, 1863, the Sixty-ninth led the advance against Vicksburg. At Richmond, La., they built 2,000 feet of bridging in three days and the army moved across the peninsula in front of Vicksburg. April 30, the advance crossed at Hard Times Landing, and the battle of Port Gibson was fought the next day, the Sixty-ninth losing seventy-one in killed and wounded. May 16 they were at Champion Hills and May 17 at Black River Bridge; in the siege of Vicksburg to May 22, and at Black River Bridge during the rest of the siege. The Sixty-ninth was in Osterhaus' division, which uniformly led the advance in the operations east of the Mississippi before Vicksburg was invested.

The Sixty-ninth was in the siege of Jackson. August 3 they were sent to Port Hudson and afterward to New Orleans, to Berwick City and the Teche country, returning to Algiers and embarking in November for Texas. Matagorda Bay was reached December 1, 1863. The regiment sailed for Indianola February 13, 1864, and came back to Matagorda Island March 13, suffering a loss of two officers and twenty men by the swamping of a boat.

They left Texas for New Orleans in April, and marched thence to Alexandria, engaging in the fight at that place and joining in Banks' retreat to Alexandria. They encamped at Morganza until December, 1864, making various expeditions from that place. December 7, 1864, it was sent to Mobile Bay, and, on the 14th, joined the Pascagoula expedition led by General Granger.

January 22, 1865, a consolidation was effected into a battalion with four companies, with Oron Perry for commander. January 31, the battalion embarked for Barrancas, Fla., and thence, March 14, went to Pensacola. March 20, they moved with Steele's expedition through to Florida and Southern Alabama, arriving in the rear of Blakely April 1, 1865. The Sixty-ninth fought in the attack on Blakely, April 9, and were sent to guard prisoners from Blakely to Ship Island. They returned to Blakely and marched to Selma. May 3, they were ordered to Mobile for Texas, but remained at Mobile.

They were mustered out at Mobile July 5, 1865, and, with 16 officers and 284 men, reached Indianapolis, and after a public reception July 18, 1865, the members of the battalion were discharged and joyfully dispersed to their homes.

The Sixty-ninth left its dead in eleven states, and its services, though not so prominent as were those of some others, were severe, and, in many cases, attended with great hardships and suffering. Its death list was very large. Only five regiments have a greater one, and the per cent. of deaths in the Sixty-ninth is greater than that in any other, as will appear by the following figures:

Ninth (three years)—Deaths, 351; men, 2,141; 16 1-3 per cent.

Twenty-sixth (three years)—Deaths, 336; men, 1,997; 17 per cent.

Thirtieth (three years)—Deaths, 365; men, 1,408; 26 per cent.

Thirty-first (three years)—Deaths, 366; men, 1,886, 19½ per cent.

Thirty-eighth (three years)—Deaths, 353; men, 2,028; 17 1-3 per cent.

Sixty-ninth (three years)—Deaths, 332; men, 1,100; 30 per cent.

Eighth Cavalry (Thirty-ninth)—Deaths, 239; men, 2,415; 14 per cent.

First Heavy Artillery (Twenty-first)—Deaths, 392; men, 3,839; 10 per cent.

Average per cent. in the eight regiments, 16¾ per cent.

The Sixty-ninth is three times as high as that of the lowest of the eight regiments (First Heavy Artillery), 4 per cent. more than the highest one besides, and almost double the average rate of the eight regiments.

The swamps of Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Alabama and Florida told fearfully against the lives of the poor fellows who followed the flag of the Sixty-ninth and in the soil of eleven once hostile (but now, let us hope, reconciled and friendly) states, these much enduring men have been laid to rest to await the Archangel's trump at the resurrection morn.

Company C—First Lieutenant, Adam B. Simmons; mustered out with battalion at close of service.

SEVENTY-FIFTH INDIANA INFANTRY, THREE YEARS.

Regiment mustered in at Wabash August 19, 1862; Colonel, John U. Pettit. Regiment mustered out at Washington, June 8, 1865; public reception of that and other regiments at Indianapolis in the Capitol grounds June 14, 1865. Officers, 42; men, 1,076; recruits, 100; died, 227; deserted, 30; unaccounted for, 31; mustered out, 450; total number, 1,127.

The Seventy-fifth Regiment was raised in the Eleventh congressional district, and its place of rendezvous was Wabash. The men were mustered in August 19, and August 21 the regiment moved to Louisville, thence to Lebanon and back to Louisville. They marched to Frankfort, Scottsville and Gallatin, and back to Cave City in pursuit of Morgan. Their winter camp was near Gallatin, and in January, 1863, they moved to Murfreesboro, remaining until June 24, being engaged in scouting and other hard service. The Seventy-fifth was a part of the Second Brigade, Third Division, Fourteenth Army Corps, and they were known as the Indiana Brigade, all three regiments being from Indiana—Seventy-fifth, Eighty-seventh and One Hundred and First.

June 24, 1863, the regiment set out for Tullahoma, fighting the battle of Hover's Gap as they went. This regiment entered the rebel works at Tullahoma first about July 1, 1863. It crossed the Tennessee with Rosecrans and fought at Chickamauga September 19 and 20, 1863, the loss being 17 killed and 107 wounded.

The regiment was stationed at Chattanooga for several months, taking a part in the battle of Mission Ridge, losing twenty-two killed and wounded.

The winter was spent in and near Chattanooga, and early in the spring the regiment moved to Ringgold for the Atlanta campaign. April 27, 1864, Sherman ordered his troops to concentrate at Chattanooga.

We quote from the Adjutant General's report:

"On the 7th of May, 1864, Thomas occupied Laurel Hill. On the 12th, the whole army, except Howard's Corps, moved through Snake Creek Gap on Resaca. On the 15th the battle of Resaca was fought, and the same night the rebel army retreated across the Oostenaula. Near Adairsville, the rear of the rebel army was encountered, and a sharp fight ensued. On the 28th, the enemy made an assault at Dallas, but met with a bloody repulse. On the 27th of June an assault was made upon the enemy's position on Kenesaw without success. On the 2d of July, Kenesaw was abandoned by the enemy. On the 4th, Thomas demonstrated so strongly on the enemy's communications as to cause him to fall gack to the Chattahoochie river and cross that river on the 9th. On the 20th, the enemy sallied from his works in force, and fought the battle of Peach Tree Creek. On the 22d, a general battle was fought in front of Atlanta, the rebels being defeated. On the 28th, the enemy made another assault upon our besieging lines, but were driven back in confusion. The siege of Atlanta vigorously progressed with constant skirmishing. On the 25th of August, the bulk of Sherman's army moved by a circuit around Atlanta, struck its southern communications near Fairburn, destroying the West Point railroad and the Macon railroad. This caused the enemy to evacuate Atlanta on the 2d of September. On the 4th of September the army moved slowly back to Atlanta, and rested in clean, healthy camps. Thus, after four months' campaign, ended one of the greatest achievements of the war."

During the Atlanta campaign the regiment marched and fought with the Second Brigade, Third Division, Fourteenth Army Corps, engaging in the battles of Dalton, Resaca, Dallas, Kenesaw Mountain, Peach Tree Creek and Jonesboro. The regiment had for a brief season a time of rest; but soon they moved to repel Hood's advance on Sherman's rear. The regiment marched in pursuit to Gaylesville, resting a short time on the Chattanooga river. Returning to Atlanta, the Seventy-fifth set out with Sherman on his famous "march to the sea," and went the whole round through Georgia and the Carolinas, to Raleigh, and through Virginia to Richmond and Washington. And by that time the war was over.

The regiment took part in the grand review before President Johnson, Gen. Sherman and the rest of the magnates, marching in solid phalanx twelve deep for hours, "tramp, tramp, tramp," through the broad avenues of the Capital City.

They were mustered out at the capital June 8, 1865. The recruits were transferred to the Forty-second Indiana, and served with that regiment until its muster out at Louisville July 21, 1865.

Company F—Charles S. Butterworth, mustered out June 8, 1865; Samuel A. Force, mustered out June 8, 1865; Nathan B. Hickman, discharged February 28, 1863; George McCartney, mustered out June 8, 1865.

SEVENTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT (FOURTH CAVALRY).

Colonel, Isaac P. Gray; resigned February 11, 1863; Assistant Surgeon, William Commons, declined; organized August 22, 1862; mustered out June 29, 1865.

Officers, 57; men, 1,166; recruits, 301; deserters, 84; died, 204; unaccounted for, 54; total, 1,524.

Field of operation, Kentucky, Indiana, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi.

Battles in which the Seventy-seventh took part: Madisonville, Ky., October 5, 1862; Chickamauga, Tenn., September 19 and 20, 1863; Mossy Creek, Tenn., January 12, 1864; Newnan, Ga., July 3, 1864; Columbia, Tenn., November 26, 1864; Fair Garden, Tenn., February 19, 1865; Ebenezer Church, La., April 1, 1865; Selma, Ala., April 2, 1865.

EIGHTY-FOURTH INDIANA, THREE YEARS.

Regiment mustered in at Richmond September 3, 1862; Colonel, Nelson Trussler; mustered out at Nashville June 18, 1865; reached Indianapolis June 17, 1865; was publicly received, with others, June 26, 1865. Addresses were made by Gov. Morton, Gen. Hovey, Gen. Wilder and others.

Officers, 43; men, 906; recruits, 78; died, 207; deserted, 53; unaccounted for, 9; returned, 349; total, 1,027.

The Eighty-fourth Regiment was raised in the Fifth District, and mustered in at Richmond September 3, 1862, with Nelson Trussler, colonel. Its first work was to aid in the defense of Cincinnati from the legions of Kirby Smith. Buell's army made the Confederate hosts to fall back, and the regiment was sent to Western Virginia, camping at Point Pleasant, Guyandotte, Catlettsburg and Cassville; at the latter place nearly three months. February 7, 1863, the Eighty-fourth sailed down the Ohio to Louisville, and thence to Nashville, encamping there until March 5. Thence they moved to Franklin, camping again until the 3d of June. Its times of encampment were occupied with scouting, reconnoissances, skirmishes, and the like.

June 3, they marched to Triune. They were attacked June 11, but without success, by the rebels. Thence they marched through Shelbyville to Wartrace, encamping until August 12, and thence to Tullahoma and to Stevenson, Bridgeport, and Chattanooga, arriving September 13. Camping at Rossville until the 18th, the regiment marched to the front and were posted on the left of the army of the Cumberland.

The Eighty-fourth was in the battle of Chickamauga both days, fighting bravely and losing heavily. Holding the key to Rosecrans' retreat, that division stood stubbornly and saved the army. The regiment was on picket duty opposite Lookout Mountain nine days and nights and then moved to Moccasin Point and then to Shell Mound, remaining there until January 20, 1864. The Eighty-fourth was transferred to the Second Brigade, First Division, Fourth Army Corps. The regiment marched to Cleveland, reaching the place February 6; thence on the 22d to Buzzard's Roost, fighting there on the 25th. Returning to Cleveland, they stayed until the 3d of May, 1864. Sherman was now ready to march and fight his stubborn way to Atlanta, "the gateway of the South," and the Eighty-fourth was with him all the time, and was engaged in fifteen battles during that terrible summer, marching triumphantly at the last into the conquered city of Atlanta. After this campaign, the Fourth Corps was ordered back to the Army of the Tennessee; and it marched by way of Athens, Pulaski and Franklin to Nashville, fighting in the furious battle of Franklin on the way. Reaching Nashville December 1, it had barely time for a short respite before Thomas burst forth upon Hood with resistless power, scattering Hood's army to the winds. Our troops pursued for a long way, and returned at last.

Encamping at Huntsville, where it had ended its pursuit of Hood, the troops remained there until March 13, moving thence to Knoxville, Strawberry Plains, Bull's Gap and Shield's Mills. Remaining awhile, they went back once more to Nashville April 18, 1865. June 14, 1865, the Eighty-fourth was mustered out at Nashville, the recruits being assigned to the Fifty-seventh Indiana, serving in that regiment until its muster out in November, 1865.

Reaching Indianapolis June 17, a reception was held June 26, 1865.

Three companies belonging to the Eighty-fourth Regiment were formed chiefly in Randolph county. Company A, mostly from Farmland; Company E, chiefly from Deerfield; Company H, largely from Winchester. A considerable number of Company K also belonged to Randolph.

Fully 300 went from this county alone in the Eighty-fourth Regiment.

The Nineteenth (Fifth Cavalry) Regiment was made up at different times.

Four companies were mustered in August, five in September and three in October, 1862.

The companies were sent to different places, C and F to Carrollton, Ky., and I to Rising Sun, Ind.; the others to the counties on the Ohio river.

A and G were stationed at Newburg, B at Rockport, D and L at Mauckport, E and H at Cannelton, K at Mount Vernon, and M at Evansville.

The whole regiment was united at Glasgow, Ky., in March, 1863, and were kept scouting and skirmishing on the Cumberland river. The regiment spent much of its time in Middle and Eastern Tennessee until February, 1864, engaging in exceedingly active, laborious and dangerous service, fighting any battles, some of them severe and fatal.

July 4, 1863, it started in pursuit of the rebel Gen. Morgan, then crossing the Cumberland.

They marched to Louisville, and were sent up the Ohio on steamers to Portsmouth.

July 19, 1863, the regiment headed Morgan's forces at Buffington's Island, and fought them there, scattering the rebels in every direction, killing and capturing many, and taking also five pieces of artillery.

They returned to Louisville, and August 15 started for East Tennessee, crossing the Cumberland Mountains, and being the first Federal regiment to enter Knoxville.

In May, 1864, they crossed the mountains to Tunnel Hill, Ga., arriving May 12, 1864, and joining Gen. Stoneman. On the "Stoneman Raid," the Fifth Cavalry, after bravely holding the enemy in check for the escape of the main body, were surrendered to the enemy against the vigorous protest of Col. Butler, their commander.

These poor men were doomed to the horrors of Andersonville and other prisons only less abominable and deadly. The sad tale of their sufferings may be guessed by the terrible fact that 115 of their number died in prison.

The part of the regiment not captured remained at Atlanta after its surrender, performing guard duty until September 13, 1864, and they were then transferred to Kentucky, being at the time serving as infantry.

The regiment was at length mounted anew, and January 17, 1865, was sent from Louisville to Pulaski, Tenn. Here they scouted, captured bushwhackers and outlaws until June 16, 1865. The muster out then took place, and they were welcomed at Indianapolis June 21, 1865, at the Capitol grove.

Companies G, L and M were transferred to the Sixth Cavalry, and were mustered out at Murfreesboro, Tenn., September 15, 1865.

Men from Randolph county belonging to the Eighty-fourth Regiment—Assistant Surgeon, George H. Russell, mustered out January 27, 1865.

Morton, Gen. Hovey; June 13, 1865, home.

NINETY-NINTH INDIANA INFANTRY, THREE YEARS.

Regiment mustered in at South Bend October 21, 1862; Colonel, Alexander Fowler; mustered out at Washington June 5, 1865.

Officers, 41; men, 859; recruits, 84; died, 178; deserted, 32; unaccounted for, 2; men at close, 425; total, 984; marched 4,000 miles.

The Ninety-ninth was recruited in the Ninth Congressional District, including, however, three companies from the Sixth District that had been raised for the Ninety-sixth.

In November, 1862, the regiment moved to Memphis, and November 25, on the Tallahatchie campaign. Returning, they were stationed on the railroad east of Memphis, at Lagrange.

May 6, 1863, the regiment moved to Memphis, and thence down the Mississippi to the siege of Vicksburg.

July 4, they started for Jackson. July 16, that town was evacuated and Sherman's army took possession. After lying in camp at Big Black River for several weeks, the movement to Chattanooga was begun. The Ninety-ninth formed a part of the column that struck out from Memphis and marched across Mississippi and Alabama into Georgia, through Corinth, Florence and Stevenson, to Chattanooga, arriving November 24. The battle of Mission Ridge was fought the next day, and the Ninety-ninth was engaged therein.

Chasing Bragg to Graysville, they turned eastward, and set out forthwith for Knoxville, to drive off Longstreet and relieve Burnside. The column accomplished their difficult march, nearly without blankets, and greatly lacking for clothing and shoes, without regular rations and cut off from supplies, many of the men barefooted, but cheerful in their destitute condition, they pressed resolutely onward to find Longstreet's legions fleeing from their approach, and bringing abundant rejoicing to the hearts of the troops shut up in the beleaguered town of Knoxville. The regiment returned, reaching Scottsboro, Ala., December 26, having made a desperate march of more than four hundred miles since driving the hosts of the boastful Bragg from the investment of Chattanooga.

They encamped at Scottsboro until February 14; marched into East Tennessee and back to Scottsboro, and on the 1st of May, 1864, set out as a part of Sherman's grand army on the movement to Atlanta and the sea.

The regiment was in nearly every battle through the entire campaign.

After the fall of Atlanta, Hood's army was pursued, and the Ninety-ninth had a march out and back of 200 miles. With the Ninety-ninth in Howard's Corps on the left, Sherman's victorious force swung loose from its moorings and moved boldly forward through the heart of Georgia, finding supplies as they marched. On a track sixty miles wide that conquering army moved, neither stopped nor stayed until in twenty-four days they had swept over 300 miles of travel and taken Fort McAllister, entered Savannah in triumph and opened communication with the shipping on the coast.

December 15, Savannah was occupied. Shortly the legions took up again their line of march, turning the head of their advancing column northward to capture Richmond and Gen. Lee, and end the war. Columbia was reached February 17, 1865. The Twentieth Corps gladly received the aid of the Ninety-ninth in the battle of Bentonville. Thence the road was taken to Goldsboro, Raleigh, Petersburg and Richmond. The brave soldiers who had made their march hundreds of miles to help take Richmond were balked of their purpose; for Richmond had been already taken, and Sherman's legions could only enter the rebel stronghold as a conquered city. Onward to the capital they pursued their unobstructed way, took part proudly in the grand review in the streets of Washington and were mustered out June 5, 1865, and going by rail to their own state and capital, they were joyfully received and cordially welcomed "home again." The Ninety-ninth had 900 officers and men, and 425 at mustering out. Though they performed much hard service including thousands of miles of weary tramp, tramp, tramping over southern plains and valleys, yet health and strength, and, we may add, good hope and cheer, were preserved in a remarkable degree.

Company H—Elliot Budd, discharged February 1, 1863; John W. Baker, mustered out June 5, 1865; Joseph Clark, discharged January 1, 1863; James D. Dooley, mustered out June 5, 1865; John C. Johnson, mustered out June 5, 1865; Henry T. Lamb, discharged May 5, 1863; Anderson Lamb, died at Memphis December 7, 1862; Lewis McDaniel, discharged March 13, 1865; William F. Parsons, discharged November 12, 1862; George L. Parsons, discharged February 20, 1863; Green M. Parsons, mustered out June 5, 1865; David Pennington, mustered out June 5, 1865; John B. Rolston, died at Memphis, November 26, 1862; John Robins, transferred to Marine Brigade, April 13, 1863; Isah M. Shepherd, died at East Point, Ga., September 6, 1864, of wounds; William Wallton, died March 6, 1863; Jesse W. Wynn, mustered out June 5, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTH REGIMENT—MINUTEMEN—MORGAN'S RAID.

Late on the evening of July 8, 1863, word came to Indianapolis that Gen. John H. Morgan had crossed the Ohio near Corydon, Ind. Gov. Morton issued his call forthwith, and in forty-eight hours 65,000 men had answered the call. Thirteen regiments were organized, numbered from One Hundred and Second to One Hundred and Fourteenth, inclusive.

The One Hundred and Fifth Regiment contained two companies from Henry and two from Randolph; Union, Putnam, Hancock, Clinton, Madison and Wayne counties, each one company. Seven of the companies were of the legion.

The regiment was organized July 12, 1863, Kline G. Shryock, colonel, containing 713 men. They left instanter for Lawrenceburg. After marching around for several days in pursuit of Morgan, and finding that he had gone eastward through Ohio and beyond their reach, they returned to Indianapolis in just six days after they had quitted it, and were mustered out July 18, 1865. Men from Randolph county in One Hundred and Fifth Regiment:

Company K, Marion county, Capt. William S. Hubbard.

Company L, Wabash county, Capt. Benjamin F. Daily.

Company M, Madison county, Capt. Joel H. Elliot.

The regiment was mustered in at Indianapolis October 1, 1863, and mustered out at Austin, Texas, February 18, 1866.

Officers, 51; men, 1,151; recruits, 127; died, 243; deserted, 169; unaccounted for, 29; total, 1,239.

The regiment entered Camp Shanks, at Indianapolis, and remained under drill until December 6, 1863. At first, they were entirely untrained and their experience presents some ludicrous adventures.

At their first parade, for instance, when the order was given to "draw sabers," the rattling caused by the movement frightened the horses out of all control, and they scattered and fled in every direction. But perseverantia vincit omnia (perseverance conquers all things), and before they left Indianapolis, their mounted parade was a scene that would be, even for a veteran cavalier, a sight to behold.

December 6, 1863, the Seventh Cavalry left Indianapolis for Cairo, Ill., moving thence to Columbus, Ky. Their first camp was near that town, and their first night in the field was spent in a pouring rain, which flooded the country and their camping ground as well.

They marched to Union City, Tenn.; arrived December, 1863, and were there assigned to the First Brigade, Sixth Division, Sixteenth Army Corps —Brigade Commander, Col. George E. Waring, Jr., of the Fourth Missouri Cavalry.

The regiments in the brigade were the Fourth Missouri, Col. George E. Waring, Jr.; Second New Jersey, Col. Joseph Karge; Seventh Indiana, Col. John P. C. Shanks; Sixth Tennessee, Col. Hurst; Nineteenth Pennsylvania, Col. Hess; Second Iowa, four companies, Maj. Frank Moore; battery, Capt. Copperfair.

The regiments marched in detachments to disperse a body of rebels at Dresden.

December 23, 1863, Gen. A. J. Smith set out with his entire force for Jackson, Tenn., sixty miles from Union City, to drive away Gen. Forrest, remaining till January 1, 1864, that "terrible New Year's," when the thermometer changed, in Central Indiana, between 9 P. M. and 4 A. M., from forty-five above to twenty-six below zero, a change of seventy-one degrees in nine hours, or a fraction less than eight degrees each hour.

The regiment was on its return to Union City. The weather grew intensely cold, and the rain changed to a fierce and fearful sleet. Many were badly frozen, and some died from the exposure—among others, Alvah Tucker, of Company B, dying at St. Louis some time afterward. Even horses perished by the cold and fell dead in the road.

A detachment of the Seventh Cavalry had been left at Hichman, Ky., and Lieut. Col. Browne was sent there to take command.

January 7, 1864, the body of the cavalry, under Gen. Grierson, set out for Colliersville, in Southwest Tennessee, to join an expedition into Mississippi in aid of Gen. Sherman.

Gen. Grant writes to Gen. McPherson, December 11, 1863:

"I will start a cavalry force through Mississippi in about two weeks, to clean out the state entirely of all rebels."

He writes to Gen. Hallack, December 23, 1863:

"I am engaged in collecting a large cavalry force at Savannah, Tenn., to co-operate in 'cleaning out Forrest,' to push on also into East Mississippi, and destroy the Mobile railroad."

Still again he writes to Gen. Halleck, January 15, 1864:

"Sherman is to move to Meridian from Vicksburg with 20,000 men and the co-operating cavalry force from Corinth. Banks is to push westward from the river, and, by these combined movements, it is expected to crush the rebel power in the South in the region of the Mississippi river."

Gen. Smith was ordered to start from Memphis by February 1, and to move straight for Meridian, Miss., having about seven thousand cavalry.

Gen. Smith remained near Memphis till February 9. Marching eastward, the army of seven thousand men concentrated near and east of the Tallahatchie river on the 17th of February. A slight engagement was had at Okolona February 18, and the Union forces were badly defeated February 20, retreating to Colliersville, reaching that point February 25, and arriving at Camp Grierson, near Memphis, February 27.

The whole movement was a sad, disgraceful failure.

On the day when Smith commenced his ill-starred retreat, Gen. Winslow, with the Union forces, was at Louisville, Miss., only forty-five miles distant.

The history of these events charges that the generals commanding in that and the succeeding expedition in which the Seventh took part were entirely incompetent and inefficient, especially Gen. Sturgis in the expedition that followed.

The whole number of the regiment who were engaged at Okolona was 813, and the loss was one-tenth of that number—eleven killed, thirty wounded, five wounded and prisoners, captured unwounded, thirty-six; total, eighty-two. Loss from Randolph county, Lieut. Francis M. Way, wounded.

The regiment afterward engaged as part of a force of 8,000 men under Gen. Sturgis, who seems to have been unfit for his station. At Brice's Cross Roads, Miss. (Guntown), a severe battle took place, resulting in the defeat of the Union forces, June 10, 1864, and Col. Browne was wounded in the ankle.

The troops seem to have been, in these expeditions, brave and heroic, but the failure would appear to be charged upon the commanding general.

The Seventh Indiana, Lieut. Col. Browne commanding, was especially commended for heroic conduct. Gen. Grierson thus recognizes their brave and soldier-like bearing:

"Your General congratulates you upon your noble conduct during the late expedition, fighting against overwhelming numbers, in adverse circumstances, your prompt obedience to orders and unflinching courage commanding the admiration of all, turned even defeat almost into victory. For hours, on foot, you repulsed the charges of the enemy's infantry; and again, in the saddle, you turned his assault into confusion. Your heroic perseverance saved hundreds of your fellow-soldiers from capture. You have been faithful to your honorable reputation, and have fully justified the esteem of your commander."

Three hundred and fifty were engaged, with a loss of eight killed, sixteen wounded and seventeen missing.

During the month of July, 1864, the Seventh Cavalry was sent to Vicksburg, and thence to Port Gibson and Grand Gulf, returning to Memphis and to White Station, July 24, 1864.

Not long after another expedition, toward Holly Springs and Oxford, was undertaken. During the progress, Gen. Forrest dashed into Memphis, remaining, however, but a few minutes. Gen. Smith returned to Memphis with the army about August 29.

About September 22, Gen. Price, with 14,000 rebels, entered Missouri from Arkansas, and the Union cavalry, including 500 men of the Seventh Indiana, under Maj. Simonson, started after him, marching over a large part of Missouri and into the Indian Territory. This pursuit was successful in driving Price across the Arkansas into Indian Territory; and the Seventh returned, part to St. Louis and part to Louisville, while the part that remained at Memphis did good service in that region, among other things capturing Dick Davis, the noted guerrilla chief, and the terror of the region.

December 23, 1864, Gen. Grierson started for Colliersville, Tenn., on his famous "cavalry ride" through Mississippi, moving with great rapidity and destroying vast stores collected for the rebel army at various points, as also railroads, factories, etc.

The expedition returned to Memphis January 10, 1865.

A movement was made into Arkansas January 20, 1865, which succeeded in destroying considerable rebel stores.

Another expedition was sent from Memphis into Arkansas and into Louisiana, but what for no one but the projector knows, as the country traversed was execrable and worthless, and had never been and never could be occupied by a military force.

Upon the surrender of the rebel armies, the Seventh Cavalry expected to be disbanded, but it was sent to Texas, being carried by steamer down the Mississippi, and up Red river to Alexandria, La., reaching that point June 23, 1865.

Here a force was concentrating of 3,000 cavalry, to be sent to Houston under command of Maj. Gen. Custer, who seems to have been a pompous, vain and cruel officer. Only twenty-five years of age, he was a regular army officer, and seemed to regard private soldiers as machines to be used for his own caprice.

Two men were court-martialed for desertion, and sentenced to be shot. One suffered the fearful penalty. The other died from fright, in a curious manner.

Gen. Custer had decided to save the life of one, ordering him, instead, to Dry Tortugas for three years, telling the fact, however, only to his Provost Marshal. This officer, at the moment before the execution, stepped up to the commuted man to lead him away. Clapping his hand roughly upon the prisoner, the poor man, thinking himself shot, fainted away, and died shortly afterward from the effects of the fright.

During the march to Texas, Gen. Custer court-martialed two men for killing a runty calf, worth perhaps $1, and inflicted the penalty of shaving their heads, giving them forty lashes and marching them before the regiment on dress parade in this condition.

August 8, 1865, the troops set out for Texas, and the march was disagreeable to excess.

An account written by Col. Browne shows in a striking light the hardships of this desert march. An extract or two may be given:

"Monday, August 14—Weather warm, roads dusty, no houses, woods all pine, water very scarce and bad. Pitched my tent in a 'yaller-jacket's nest,' and swore blue blazes.

Thursday, August 17—Pines and deer, bugs, snakes and gallinippers inhabit the whole face of the earth.

Friday, August 18—Marched out of the woods into the woods and through the woods, and camped God only knows where; nobody to inquire of; in the woods all day and in the woods all night."

The command arrived at Hempstead, Texas, August 25, 1865, after a tedious, weary march of 300 miles.

Of this march, Col. Browne writes:

"During all this time, I did not average more than three hours' sleep each night, although we made short marches each day. To sleep in the day time was impossible. I was broken out as thickly as ever one was with the measles, from the bottom of my feet to the crown of my head; and, during the heat of the day, I felt as though I were pricked by a million of pins, and sprinkled with hot ashes on the bare skin. The 'itch' is not a circumstance to the 'heat.' In addition to this, lie down when you will in these pine woods, and you are alive with all manner of bugs and creeping things in a moment, and each one of this army of vermin would scratch, bite, sting and gnaw you all the time. Then, though there was abundance of pine forest, there was no shade. The trees stood eighty feet high without a limb, giving about as much shade as so many tall gate-posts."

At Hempstead, the regiment was consolidated. Gen. Shanks was mustered out, and Col. Browne put in command of the re-organized regiment.

October 30, 1865, they left Hempstead for Austin, the State capital, arriving November 4, 1865. Here they remained till the muster-out, which took place February 18, 1866.

Proceeding to Galveston, the men crossed the gulf to New Orleans, thence by steamer to Cairo, and by rail to Indianapolis. A public reception and dinner were had, as being the last regiment "come home from the wars." Gov. Baker and Gen Shanks made addresses, and Col. Browne responded; and the men were paid, and joyfully sought their homes, happy, indeed, that "the cruel war was over."

Position and movements: Camp Shanks, Indianapolis, two months; Union City, Tenn., December 6-24, 1863; reconnoissance toward Paris, Tenn., December 14, 1863; return to Union City; pursuit of Forrest, December 24, 1863, and onward; battle and defeat of Okolona, Miss., February 22, 1864; loss, eleven killed, thirty-six wounded, thirty-seven missing; total, eighty-four; the regiment was brave and heroic, but was overpowered by numbers; second movement against Forrest, June, 1864; battle of Guntown, Miss., June 10, 1864; the battle was lost, but the regiment was complimented by the general for its valor; pursuit of Price in Missouri, November and December, 1864; Grierson's expedition into Mississippi, December 21, January 5, 1864, 1865; camp at Vernon taken December 28, 1864; large quantity of rebel stores destroyed; sixteen railroad cars loaded with pontons for Hood, and 4,000 new carbines; Alexandria, La., June, 1865; consolidated into six companies July 21, 1865; Col. Shanks mustered out for disability October 10, 1865; Lieut. Col. Browne promoted colonel October 10, 1865; mustered out at Austin, Texas, February 18, 1866.

Matchett, mustered out September 19, 1865, as corporal.

A considerable number of the members of the One Hundred and Nineteenth were on board the ill-fated steamer Sultana, which was destroyed, with many hundreds of released prisoners going north, who had been allowed, in violation of all dictates of prudence, to crowd themselves upon that old hulk in their eagerness to reach their Northern homes. (See Sultana.) We should be glad to give a list of these men, but no such list is within our reach.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIRST REGIMENT, NINTH CAVALRY, THREE YEARS.

Organized March 1, 1864, at Indianapolis; Colonel, George W. Jackson. Mustered out at Vicksburg, August 28, 1865.

Officers, 48; men, 1,219; recruits, 67; died, 206; deserted, 126; unaccounted for, 20; total, 1,334.

The regiment left Indianapolis May 3, 1864, for Pulaski, Tenn., and was on duty there till November 23, engaged in the Forrest and Wheeler campaigns of the time. At Sulphur Branch Trestle, Ala., September 25, 1864, a detachment of the regiment lost, in an engagement with Forrest, 120 killed, wounded and missing.

On Hood's approach, the regiment fell back to Nashville, and the men were mounted and sent to the front. At Franklin, it suffered a loss of twenty-six officers and men. After Hood's retreat, they took up winter quarters at Gravelly Springs, Ala., from January 6 to February 6, 1865, and, at the latter date, proceeded to New Orleans. Turning over their horses, the Ninth returned to Vicksburg March 25. Remaining on duty there to May 5, they were remounted and employed in garrisoning posts in the interior of Mississippi. May 22, 1865, the regiment came again to Vicksburg, to be mustered out; but the act was not accomplished till August 28, 1865.

They arrived at Indianapolis September 5, 1865. A public reception was held for that and other returned regiments September 6, 1860.

The number of men on the muster-out was 386. April 26, 1865, fifty-five were lost by the explosion of the steamer Sultana on her homeward passage up the Mississippi, they having been paroled from rebel imprisonment. The survivors reached Indianapolis in May, and were mustered out as paroled prisoners of war.

Fairview Rangers—Captain, Cyrus B. St. John; First Lieutenant, James R. Jones; Second Lieutenant, John W. Barger.

Whether these companies of which the officers are given above performed any duty of any sort we are unable to state.

Many of the officers and men in them enlisted in active service, and spent more or less time at the front and elsewhere with the regiments in which they enrolled their names.

FORTIETH OHIO.

Since several persons from Randolph joined this regiment, we give a brief sketch thereof.

Organized at Camp Chase in September and November, 1861; Colonel, Jonathan Cranor. All of Companies E and G, much of Company I and parts of F and K are said to have enlisted from Darke county, Ohio. The following persons were from Randolph county, Ind.:

Company B—Recruited by Capt. Reeves, promoted major; Lewis Addington; William Brown, died March 19, 1863, at Piketon, Ky.; Martin Cox, John Ferrell, Jabez W. Freestone, veteran, died shortly after the close of the war, and buried at Portland, Jay county, Ind.; George Hollowell, William Ingle, corporal, killed at Kenesaw, Ga., before Atlanta; James Mendenhall, Joseph O'Neall, Lewis Phillips, Isaiah Regan, drum major; John Spotts, died in Georgia; two more, also, whose names were not obtained.

RECAPITULATION.

The following is the number of men in the different regiments set down to Randolph county:

Eighth Regiment (three months), 78; Sixth (three years), 2; Seventh (three years), 3; Eighth (three years), 69; Ninth (three years), 37; Eleventh (three years), 2; Twelfth (three years), 2; Thirteenth (three years), 6; Sixteenth (three years), 1; Nineteenth (three years), 148; Twentieth (three years), 47; Twenty-first, First Heavy Artillery, 13; Twenty-seventh (three years), 3; Twenty-eighth, First Cavalry (three years), 1; Thirty-first (three years), 1; Thirty-third (three years), 1; Thirty-fourth (three years), 4; Thirty-sixth (three years), 4; Forty-second (three years), 3; Forty-seventh (three years), 2; Fifty-fourth (one year), 39; Fifty-fifth (three months), 88; Fifty-seventh (three years), 76; Sixty-ninth (three years), 369; Seventy-first (three years), 2; Seventy-fifth (three years), 4; Seventy-seventh (three years), 2; Eighty-fourth (three years), 308; Eighty-ninth (three years), 1; Ninetieth, Fifth Cavalry (three years), 48; Ninety-seventh (three years), 1; Ninety-ninth (three years), 21; One Hundred and Fifth (Morgan raid), 143; One Hundred and Sixth (Morgan raid), 203; One Hundred and Ninth (Morgan raid), 56; One Hundred and Seventeenth (six months), 1; One Hundred and Nineteenth, Seventh Cavalry (three years), 94; One Hundred and Twenty-first, Nineteenth Cavalry (three years), 18; One Hundred and Twenty-fourth (three years), 208; One Hundred and Thirtieth (three years), 6; One Hundred and Thirty-first, Twelfth Cavalry (three years), 4; One Hundred and Thirty-fourth (100 days), 90; One Hundred and Thirty-ninth (100 days), 1; One Hundred and Fortieth (one year), 13; One Hundred and Forty-seventh (one year), 127; One Hundred and Fifty-fourth (one year), 2; One Hundred and Fifty-sixth (one year), 5; Twentieth Battery, Light Artillery, 1; Fifth Colored United States Troops, 1; Eighth Colored United States Troops, 1; Twenty-third Colored United States Troops, 3; Twenty-eight Colored United States Troops, 3; Forty-second Colored United States Troops, 3; Forty-fifth Colored United States Troops, 2; other colored soldiers, 14; other colored soldiers, Greenville settlement, Ohio, 14; Fortieth, Ohio (three years), 12. Total credit to Randolph, or supposed to belong thereto, 2,373.

This list is, of course, partly uncertain. Most of the persons named are known to have belonged to Randolph, but some have been put down as probable citizens of the county. Doubtless a considerable number really belonging to the county have been credited elsewhere, while in some cases she has received credit for men really residents of other counties. We have done our best toward an accurate statement and with that are obliged to be content.

Of course, a considerable number, amounting to many thousands throughout the state, and doubtless to some hundreds in the county, are counted over again, the names of some occurring several times; but to make an exact account of such would hardly be practicable, and if it were so the good accomplished would not be worth the trouble.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF REGIMENTS, ASSIGNMENT OF RECRUITS, ETC.

Eighth Regiment Infantry (three months)—Re-organized under Col. William P. Benton, and mustered into service for three years September 5, 1861.

Sixth Infantry (three years)—Non-veterans mustered out September 22, 1864; the veterans and recruits were transferred to the Sixty-eighth Indiana. Upon the muster-out of the Sixty-eighth, June 20, 1865, nineteen men of the old Sixth Infantry were not entitled to discharge, and they were again transferred to the Forty-fourth Indiana and served therein till finally mustered out therewith, September 14, 1865.

Seventh Infantry (three years)—Non-veterans mustered out September 3, 1864; veterans transferred to the Nineteenth Regiment. October 18, 1864, the new Nineteenth and the new Twentieth were consolidated, the new regiment being known as the Twentieth. The new Twentieth was mustered out July 12, 1865.

Twelfth Regiment (three years)—Mustered out June 8, 1865; those not entitled to discharge were transferred to the Forty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Regiments, and served till July 15 and 17 respectively.

Thirteenth Regiment—Consolidated into a battalion under order 384 from Gen. Butler, dated December 2, 1864; five companies of drafted men and substitutes, assigned in the spring of 1865, and no further change till mustered out, September 5, 1865.

Sixteenth Regiment (three years)—Changed to a mounted infantry regiment, and, on the muster-out, June 30, 1865, the recruits were transferred to the Thirteenth Cavalry; discharged November 18, 1865.

Seventeenth Regiment (three years)—Changed to a mounted infantry regiment February 12, 1863, and mustered out August 8, 1865.

Nineteenth Regiment—Seventh and Nineteenth consolidated September 3, 1864; transferred to the re-organized Twentieth; discharged July 12, 1865.

Twentieth Regiment—Fourteenth and Twentieth consolidated August 1, 1864. New Nineteenth and Twentieth united October 18, 1864. New Twentieth mustered out July 12, 1865.

Twenty-first Regiment—Changed to a heavy artillery organization in February, 1863. Two companies were added and the regiment was recruited to the maximum. The regiment was called the First Heavy Artillery, and served as such till mustered out, January 13, 1866.

Twenty-seventh Regiment—Non-veterans mustered out at Atlanta, Ga., November 4, 1864; the other transferred to the Seventieth, order dated October 12, 1864. Seventieth mustered out June 8, 1865; those not entitled to discharge transferred again to the Thirty-third, and mustered out with that regiment July 21, 1865.

Twenty-eighth Regiment, First Cavalry—The battalion of this regiment serving in the west consolidated into two companies, September 24, 1864; mustered out June 24, 1865. The battalion in the east consolidated into one company June 23, 1864; discharged July, 1865.

Thirty-sixth Regiment—Non-veterans mustered out under order of August 13, 1864; the others formed into one company and transferred July 12, 1865, to the residuary battalion of the Thirtieth, as Company H; mustered out November 25, 1862.

Sixty-ninth Regiment—Consolidated with a battalion of four companies January 23, 1865; mustered out July 5, 1865; recruits transferred to the Twenty-fourth Regiment; mustered out November 15, 1865.

Seventy-first Regiment, Sixth Cavalry—Changed to cavalry, order dated February 23, 1863; two companies added and the organization completed October 12, 1863. Original members mustered out June 17, 1865; recruits joined with those of the Fifth Cavalry June 25, 1865, new organization called Sixth Cavalry; mustered out September 15, 1865.

Seventy-fifth Regiment—Mustered out June 5, 1865; recruits transferred to the Forty-second; mustered out July 21, 1865.

Eighty-fourth Regiment—Mustered out and the recruits attached to the Fifty-seventh Regiment as Company K; mustered out December 14, 1865.

Eighty-ninth Regiment—Recruits transferred to the Twenty-sixth July 10, 1865; mustered out January 15, 1866.

Ninetieth Regiment, Fifth Cavalry—Companies G, L and M and the recruits transferred to the re-organized Sixth Cavalry June 23, 1865; mustered out September 15, 1865.

Ninety-seventh Regiment—Recruits transferred to the Forty-eighth; mustered out July 15, 1865.

Ninety-ninth Regiment—Recruits transferred to the Forty-eighth and mustered out July 15, 1865.

One Hundred and Nineteenth, Seventh Cavalry—Consolidated into a battalion of six companies July 21, 1865; mustered out February 18, 1866.

REBEL PRISONS—PRISON LIFE.

Our Randolph soldiers, sharing abundantly in the hardships, perils and sufferings incident to a cruel and terrible war, bore also their full proportion in those most fearful and inexpressible scenes, the horrors, the tortures, the deaths incident to rebel prisons.

The principal prisons used by the rebels for the confinement of their captives were as follows:

Belle Island, near Richmond, Va.; Libby Prison, Richmond, Va.; tobacco factories, Richmond, Va.; Danville, Va.; Lynchburg, Va.; Petersburg, Va.; Charlotte, N. C.; Raleigh, N. C.; Salisbury, N. C.; Charleston, S. C.; Columbia, S. C.; Florence, S. C., 11,000, graves, 2,795; Andersonville, Ga.; Atlanta, Ga.; Blackshear, Ga., temporary prison, not so bad; Macon, Ga.; Millen, Ga.; Savannah, Ga.; Chawba, Ala.; Tuscaloosa, Ala.; Camp Ford, or Tyler, Texas; Camp Gross, Texas; Castle Thunder, Richmond; Pemberton Prison, Richmond; Smith Prison, Richmond; Jail-yard, Charleston; Roper Hospital, Charleston; workhouse, Charleston.

A considerable number of men from Randolph county, Ind., were so unfortunate as to be captured and to suffer imprisonment. Among them were W. A. W. Daly, Charles Potter, Barnes, of Washington township;

Edward Simmons, Van Sipe, of Jackson township, and doubtless many others. Barnes died in Andersonville. Daly spent time at Andersonville, Millen, Florence, Savannah and Charleston—fourteen months in all. Some of his experience is given under the head of reminiscences in another part of this work. We avail ourselves of a statement made and published (Prison Report by Congressional Committee, 1867-69) concerning Calvin W. Diggs, enlisted from Jay county, but for many years a resident of Winchester, Randolph county, condensing it to suit our present purpose.

The following is a statement of Calvin W. Diggs, then of College Corner, Jay county, Ind.:

"I was a private of Company A. Eighty-fourth Indiana Infantry, and was captured at Chickamauga September 21, 1863. For six days I was kept on the battle ground, witnessing meanwhile the terrible sufferings from fearful wounds, aggravated by exposure and neglect. October 1, we were packed into cars like so many hogs and taken to Richmond—900 miles. Arriving in Richmond October 10, we were searched, our money taken, amounting, in case of the 300 men on the floor where I was, to thousands of dollars. We were put into Smith's building, and lodged (365 in number) in the lower story, mostly under ground and filthy and damp. Rations, ten ounces bread and three to six ounces of meat, not enough for a single meal, the meat being generally tainted and sometimes rotten, and the box containing it lined with skippers. The officer in charge (Turner) was abusive and cruel, and the prisoners did not dare to make even the simplest requests. November 14, 1863, we were taken to Danville, Va., and confined in five tobacco factories. The buildings contained about 2,500 prisoners. Rations at Danville, half a loaf of dark bread of very inferior quality. What it was made of we could not determine. After a while, corn-bread was substituted, of a wretched sort, meal very coarse and unsifted. A little meat also was given, and occasionally some soup, though both were filthy and abominable. The weather was very cold, winter of 1863-64, but we had no fire and very little clothing. We lay on the bare floor with no covering. Our Government furnished clothing to some extent about Christmas, 1863, but much even of that passed before long into the hands of the rebels, since the hunger of the men was so very great that very many exchanged clothing for a little food to satisfy their terrible cravings. April 15, 1864, we were sent to Andersonville. The prisoners from Belle Island had preceded us, and they were by far a worse-looking, more wretched set of human beings than ourselves. The 'dead line' was made by nailing slats on stakes about three feet high, and was about fifteen feet from the stockade. I saw two shot by the guards for crossing the 'dead line.' One was trying to get some better water by reaching beyond the line; the other went beyond the line on purpose and begged the guard to put an end to his misery.

There was a bog or swamp of several acres on both sides of the stream on which the stockade was located. No arrangement was made for removing filth or excrement, and the prisoners had to resort to this swamp. The stream was the only source of supply for water. The condition of the swamp and of the stream may be imagined, but cannot be described. There were 30,000 prisoners in the stockade at one time. and there was a space of not more than three feet by six to each man. There was almost no shelter, and the rainfall was fearful, at one time twenty days in succession; and the ground became much like a barnyard in the winter. Many dug holes in the ground to burrow in, but the rain would 'drown' them out. The clothing became reduced often to pants and blouse, or to drawers and shirt, and those inconceivably ragged, filthy and loathsome. Our rations at first were raw—one to one and a half pints of very coarse, unsifted meal, one gill of rotten, bug eaten beans or peas, or sometimes rice; sometimes a little meat and occasionally a teaspoonful of salt. The cooking had to be done with the vile water of the execrable stream and in the smoke and soot of a pine knot fire. The effect of this wretched feeding was scurvy in its most terrible forms, mostly showing itself in pain and stiffness of limbs, running sores and the like. In my own case, it caused contraction of limbs (so as not to be able to walk for two months), severe pain and spongy and bleeding gums (every tooth in my head being perfectly loose). Men would lie helpless, covered with foul sores, dying and insensible, and vile vermin crawling in and out of these fearful ulcers. Most of the deaths occurred inside the stockade; few were taken to the hospital. The deaths inside the prison rose to fifty and seventy-five per day. A pack of hounds was kept to recapture escaped prisoners, since attempts to escape were numerous, chiefly by tunneling. Tunnels had to be dug from four to twelve rods, still, many were made and a considerable number of men got out of the stockade, though most of them were retaken and returned to the prison."

Mr. Diggs very seldom spoke of his prison experience, always shrinking from recalling his horrible experiences endured there. Mr. Diggs lived in Winchester until his death, May 22, 1912.

PRISON EXPERIENCE—ANDERSONVILLE.

William Warrell and his brother, Chester Warrell, enlisted in the Fifty-third Ohio Regiment, Company K, August 22, 1861. They were living in Union City, Ohio, at the time. They were taken prisoners by the confederates near Atlanta, July 22, 1864, with a few others of the company. They were marched to Andersonville, arriving in a few days, and cast into that den of horrors. They say tongue cannot describe nor the mind conceive the fearful suffering, wretchedness and death of that awful place. Great numbers were already there, probably 30,000, and the mortality was terrible. Disease and death in their most horrid forms, struck down, day and night, month after month, the best and the bravest in that devoted band. The Warrells stood it comparatively well. William says his worst time was at Savannah, after being removed from Andersonville. He was thought to be near death, and he heard his tent mates planning how they would divide his clothes among them when he was dead. He did not let them know he heard them, but he told them he was not going to die, and he did not. He got better, but had to be led, half carried to the pump to wash, etc., for many days. The scenes were sickening. The bodies were all buried naked, the clothes being saved for those who were still alive to wear. The corpses were laid in tiers by the gate, and when the dead wagon came they were piled up in bulk till the wagon was full. Relays of men were kept outside on parole to dig graves for their poor comrades. Warrell thinks they were buried in separate graves each man by himself. (The author of "Andersonville" states that the bodies were buried in trenches four feet deep.) This last is probably the truth. They were taken to Millen, perhaps in October, 1864; then to Savannah and again to Florida, and at length to Andersonville. They were exchanged at last, in about April, 1865, 5,000 of them being marched through Florida to Jacksonville in that State, and there passed into the Union lines. The confederates left the prisoners about eight miles from the National troops, told them the road to take and let them go, having been paroled not to bear arms till properly exchanged.

Much has been said of the wonderful spring that opened at Andersonville. Warrell saw it burst out. It was on rising ground several rods away from any hollow or bottom. The ground had been growing moist and watery for some days, and it was decided to dig to see what they could find, whereupon the water came forth abundantly. A barrel was set down for a spring or well, and spouts or troughs were laid for the water to run off. The stream was as large as one's arm, furnishing water enough for the whole camp. The water was pure and sweet and cold. One cannot imagine what a blessing was that wonderful spring to those woe-begone men shut up within the impassable walls of that crowded stockade. Before that time the water was absolutely unendurable, taken from that reservoir of unutterable stench and filth, the creek and the swamp through which it ran receiving, as it did, the offal from that seething mass of humanity, without the possibility of cleansing or purification. But to picture these things is utterly impossible. Those who would see it attempted must read "Andersonville," one of the most fearfully thrilling books ever put in print.

As for cooking, Mr. Warrell's squad had a kind of pan, which they had made of a plate of sheet-iron some one had managed to get hold of as they were coming in the cars in their passage to Andersonville. It would hold water and they made mush in it and what not. They had no salt, their bread had no salt and none was furnished that he ever heard of.

Sometimes fresh beef would be furnished, and Warrell says: "I always ate mine raw, because I thought it would help to keep the scurvy off that so many suffered and died with. Their mouths would swell and grow raw, their legs and feet would swell twice the natural size, teeth would come loose and fall out, and they would die rotting by piece meal."

"I have seen," says Mr. Warrell, "men dying with scurvy, naked, except a rag tied round their waist, and the maggots crawling from their flesh as they lay. Men would be sick with the diarrhoea, so sick they could not go away, and they would dig a hole in the ground near them and use it for the purposes of nature. Many such holes would be made within a short distance, and the result may be imagined. I never saw any one killed at the 'dead line,' but have seen them after they had been killed. I saw a man shot by the guards as we were marching to Millen. There was a pile of staves as we passed along, and a man grabbed one of the staves, and the guard shot him and he fell dead, and we marched on and I never knew any more about him.

No utensils of any kind were furnished the prisoners, and many had none at all. The only thing we had was the pan, one-half a foot deep and a foot square. It was stolen once, but we got it again. Those who had money could buy of the guards, corn-bread, or meal, or tobacco. The men would trade anything they had for corn-meal or bread. Every morning would be heard the cry of men wishing to barter—'who'll trade meal for tobacco,' etc. At first, the boys used to cheat the rebels. They would show a nice pair of boots perhaps, and make the rebel throw down his meal, etc., first, and then fling a pair of boots, a poor, worthless pair, far over the stockade, and when Johnnie had found them the 'Yankee rogue' would be gone and could not be discovered. They stopped all this pretty soon by refusing to trade unless the 'Yank' would throw his 'article' first.

The supply of wood was one stick of pine cord wood to twenty-five men, divided by one man into twenty-five parts (one ax was supplied to 100 men) and distributed by one man turning his back and telling who should have each particular pile. Each man would take his quota of wood and cut it up into splinters as fine as shavings or matches, and with these make infinitesimal fires to cook their mush. This splitting of their wood and making and watching their 'teeny-weeny' fires would take hours and hours of weary time. No shelter of any kind was furnished. We had a piece of blanket. We dug a hole a foot or two deep, fixed up a bit of a pole and stretched the blanket fragment over so as to keep the dew off, and then slept in that hole. In the winter we would keep warm in the night by 'trotting' round among the sleeping men hour after hour, and then we would sleep in the sunshine in the daytime when it was hot. My shoes were stolen and I had none the whole winter. We had no matches, nor flints, nor any means to produce fire. We had to depend on some one else. Somebody would have fire, and we would kindle ours when we needed. Once in a while molasses was issued, and often the men could trade it off for meal or bread."

W. A. W. DALY.

"I was captured near Sunshine Church, Ga., during Stoneman's raid, 120 miles south of Atlanta. The expedition set out for the purpose of releasing the prisoners at Macon and Andersonville. We went to Macon, but the prisoners had been moved. Stoneman attacked Macon, but McCook failed to come to time, and we fell back. The rebel advance was met at 10 o'clock p. m. We skirmished until next day, and were surrounded and forced to surrender. So instead of releasing the prisoners at Andersonville, the soldiers were scooped into that awful den themselves. I entered that 'hell above ground' August 2, 1864; was taken to Charleston in November; to Florence in December; afterward to Wilmington, and at length to the Union lines at Goldsboro, N. C., in March, 1865, for parole.

I went in hungry; never had a full meal; could have eaten any day at one meal my whole rations for an entire day, i. e., had they been fit for a human creature to eat, which they were not. Our bread was mostly made from coarse corn meal badly baked, and wretched stuff. But we ate it, and I came out alive.

I went in weighing 216 pounds, but in seven months, when paroled, my weight was only 145 pounds. I had remarkable health for such a place, but language cannot describe such a den of horrors!

I had, when captured, a suit of well worn army clothes, and I wore the same without change, with no soap, until I was nearer naked than clad.

The brook was filth itself. I had no vessel to wash in. There was no water for any purpose but that dreadful stream, thick with the vileness of 35,000 living and dead prisoners. The only time we had the means of washing in clean water was in a heavy rain which fell. The prisoners stripped, and stood rubbing each others' backs and limbs as the rain poured in torrents upon them. Soon after that rain, a great wonder came to pass in that stockade. A spring of pure, clean water came gushing forth in the midst of that prison pen, and ran a life-giving stream, enough for those famishing people. It seemed almost like the stream flowing from the 'rock in the wilderness.' The water of this spring sufficed for drinking and cooking, though but little of that was done, in sooth. Men were in line waiting their turn at that heaven-sent fountain all day long. Sometimes the 'waiting line' numbered 1,000 men. Before that spring burst forth from out that cursed ground, the filthy water of the brook was all that anybody in that stockade could procure, except that now and then a poor fellow had found a little water by digging.

One day a poor fellow (among scores and hundreds of others like him), bespoke my pity who had got fast in the mire of the brook, and I helped him out. Great numbers, sick and helpless, were there besides, and I worked helping the poor wretches a long time, until at last I had to quit to save myself.

I have counted as many as seventy corpses lying stiff and stark at the gate, in one morning, of persons who had died in one dreadful night; and the living would fight for the privilege of carrying a comrade's lifeless remains forth to the burial-ground outside, because by so doing one got the chance to bring in an arm load of wood gathered outside.

Men died by scores, by hundreds, by thousands, within those awful walls, yet I came forth alive; I still survive that loathsome dungeon.

"During that awful suffering, the great body of those men stood firm and steadfast in their loyalty, resisting every attempt to seduce them from their allegiance to their native land. Many times we were marshaled in line and offered freedom and abundance by joining the ranks of the 'men in grey,' but very few yielded even to such offers.

True as steeel, those heroic men continued faithful to their flag, many of them even unto death. And those who lived to gain their freedom, if able for duty, rejoined their regiments and finished their terms of service on the tented field."

Mr. Warrell was never outside the stockade, only as he was taken out to be moved to some other prison.

The prisoners named by William Warrell are as follows:

William Warrell, Company K, Fifty-third Ohio, nine months, Union City; Chester Warrell, Company K, Fifty-third Ohio, nine months, Union City; Jeremiah Torney, Fortieth Ohio, eighteen months, Ward township; Leven B. Moyer, Fortieth Ohio, eighteen months; Stephen Boast, Fortieth Ohio, eighteen months; Newton Founts, Fortieth Ohio, Kansas. Others are as follows:

W A. W. Daly, Ninetieth; Charles Potter, Ninetieth; Calvin W. Diggs, Eight-fourth; John Stick, Alabama, Fifty-fifth Ohio, Company K; Barnes, died, Ninetieth; James Ryan, Fifty-third Ohio; Noah Ingle, Fortieth (Cavalry), died in six weeks; Peter Shaffer, Fortieth Ohio; John Cring, now of Portland, Jay county, Ind.; Daniel Bond, now of Science Hill, Ky.

Francis M. Way, Captain Company B, One Hundred and Nineteenth Regiment, ex-postmaster at Winchester, Ind.; removed to Minnesota in the summer of 1881, but returned to Winchester in a few months; now resides at that place.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR.

When Lee surrendered at Appomattox it was the hope and prayer of all American citizens, regardless of former beliefs, and opinions, that the war, with all its horrors and ravages would never again be known to the United States.

Lessons of the past four years with all the realities of the war were such that it seemed impossible that again we should be called upon to take up arms in any cause. However, this was not to be. The United States, indeed, became its brother's keeper and lent an ear to the call for relief from oppression and tyranny in Cuba.

Again the fife and drum were taken from the attic, the sword from its scabbard and the musket from its place on the wall, and pressed into service in the name of humanity at the call of President McKinley in 1898.

Indiana was found much better prepared to respond than it was at the beginning of the Civil war. It had been evident for a long while that the United States would have to intercede for the oppressed in Cuba.

April 23, 1898, President McKinley called for 125,000 volunteers to serve two years unless sooner discharged. The formal declaration of war against Spain was passed by congress and approved April 25th at 6:15 on the evening of that day.

Governor Mount, of Indiana, received instructions to provide four regiments of infantry and two batteries of light artillery, Indiana. The National Guard was ordered to report at once to General McKee at the fair grounds at Indianapolis. The response to the call of Governor Mount was as enthusiastic as was the call of Governor Morton in 1861, indeed the entire 125,000 called for by the president could have been secured in a few hours in Indiana alone. The companies were all recruited to the number of eighty-four in a few minutes time. Excitement ran high all over the state. In nearly all towns public meetings were held.

Winchester, the home of Company F, was no exception to this rule. A meeting was called and held in the court room and short addresses were made by the veterans of '61. White-haired men, trembling with emotion, gave words of counsel, cheer and warning to the boys about to leave. The talk of one man, Capt. W. A. W. Daly, was exceptionally impressive. The audience fully appreciated the fact that the words of this man were spoken by one who had spent years in the service of his country, suffering innumerable and unspeakable horrors in the prison pens of Andersonville. What, indeed, must have been the emotion of this good man when before him sat in the company, about to depart, three of his own sons.

The company marched to the Big Four station accompanied by the entire population of the city and surrounding country and left for camp at Indianapolis accompanied by the best wishes and prayers of all those left behind. Company F was the only company enlisted in this war from Randolph county, and of it we take the following from a history of the National Guard of Indiana:

Company F is the second military organization which has flourished in Winchester. On August 28, 1883, the Winchester Light Guards were organized and mustered into state service October 15th following. The company served through but one term of enlistment as Company I of the Second Regiment. The officers were Captain Enos M. Ford, First Lieutenant Albert M. Russell, and Second Lieutenant Benjamin C. Marsh.

The present company was organized September 22, 1896, with fifty-five members, and was mustered in by Major W. S. Rich. It was assigned to the second regiment as Company F. and such it has been since.

There was not a man with any military experience and the members paid no attention to the preliminary work, but at once took up the school of the soldier, with the result that they were turned down on their first inspection and were compelled to wait six months before they could secure their arms and equipment.

As no camp of instruction was held during the summer of 1897, the company decided to hold one of its own at Lake Pequanaha, about ten miles from Winchester. A requisition was made for tents and kitchen utensils and the company left for the lake on the second Saturday in July. When the men arrived about six in the evening, it was found that the tents and supplies were in Winchester, and it was necessary to send a detail back for them. The things reached the camp about four the next morning. The guard mount was ludicrous in the extreme, and blank cartridges were issued to the guards and bayonets fixed. Three days of the camp were sufficient, and the company returned home. During the winter, dances and minstrel entertainments were given, while football games and indoor gymnastics were frequent.

At midnight on April 25, 1898, the orders to report in Indianapolis for muster into United States service were received, and, as had been previously arranged, two rounds were fired from a cannon and by one o'clock the drum corps was out. Messengers were sent into the country and Lieutenant Jericho received recruits as fast as he could administer the oath and swore in the last one ten minutes before the train left. The company took fifty men in uniform and thirty without, and the one thing most vividly remembered by the members was the first dinner at Camp Mount, which was followed the next day by a chicken dinner, some twenty-five chickens having disappeared from neighboring hen roosts the previous night.

The second regiment of Indiana National Guard of which Company F was a part "was the second regiment to be mustered into United States service, and on May 10 it became the One Hundred and Fifty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteers. The regiment was doomed to great disappointment so far as active service was concerned, for it did not get beyond camp life. It moved to Chickamauga on May 16, leaving Indiana in the evening and reaching Chattanooga the following evening. The men remained in the cars all night, and the entire day following was consumed in moving to Lytle, Georgia, a distance of but twelve miles, as troops were pouring into the park from all parts of the country and there was but one railroad from Chattanooga to Lytle. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon the train reached Lytle and the regiment started on a three-mile march for camp. It was dark before camping place was reached, and the men bivouacked for the night. The next morning camp was established and the regiment was brigaded with the Second Ohio and the First West Virginia, the brigade which was commanded by General McKee.

"Five months of monotonous routine duty followed, which was not brightened by any prospect of seeing duty in Cuba or Porto Rico. The grounds became so unsanitary that a portion of the troops, including the regiment, was ordered to Camp Poland, near Knoxville, Tennessee, and camp was broken on August 25 and established at Camp Poland the following day. There it remained until September 12, when it was ordered to Indianapolis to be mustered out. The regiment reached Camp Mount two days later, and was furloughed for thirty days from September 17. It re-assembled October 17, and was discharged November 4."

Company F did not lose any men in the service but has lost an unusually large number since, as will be seen in the following sketch of the company written by Rosecrans Bosworth, for the reunion of the company held in Winchester, October 9, 1913.

The following sketch of Company F, Winchester, Indiana, was written by Rosecran Bosworth for the reunion of that company:

A sketch of the origin and history of Company F, 158th Ind. Vol. Inf., and some notes of the reunion held Thursday, October 9, 1913, at Winchester, Ind.

In 1886 John R. Wright, son of Chris. Wright, a charter member of the G. A. R., and Mary Wright, a charter member of the W. R. C., became a charter member of the camp of Sons of Veterans, now commonly known as "Old 44" He was assigned and naturally took to that part of the old ritual "drilling the squad". Along about that time several of our citizens, led by William Reinheimer and J. W. Macy, bought the cannon, which is now mounted near the southwest corner of the court house, for reunion, salute and political use. There was a large part of the year it was not in use and the boys in the "drill squad" of "Old 44" got to talking about "working it." Mr. Wright got permission of the committee in charge and organized a cannon squad known as "Little 44 Battery," which became so proficient that it was taken to St. Joe, Mo., in 1890, and won first prize in a contest there. On its return, enthusiasm ran high, and, urged by citizens and members of the squad, Mr. Wright tried to get a commission to organize a battery of artillery at Winchester. He was informed by those in control of the Indiana Guard that the artillery branch was full, but that they would be glad to have an Infantry company at Winchester, and gave him the necessary papers, and in 1896 Company F. Second Indiana National Guard was mustered into service. J. R.

Wright, captain, Dr. G. C. Markle, first lieutenant, and Walter Daly, second lieutenant, all "Old 44" boys, as were a large number of the enlisted men.

As I did not join Company F till just before they were mustered into the United States service, I know little of its history, but will try to get it later, but the resignation of Lieutenant Markle, late in '97, and the resignation of Captain Wright early in '98 together with other conditions had left the company not in the best of conditions when the Spanish war came in 1898, almost like thunder out of a clear sky. As soon as it looked like war the company was recruited as soon as possible and the officers who later went into United States service were elected and on March 10th were commissioned, Walter H. Daly, captain; Will O. Jericho, first lieutenant; H. G. Conklin, second lieutenant, H. A. Smith, first sergeant; H. O. Stace, quartermaster sergeant.

On April 29th congress passed the famous resolution of intervention, which amounted to the same as a declaration of war. On the 23d the call for 125,000 volunteers was issued. On the night of April 25th Captain Daly received order to remove his company to the State Fair Ground, near Indianapolis. To tell the story of these hours needs a better pen than mine, the boys have told me of it, some try to joke about it, but make a "sorry out of it," but the moisture usually gathers in the eye when it is mentioned; it was mighty serious. "War is Hell" and no earthly power could tell what might have happened to "that bunch of kids" who were so dear to those they were leaving.

Early the next morning, the 26th of April, 1898, I found them quartered in the agricultural hall at the State Fair Ground, and they were a hungry bunch. On May 10th we were mustered into the 158th Indiana Volunteer Infantry and on the 16th we were on our way to Camp Thomas in Chickamauga Park, near Chattanooga, Tenn., where we arrived, landing at Lytle Station, Ga., on the 18th, and marched two and one-half miles east to near Jay's Mill, which is in the northeast corner of the reservation, where we went into camp and stayed in that one spot till August 25th, when we broke camp and were taken to Camp Poland near Knoxville, Tenn., arriving there the next day. We stayed there until September 12th when we left for Indianapolis, arriving there the 14th. On the 17th we were furloughed for thirty days, returned in due time and were dischargd on November 4. Then we scattered, each one going to his own home as fast as he could.

Oh, the stories, volumes of them, that could be told by, and on each one of us, and it would be mighty interesting reading to a lot of people, too. The landing in Camp Mount hungry and the several things that were done to get food. How the mind drifts back to Ray Klefeker, to the blanketing, the running the guard line, and Comrade Wigmore on the road to Chattanooga, the pretty girls at Somerset, Ky., the march to camp near Jay's Mill, the bath in Chickamauga creek, the pup tents, the measles, the Midway just out of the park east, the hospital, the drills—six a day, two on Sunday. Talk about drilled regiments, if there was a better outside the standing army of Europe, I would like to see it.

The guard house, well we had everything I ever heard of, in army life, but the hard marching and fighting, and I don't know of one in Company F but would far rather had that, than have had the dreary heart and digestion, wrecking time and the food we had at Camp Thomas, but then we had the quartette and Charles Daly with his kodak and diary and his helpful way with all the boys, and by the way, he is the one that ought to be writing this "history"; Lis Daly, Busic, Kid Burris, Ep. Ayres, and his mules, Austin, Benson, whispering Hubig, Jackson, Dotterer, Kellar, Munden, Rogerson, Sims, Stanley, Walrod, Warrum and the dog, Wigmore, Lewis, Pierson and Wandering Brannon, any and all of whom could be depended on to put on a stunt on short notice of his or their inimitable specialty and an absolute guarantee of no two alike and something new each time. This helped a lot.

So many things spring into mind but I do not dare to take the space. Then came the rumor, "we are going home," how I would remember the look of joy that broke over their faces when they heard it, always followed by a look of pain perhaps setting down with face in hands and the plaintive cry, "Oh, if we had only seen some service"; a few swore that they would never go to their old stamping ground until they had seen some service, and some didn't, some joined the 160th and 161st in or on the way to Cuba, some went into the regular army and saw service in the Philippines, China, etc. Jackson and Burris were in the Chinese Tientsin-Pekin trouble and another died from the effects of this campaign, etc., then we got back at last to Indianapolis and how the ladies of that city banqueted us and our personal friends met us and could not do enough for us and the furlough and the wonderful banquet in Gordon Rink, then the empty space for more of the glory of mother, wife or sweetheart and home for the rest.

Well, we separated and no concerted action had been taken in these fifteen years to keep track of each other for either the protection of our interests or the pleasure of renewing old times. While getting ready for Home Coming Day some of our boys thought, why wouldn't it be a good time for Company F to come home, all the close-by boys were called together and a temporary organization formed by electing Sergeant Howard, chairman; Sergeant Smith, secretary-treasurer; Lieutenant Jericho, chairman; reception committee, U. G.

Daly, Stanley and Troy Smith on time, place and banquet committee, Bosworth, Ziegler and Charles Daly on invitation and program. We all went to work and had things moving nicely, invitations were sent to each member of the company whose address could be had, and to the regimental, battalion and hospital officers for a reunion to be held the afternoon and evening before Home Coming Day; soon answers came back till we were assured of near forty coming. They began drifting in some days before the day set till there were thirty registered when we set down to the banquet. To me this reunion was one of the pleasantest experiences of my life. In the afternoon we met informally in the present armory offices and had an old-time camp talk. It was mighty interesting to hear Grant Pierson and Charlie Sims tell the anecdotes of camp life all the way to who greased the 'dummy track.' And Lester Burris, Sel. Jackson and Ed Lewis telling of the wonders of China, the Philippines and all over the world. Then came the banquet in the Sons of Veterans Hall at 7 p. m. Captain Daly presided and had prepared a fine program, which, after the welcome address and response, the latter by Comrade Sims, as he only can do it and the reading of very nice and interesting letters from Colonel Harry B. Smith, now at the head of a large sheet metal company, at Salisbury, N. C., Major H. T. Conde, with a mercantile company, with headquarters in Peoria, Ill., and Sergeant Major Moorehead, at the head of the law department of the Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis, and some of our Company F boys. The boys then took charge, and oh, the time they did have, I couldn't describe it if I would, I wouldn't dare if I could. You of Company F who read this see who was there in the list at the end of this article, you will understand. At a late hour we settled down as First Sergeant Smith began to call the roll as he used to and those who knew told of those absent, of the living, what they were doing, and where, of the dead (eighteen of them) all they could, some we have lost track of and want to hear from them badly.

Company F was mustered into the United States service with eighty-three officers and men; in June Charles Daly came back to Randolph county and enlisted twenty-seven more who were mustered in June 22nd making 110 officers and men. Following the roll call came the business. It was unanimously carried that we should have a permanent organization to be known as the Company F 158th Indiana Volunteer Infantry Reunion Association, which should meet each year as determined by previous meeting, that we should have a president and secretary-treasurer by election and that he should appoint a historian and three of an executive committee of five of which the president and secretary shall be members, whose duty it will be to make all the arrangements for the next reunion. All officers to hold office one year or until their successors are selected. The election results as follows: Captain Daly, president, First Sergeant Smith, secretary-treasurer, President Daly appointed the following: Historian, R. J. Bosworth; Executive Committee, R. J. Bosworth, F. W. Howard and P. H. Stanley.

As this was a meeting to perfect a permanent organization and find out what the comrades wanted in the future, it was decided that nobody outside of the regiment would be invited, but it was the almost unanimous wish of those present that the wives and families of the members of the company be invited to our next reunion and that it be held in Winchester, as near as possible to the next Home Coming Day, if there is one next year, if not the executive committee to fix the date. It was carried that a payment of 50 cents be asked each member to meet the expenses that will have to be met in perfecting and keeping up our organization, especially that which will fall on our secretary, who will have his hands full from now on in keeping track of the boys and answering letters on everything pertaining to the company and its members. This fee should be sent to Secretary Smith as soon as possible.

The following is the roll call of Company F as given by Adjutant General Gore's report. There is a * before the name of each one who registered at the reunion, the address of each one is given following the name, if dead the facts as known are given, if no data is given the address is not known.

Company F has the distinction of being one of the oldest companies in continuous service in the state of Indiana. Its officers have been men of ability who have commanded the respect and confidence of those under its charge."

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

The heroic deeds and sacrifices of the soldiers of Randolph county was to be commemorated in another way other than to live in the hearts of all loyal people of the county.

It remained for James Moorman, a man of Quaker faith and conscientiously opposed to the settlement of disputes by war to start a fund with which to build a monument in honor of the union soldiers.

Mr. Moorman bequeathed a fund of $2,000.00 to be used for this purpose, and named Capt. J. R. Jackson, J. W. Macy and Capt. William W. Macy as trustees of that fund. The people of the county highly appreciated this gift but felt that something more than a $2,000.00 monument should be erected and to this end a petition was presented to the county commissioners March 9, 1889, in which "the undersigned petitioners citizens and voters of Randolph county, Indiana, respectfully pray your honorable body to appropriate out of the funds of said Randolph county a sum of money which, with the two thousand dollars devised for that purpose by James Moorman, deceased, added, will be sufficient to build a suitable monument in commemoration of the services and patriotism of the soldiers who fought and died in defense of this country during the late rebellion and in defense of the union of the states and the rights of man, pursuant to the provisions of the act of the general assembly of the state of Indiana entitled "An Act Empowering County Commissioners to Appropriate money for the Erection of Soldiers' Monuments," Approved April 11, 1885, and your petitioners will ever pray."

This petition was signed by "J. W. Macy and 3,913 others."

The county examined the petition carefully and after having found that the majority of the voters of the county were 3,756 and that the petition had been signed by 3,914 voters granted the prayer of said petition and appropriated the sum of $25,000.00. At this same meeting they appointed an advisory committee to act with the board of commissioners and the trustees named in the will of James A. Moorman, deceased, to select plans and a place for the erection of the monument and to assist in the contracting and constructing of the work. The committee thus appointed was composed of A. O. Marsh, David Fudge, Edmund Engle, John W. Hill, Dr. Henry Hunt, William Kerr, Alexander A. Knopp, Lewis N. Cook, William A. W. Daly, Elza McIntire and T. F Moorman.

The county commissioners, trustees and advisory committee met in Winchester on Tuesday the 7th day of May, in a special session and considered and inspected designs for the monument.

On the 2nd day of their deliberations they adopted the designs shown by A. A. McCain, of Indianapolis. Mr. McCain was paid $100.00 for the designs and specifications. On the 22nd of May Isaac Hogston was contracted with to make an excavation twenty-eight feet square and eight feet deep for the foundation. The same day Luther L. Moorman was contracted with to put in the foundation. The contract for the erection of the monument was let to A. A. McCain on the 18th day of July, 1889, at $23,000.00. The corner stone was laid August 15, 1889, by Charles Travis, department commander of the Grand Army of the Republic. The monument was to have been completed October 1st, 1890, but was delayed by changes made in the design.

The original design called for a bronze statue of Mars at rest ten feet high from bottom of feet to crown of head with spear and eagle but this was later changed to the American color bearer.

"The design of the architect was to build a monument in honor of the memory of the union soldier that would be military, not only in its ornamentation, but in the character of its architecture, something entirely different from the common style of shaft or pyramid. The base is twenty-seven feet square, with four cannon muzzles on each front, at each corner of the parapet of the base are placed four bronze figures representing each of the four branches of the service, infantry, cavalry, artillery and navy; these figures are six feet six inches in height and are natural positions. The infantry man at the northeast corner, stands erect, as if looking for the enemy, his gun held firmly, and ready for instant use; the artillery man, at the southwest corner stands erect with his rammer held firmly as though ready for work. The sailor at the southwest corner is setting on a capstan in a very natural position, as if on the lookout for an enemy. The cavalryman stands on the southeast corner, his right hand rests on an unsheathed sword, and he is heavily booted and spurred, as though ready to mount for the fray."

On the southwest and north sides are Grand Army badges, below which are to be found on bronze tablets in raised letters are following inscriptions:

The one on the south side being:

"And the same land that gave them birth, has caught them to the breast,
And we will pray that from their clay full many a raise may start,
Of true men, like you men, to act as brave a part."

The one on the west side being:

"In the God of battle trust, die we may—die we must, but O where can dust to dust be consigned so well
As where heaven its dues shall shed, on the martyred patriots bed
And the rocks shall raise their heads of his deeds to tell."

The one on the north side being:

"On fame's eternal camping ground their silent tents are spread And glory guards with solemn round the bivouac of the dead."

"On the east front of that portion of the monument set apart for patriotic sentiment on the die thereof there shall be a tablet of bronze, on size sufficient to properly fill such space upon which shall be the following inscription in raised letters, said inscription to be in the order as given herein, to wit:

'JAMES MOORMAN.'

'A member of the society of friends and conscientiously opposed to war but recognized the great value of the services of the union soldier to our country and to the cause of human liberty, by his last will and testament contributed $2,000.00 to the erection of this monument.

In commemoration of the services and patriotism of the soldier who fought, and died, during the late rebellion, in defense of their country, the union of the states, and the rights of man, the board of commissioners of the county of Randolph on petition of a majority of the voters of said county had erected this monument.

Erected A. D. 1889-1890.

JOHN R. PHILIPS,
ADAM R. HIATT,
WILLIAM C. DIGGS,
Commissioners.'"

A. A. MCCAIN, Designer.

The story is told that when the artist was seeking a model for the artilleryman that he discovered a man who afterward posed. This man was an iron worker in Chicago. During the time in which the statue was being made it was found he was a first cousin to John Brown, the hero of Osawatomie.

Above these G. A. R. badges encircling the tower is a sheet of bronze six feet wide and twenty-four feet in circumference, covered with reliefs of scenes in a soldier's life, while engaged in battle, the whole making a continuous picture where infantry, artillery and cavalry are all engaged. The monument is fifty-five feet high, the standard, eighteen feet, which makes the height, from and including the base, seventy-three feet.

This monument is not surpassed anywhere in originality and design and durability of construction and it will stand for ages to commemorate the glorious deed of the heroic sons of this grand county who went forth to battle and to die that this nation might live.

The corner stone was laid the 15th day of August, 1889. Of this we quote the following from the Winchester Journal of August 21, 1889:

"It was on the programme for the G. A. R. to form on west side, the S. of V. on the east side, and the W. R. C. on the south side of the monument. But by some oversight, no steps had been taken to preserve these spaces for them and when the procession arrived at the monument, the people had crowded up so solidly that all semblance of order was lost, and comparatively few members of either of the three orders participating in the ceremonies secured positions to either see or hear the ceremonies at that place. On the platform were Department Commander, C. M. Travis, Senior Vice-Commander, P. D. Harris, Junior Vice-Commander, D. B. Campbell; Assistant Adjutant General, I. N. Walker; Officer of the day ———— Armstrong, I. P. Watts, Chaplain, representing department of Indiana, G. A. R., Luther Puckett, representing the army in marching order, including a chicken on his bayonet, Will Chapman, representing the navy, in full naval uniform with small ship, Guard of Honor, representing the G. A. R., Capt. J. W. Newton, representing the Sons of Veterans, Mrs. Maggie Ginger, representing the W. R. C.

The corner stone was laid by Department Commander Travis, assisted by the department officers above named in accordance with the ritual of the Grand Army of the Republic.

As the flag was hoisted on the staff by Comrade J. S. Hiatt, the Miller Band played the 'Star Spangled Banner,' rendering the 'Red, White and Blue,' while the stone was being placed in position.

The Sons of Veterans having no ritualistic work, Capt. J. W. Newton responded for that order as follows:

The Sons of Veterans, deposit within the receptacle formed in the corner stone of the northeast corner of this foundation, upon which are to be erected, artistic columns in commemoration of the noble deeds of the fallen heroes, a roster of the various camps of this county, together with a ritual of our tenets and teachings, and a badge of our membership.

If this depositation shall be found by the people of future ages, when all animate representation of the loyal soldier, and that grand order of the Sons of Veterans shall have passed away, it will evidence the fact that in the time past there were soldiers loyal and true and there existed the order of the Sons of Veterans.

The pages of history will teach that those Sons of Veterans were all American born citizens, and that the Sons of Veterans enjoyed that noble distinction of being Sons of Veterans by birth and by organization.

As the veteran soldier and sailor marches step by step toward the final camping ground, where he will hear the last bugle call, let him be assured, that the union he fought to preserve, will, by the Sons of Veterans, be fully maintained.

As the soldier and sailor preserved our flag unsullied, without a star obscured so will the Sons of Veterans preserve it in its original glory.'

The W. R. C. having no ritualistic work, Mrs. Maggie Ginger, speaking for that order, said:

In behalf of the Woman's Relief Corps of Randolph county, I deposit this ritual and badge. The department of Indiana was organized September 17, 1884, and has a membership of 3,253. May heaven's choicest blessing rest on the organization.'

The following is a list of the articles placed in and sealed up in the tin box placed in the corner stone:

Names of all union soldiers who enlisted from this county.

Roster of each Grand Army post in the county.

Roster of the camps of the Sons of Veterans.

A ritual and badge each of the G. A. R., S. of V., and W. R. C.

A copy of the last issue of each paper published in the county.

Names of the Grand Officers, Department of Indiana.

Names of all union soldiers residing in the county at the present time.

The procession then reformed and marched to the fair grounds, where the following gentlemen were elected to serve as officers for the ensuing year:

Commander, Edmund Engle; Vice-Commanders, C. B. Edwards, White River township; D. M. Thorn, Washington; J. W. Hill, Greensfork; Elza McIntyre, Stoney Creek; J. W. Hunt, Nettle Creek; J. C. DeVoss, Green; William Conklin, Ward. E. Clough, Jackson; R. J. Clark, Wayne; George W. Worl, Monroe; William M. Hites, Franklin.

Winchester was selected as the place and the second Wednesday in August, 1890, as the time for holding the next annual reunion of the Association."

The change in the design and other unlooked for troubles were such that the monument was not completed until April, 1892. The unveiling ceremonies were held Thursday, July 21, 1892, with the following program:

"The Little 44 Battery, Jno. R. Wright, commanding, will fire 44 rounds at sunrise from the mound on the Fair Grounds.

The following account of the unveiling is taken from the Winchester Journal of Wednesday July 27, 1892:

"Last Thursday was a day long to be remembered in the annals of this county. On that day the beautiful monument erected to the memory of the men who went from this county, to battle for the rights of men and to maintain the best government on earth, was unveiled and formally dedicated with impressive ceremonies. The governor of our state and the highest officer of the Grand Army of the Republic and part of his staff, honored the people of this county and the men in whose memory the monument was erected by their presence on that occasion.

The day was a perfect one, the rain of the previous evening having laid the dust and relieved the immense throng of people from all discomfort from that source. All teams and vehicles were excluded from the streets around the square, hitching places having been arranged for elsewhere. This may have worked some trouble in a few cases, but the wisdom of it was generally acknowledged, and all concede that it was the proper thing to do. People began coming in at an early hour and the trains on both railroads were crowded, the Big Four running a special train from each direction to accommodate its patrons. Little Battle 44 had fired the national salute from the mound in the fair ground at an early hour, returning to town in time to open the programme of the day's exercise with an exhibition drill. The boys did well as they always do, and surprised their large audience by their proficiency, and were heartily applauded. After music by the band invocation by Chaplain I. P. Watts and a song by the school children, Newton J. McGuire, Commander Indiana Division, S. of V's., was introduced and delivered a very patriotic and eloquent address. This closed the forenoon exercises.

Gov. Chase arrived from the west soon after noon. He was met by the band and old soldiers and escorted to the Irvin House for dinner. The Governor and the Department Commander and his staff were escorted to the east side of the public square by the G. A. R. where a very large audience was waiting for them, and promptly at 1:30, several martial bands present, furnished some soul-stirring music that reminded the older people in the audience of the war, after which Captain A. O. Marsh called the assemblage to order. Rev. R. D. Spellman, formerly Chaplain of the One Hundred and First Indiana Volunteers, made a very impressive invocation. This was followed by the little girls singing the hymn, 'America', in such an impressive manner they were applauded. Captain Marsh then made a brief and appropriate address in which he gave a short history of the monument and stated the purpose for which it was built. It is representative in every respect. It's stones were laid at Gettysburg and Mission Ridge, in the sacrifice of the blood of so many patriotic men, and they are cemented with the tears of widows and orphans. It stands a memento to the noblest cause that a people ever fought for—of the grandest struggle the world has ever known. In conclusion he introduced Department Commander J. B. Cheadle, and requested him in the name of the loyal people of Randolph county, and of the Grand Army of the Republic of Indiana, to dedicate the monument.

Commander Cheadle was received with applause, and before beginning the formal dedicatory services as laid down in the ritual of the Grand Army, delivered a short but effective address appropriate to the occasion. In behalf of the Grand Army of the Republic of Indiana, he congratulated the patriotic people of Randolph county for erecting a monument which will stand for all time a silent but enduring memento of the most decisive crisis in the history of the world's progress and to the devotion and self-sacrifice upon which rests constitutional and popular government. It tells a story of a people who dropped their vocation of peace, which they loved and subjected themselves to the harsh discipline of the camp and the danger of battle to preserve free government and perpetuate popular institutions. Other ages have built monuments in honor of kings or events of interest to kingly rule, but those like the present are the first to be raised to tell the story of the devotion of a whole people to a government of a people. Mr. Cheadle spoke eloquently of the men for whom this monument stands, and urged upon those present to impress upon the plastic minds of the young the great value of the government and the institutions which were saved with the victory of the union cause. We need to teach a higher Americanism. Let us appreciate the privileges of our government and institutions, to the end that the government of the people, for the people and by the people shall live.

The impressive ceremonies of the dedication then followed, which were performed by the Department Commander with Captain W. D. Stone as Senior Vice Commander; O. R. Weaver, Acting Junior Vice Commander; Rev. John A. Moorman, Department Chaplain, and Adjutant General Irvin Robbins; Colonel M. B. Miller, Officer of the Day; I. N. Stratton, Officer of the Guard; O. M. Mills, Wm. Chapman, Samuel Fox, Isaac Sipe, W. P. Miller, Shed McLain; Geo. F. Addlerman, A. J. Woods, N. McFarland. J. W. Ginger, Stephen D. Warwick and E. W. Bond, Guards. At the conclusion of the ritualistic services, O. M. Mills, representing the infantry; Isaac Sipe, the Cavalry; Samuel D. Fox, the Artillery, and Wm. Chapman, the Navy; took their places on the monument, each at the statuary of that branch of the service he represented. Mrs. Allie Mills took her place at the bronze tablet encircling the monument. At a given signal the flag was raised on the flag staff, at the southwest corner of the monument, the K. of P. band playing the 'Star Spangled Banner' amid enthusiastic cheering. The vast audience had risen to their feet and faced the monument, and when Adjutant General Robbins gave the signal, Mrs. Mills pulled the cord, which unveiled the bronze encircling the monument, and the representatives of the branches of the service, loosened the flags that covered the statutes. The little girls sang 'The Flag of the Free', and thus ended the formal part of the dedication. Captain Marsh then introduced Governor Ira J. Chase. The Governor was given a very enthusiastic welcome. When the applause had subsided the Governor said that, 'Three generations have beheld the dedication services. Thus two generations are educated in regard to the issues and results of the war, and know the story of patriotism and devotion which that epoch called forth. The boys and girls who witness this service will tell it to their children when they are older, and even to their grandchildren, so that four or five generations, at least, will know the story as handed down from parent to child. Therefore, four or five generations, at least, will be inspired by the story of patriotism, and when these have passed away the monument, decade after decade, will mutely point to the page of history which will glow for all time with the patriotism of the men and the sacrifice of the women of the Civil war period. Thus these monuments are better to preserve the government of the people than standing armies. As it is a source of boundless satisfaction to me to know that my ancestors fought for the country in the Revolution and the War of 1812, it will be cause for congratulation to the Sons and Daughters of the Veterans from Randolph county who can point to that monument and say, with elation, 'It was built to commemorate the services of my father'. These monuments teach that it is the greatest thing in the world to be an American—that to have a citizen who served his country in the hour of danger, and in peace, to have been true to the highest interests of the nations, is comparably better than to wear a title which has been inherited and to be a burden to the people. Wars in the old world have made men no better because they have been for conquest, but the greater part of the men who fought for the union are better men, better citizens, now than they would have been without such service, and their example has given a new birth to the love of country. The temperance women have their motto, 'For God, and home, and country,' better for God, country, home for there can be no good happy home in a wretched, turbulent and impoverished country. Thank God, the work of the war of 1861 was so well done that no one here will witness another war in this land. It has taught the lesson of patriotism and the equally important lesson of respect for and obedience to constituted authority, and for the rights of all, white and black." He passed on to pay a tribute to women of war period, and noted the fact that large numbers of women were present on these occasions. 'It is not,' said he, 'too much to say that the spirit of patriotism never dies in the heart of women, as a sentiment. People talk of the fires of liberty on the mountain tops—better burn them in the hearts of the people. I ask one thing of you who are parents and teachers and that is to grind into the very being of your children what the war for the union was fought for; that that monument stands because the men and women of 1861 were true to God, country and duty, and because they were faithful; that starry flag is tossed by the bright sun this afternoon.'

"When the Governor told of the elderly lady who left her home and came twenty miles to see the old flag of the Eighth Indiana, which was carried by her husband, and who died with it in his hands, and how they left her alone with that, there were very few dry eyes in the large audience.

"Captain W. R. Myers was on the programme, but wrote the Committee that he was advised by his physician and dentist not to attempt public speaking yet, and his place was filled by Irvin Robbins, a prominent Democratic soldier, of Indianapolis. Mr. Robbins had a very short notice that he was expected to speak but he gave a very fine address, showing what the Grand Army had done in securing the building of monument, erecting soldier's asylums and homes, and passage of pension laws. The order has kept alive the spirit of patriotism by its meetings and its camp fires, and he appealed to every soldier to join the order."

THE CAMP FIRE.

"The simple announcement that there would be a camp fire held in the evening kept a large part of the audience in town, as the camp fires are justly regarded as the cream of all soldier's reunions and meetings. The Committee was again disappointed by the failure of Judge James B. Black and Hon. Thomas Boyd, who were advertised to be present. Governor Chase, Commander Cheadle and Commander McGuire were prevailed upon to remain and make short speeches.

"The camp fire was opened by music by the band and prayer by Elder I. P. Watts; Governor Chase was introduced and after expressing his regrets at the absence of so many of the expected speakers, delivered a most pleasing address, pleading eloquently for a higher type of Americanism, and drew many lessons from the history of the war that were very interesting. He was followed by Department Commander Cheadle, who like the Governor, was a private soldier, and spoke from that point. He gave a graphic history of the battle of Richmond, which his regiment was engaged in before they had drilled or was instructed in the manual of arms. His story of the young English boy who was killed in the battle and the death of a widowed mother, of a broken heart over that only son, was very affecting, and was only an instance of thousands of the tragic incidents growing out of the war.

"N. J. McGuire followed in behalf of the Son's of Veterans in an eloquent speech, earnestly appealing to all sons of men who fought in the battles and won the victories of the great war to unite in perpetuating the glorious deeds of their fathers and preserving the government and principles for which they fought.

"Chairman Marsh then announced that he had noticed a boy on the streets that was wearing a bronze button and wanted him to explain how he came by it, and called upon J. L. Lafollette to rise and explain. Mr. L. responded and began by saying he was not surprised that Marsh didn't know he was in the army, as he went in the army so late and came out so early that one of his best and most intimate friends and fellow-townsmen, Col. J. W. Headington, didn't know that he had been in the army at all, until he applied for admission to the G. A. R. He made an eloquent speech, telling how the farmers of Jay county used to hitch up to their wagons and bring their soldiers to Winchester, that then being their nearest railroad station, to the trains, on their way to the seat of war. For that reason the people of his county felt a warm interest in the grand monument unveiled today, and more than three hundred of them were present to witness the unveiling, despite the busy time with the farmers.

"Mr. Marsh stated that he had his eyes on a man in the audience who was so lazy that Hood's entire army couldn't make him run at the battle of Franklin. Of course the audience knew by the description that he meant Col. M. B. Miller, and in response to calls that gentleman worked his way to the stand. He said that somebody had to be the laziest man and that it might as well be him as anybody else. He had by steady adherence to his rules acheived the reputation and he wasn't going to injure his reputation by making a speech. The Col. managed to get some fun out of his laziness and created a great deal of merriment, both at Marsh's and his own expense, before closing. But we want to say that the Col. laid everything aside and worked early and late to secure the monument and deserves credit for it.

"We failed to state that Miss Minnie Ryan recited, 'I am the Son of a Veteran' in good style and I. P. Watts sang, 'Marching through Georgia', and both were heartily applauded. This closed the regular programme, and I. P. Watts responded to calls with one of his usual happy talks. Fremont Garrett talked for the Son's of Veterans, Watts sang, 'The Battle Hymn of the Republic', Rev. D. S. Davenport pronounced the benediction and it was nearly half past ten o'clock when the camp fire was extinguished, and yet the large audience seemed loath to disperse."

To every citizen of the county is due a portion of the great credit in the erection of this monument in the memory of Randolph county heroes, but especial mention should be made of the untiring efforts of J. W. Macy and Col. Martin Miller. Mr. Macy engineered the circulation of the petition and it was largely due to his personal influence that the matter was pushed to such a glorious end. This monument stands today one of the finest in the state, an honor to one of the most loyal counties in the state.

CHILDREN BEING LOADED AT McKINLEY, WHITE RIVER TOWNSHIP.

CHAPTER IX.

SCHOOLS.

Just as surely as the night follows the day, schools followed the establishment of a settlement in any part of the county.

The earlier settlers were from Virginia and the Carolinas, where the benefit of school had long since been established. Education was deemed a necessity and even before schools of the crudest kinds were established the children were taught in the cabin home by the father or mother or some traveler. If the home itself did not have any one capable of teaching the children some mother or daughter of the neighborhood more intelligent than the others, would gather about them the few children of the community and teach them the simple arts of spelling, reading and arithmetic. Education did not wait for the school houses any more than did religion wait for the church but its influences were established just the same.

The mother found sufficient time from her numerous cares and duties to spend a short time in the enlightenment of her family. True, she was limited perhaps, to the Bible or some rare book, but this served sufficiently to accomplish the end in view.

As the settlements became more populated schools were established in buildings prepared for them or in some private home.

Before the organization of the state all education was conducted from private resources and indeed, many years after the state had been organized and a school fund amply provided for the receipts were so little that the "subscription schools" were practically the only means of an education.

Often times the teacher knew little or nothing except to "keep school," but this at least served the purpose of an organization. "The first teachers in Indiana were mainly from Ireland, or Scotland with a few from New England and occasionally one from Virginia or Tennessee. The first school houses were log cabins with puncheon floors and seats. Generally one end of the house was taken up by a fireplace, where huge logs furnished warmth and smoke. The windows were small, consisting generally of four or six panes of glass about eight by ten inches in size. In these uncomfortable houses school was taught usually three or four months in the year. Text-books were not to be had and the scholars took to school such books as the family might have brought with them from the older states. The New Testament was the approved book used for teaching reading. The course consisted of reading, writing and arithmetic, with now and then a class in geography and grammar. The teacher was always provided with a good supply of switches, and a heavy ferule or two, with which he pounded learning into the scholars. The teacher was an autocrat, and his word was absolute law, both to parents and children.

All studying in schools was accompanied by loud vocal noises from the scholars, until a school with twenty-five scholars resembled a modern political meeting, more than anything else. This method was deemed the only one by which students could be made to think for themselves. The idea was that studying and thinking amid such confusion and noise best fitted the student for business in after life. This custom prevailed in most of the schools until long after Indiana had become a State in the Union. The method of recitations followed very closely that of studying, and most of the lessons were recited in a monotonous, sing-song tone. One of the main requirements of a teacher was the ability to teach penmanship. In those days penmanship was a very laborious, tedious, and painful exercise. It was really pen-printing. The scholar was compelled to write very slowly and with the greatest precision. Spelling was another of the specialties in those days. Generally the classes stood around the room and "spelled for head." The last afternoon of each week was usually devoted to a spelling-bee. The school would divide and each try to spell the other down. When schools became more numerous, and within easy distance of each other, it was a common thing for one school to challenge another to a spelling match, which would be attended by as many of the adults as could find the leisure. These were great occasions for the adults as well as for the children of the whole country side, and were generally followed by a country dance or some other amusement common in those days." The above is taken from Smith's History of Indiana.

Nor indeed was spelling the only pleasure and lesson taught upon these occasions as many a young man and maiden could testify, the spelling bee was the social part and the "longest way home was the nearest and best."

The masters of these schools ruled them with an iron will. No teacher was considered as fit unless he could give promise of being able to thrash any boy in the school. Eggleston's picture of primitive school life in his "Hoosier School Master" is not very greatly over drawn and many a patron of that time was a firm believer in the pedagogy—"No lickin', no larnin', says I".

Pete Jones' were common throughout the country but were soon put to flight by the Hannah Shockys and Bud Means'.

The school houses were crude affairs, built of poles with greased paper windows on one side, and mammoth fire places filling "rooms one end" puncheon floors, split log seats, which were made by splitting logs and boring holes in it in such a way that wooden legs were put in it, the desk was a crude affair and the only ornament of the room was the bunch of hickories hung above the master's chair.

The main fire place was fed by logs pulled into the house by the bigger boys. The wood to maintain the fire was cut in the nearby forest frequently by the boys themselves during the school period. It is easy to see how those near the fires would roast and the pupils farther away would freeze their toes, but woe unto the boy or girl who allowed such a thing as a frozen toe to interfere with his "books", for the school-master was very willing and seemingly eager for the opportunity to display his ability to "lick".

But good came out of all this, simply being a step in the evolution of the greatest system that has ever been devised.

School had made but little progress when the first constitution of the State was adopted in 1816 and to establish the great system that we now have that instrument contained the following article:

"Knowledge and learning generally diffused through a community, being essential to the preservation of a free government, and spreading the opportunities and advantages of education through the various parts of the country being highly conducive to this end, it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide by law, for the improvement of such lands as are, or hereafter may be granted by the United States, to this State for the use of schools, and to apply any funds which may be raised from such lands or from any other quarter, to the accomplishment of the grand object for which they are or may be intended: but no lands granted for the use of schools or seminaries of learning shall be sold by the authority of the State prior to the year eighteen hundred and twenty; and the moneys which may be raised out of the sale of any such lands, or otherwise obtained for the purposes aforesaid, shall be and remain a fund for the exclusive purposes of promoting the interest of literature and the sciences, and for the support of seminaries and public schools. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly, as soon as circumstances will permit, to provide by law for a general system of education, ascending in a regular gradation from township schools to a State University, wherein a tuition shall be gratis and equally open to all. And for the promotion of such salutary end, the money which shall be paid as an equivalent by persons exempt from military duty, except in times of war, shall be exclusively, and in equal proportion, applied to the support of county seminaries; and all fines assessed for any breach of the penal laws shall be applied to said seminaries in the counties wherein they shall be assessed."

The following is taken from Smith's History of Indiana:

"Notwithstanding this ample provision in the constitution the cause of education advanced very slowly. There were many obstacles in the way. The settlements were small and widely scattered; there were no funds with which to erect school houses, and there was apathy on the part of some, and very decided hostility on the part of others. The cause of education, however, had many staunch friends, and they did not let the matter rest, but kept up the agitation from year to year. The General Assembly of 1816 made provision for the appointment of superintendents of school sections, with power to lease the school lands for any term not to exceed seven years. Each lessee of such lands was required to set out annually twenty-five apple and twenty-five peach trees until one hundred of each had been planted. Between the years 1816 and 1820 several academies, seminaries, and literary societies were incorporated. In 1821 John Badollet, David Hart, William W. Martin, James Welsch, Daniel S. Caswell, Thomas C. Searle and John Todd were appointed by the General Assembly a commission, to draft and report to the next legislature a bill providing for a general system of education; and they were instructed to guard particularly against "any distinction between the rich and poor." The commission set about their work conscientiously, and when it was completed submitted it to Benjamin Parke, who had been at one time a delegate to Congress, and was then the United State Judge for Indiana. The bill so reported was enacted into a law, and became the first general law on the subject of education passed by the Indiana General Assembly. It was passed in 1824, and bore the title: "An Act to incorporate congressional townships and providing for public schools therein."

After providing for the election by the people of each congressional township, of three persons to act as school trustees, to whom the control of the school lands and schools generally was to be given, the law made the following provision for building school houses: "Every able-bodied male person of the age of twenty-one years and upward residing within the bounds of such school district, shall be liable to work one day in each week until such building may be completed, or pay the sum of thirty-seven and one-half cents for every day he may fail to work." The same act described a school house as follows: "In all cases such school house shall be eight feet between the floors, and at least one foot from the surface of the ground to the first floor, and be furnished in a manner calculated to render comfortable the teacher and pupils." The trustees were required to receive lumber, nails, glass, or other necessary materials at the current prices, in lieu of work. No funds were provided for the pay of teachers, so the schools were not free, but they were made open to all, black as well as white. It was not until about 1830 that colored children were excluded from the schools, and then the exclusion arose from a prejudice excited by the slavery agitation. Under the law of 1824 the schools were kept open just as long each year as the patrons could or would pay for their maintenance.

At nearly every succeeding session of the General Assembly some law was enacted on the subject of education, but still no general system was adopted. There was always an opposition that would find some way to get the laws before the courts, and thus hamper the attempts to establish schools. Private citizens did much for the cause, however, and public meetings of citizens did more, but little could be accomplished in a public way. School officers had no fund with which to erect houses, or to pay teachers. They could not levy a tax, except by special permission of the district, and even then the expenditure was limited to $50 by the act of 1834. The friends of public schools worked on and hoped on, striving to overcome every obstacle and put down all opposition. At last their day of triumph came, but even in their triumph they came near being defeated, and their noble efforts were for some years neutralized by the stupidity of a supreme court. The friends of education planned and worked until at last they found a way to provide for one of the most magnificent public school funds in the Union. It has already been noted that the General Government gave to the State the sixteenth section of every township, for school purposes. This was made the beginning of the grand school fund to be built up by the State."

The three "R's", "Readin', 'Ritin', and 'Rithmetic" were the basis of all early schools. It was the privilege of the children to study any or all of these subjects as long as they desired.

Spelling was the fundamental and the first thing taught all children. No child was expected to read until he was able to spell all the words of Dillworth, Webster's, or a little later, McGuffy's. It made no difference whether he knew the meaning of any of the words, or had the remotest idea of their application, he must spell it, any how. Spelling was frequently taught by having the children sing as they spelled and many an old lady today can sing "b-a ba, b-i, bi, b-o, bic a bo". To be a good reader meant that he must be able to pronounce rapidly all the words found in the book being read which was frequently "Life of Washington", "Life of Franklin", the Bible, or any book that could be found in the home.

Poetry was always read in a sing-song tone with special attention paid to the emphasis and inflection at the end of each line, in imitation of the way in which hymns were "lined" by the minister.

Along with the reading went the "speaking a piece" on Friday afternoons, or the last day of school, being a great occasion for each and every district.

Arithmetic was, however, considered the most important of all subjects because of its being regarded as the most practical. The fundamental processes were taught to all children, many, however, never advancing beyond the attainment of being able to add, subtract, multiply and divide. If a pupil shows special inclination towards mathematics he might be able to get to the single rule of three or even so far as the double rule of three, or if he was extremely ambitious he would be shown into the mysteries of "vulgar fractions".

The clap-board and charcoal in time gave way to the slate and pencil, which was considered an enormous improvement. The single slate was later supplanted by the double one, thus enabling the child to "do the sums" and have it protected from erasure. Black-boards were unknown in the early schools. The first of these to be used were made by painting some smooth surface and wall black, later on these were coated with a prepared slating which in a few days' time wore "slick" which made it almost impossible to make a mark or to see it after it was made.

Grammar was introduced into the schools many years after the other subjects. No one was expected to study grammar unless they expected to be a Latin or Greek student. Many of the early pedagogues, however, were from Ireland and Scotland or from the classic halls of some New England college and were Latin and Greek students. If a boy could be induced by these men to study grammar they had high hopes of later making a teacher of him.

History was introduced into the course at a later period than grammar. An old text were simply tables of facts and dealt little or nothing with great National or State movements, which are of course the underlined principals of all history.

Geography had but little attention given to it in the early schools and when it was studied was regarded as being extremely foolish and full of statements wholly out of harmony with the thoughts of the back-woods people of the time.

Barnabus C. Hobbs, a very distinguished educator of Indiana, and one of its State Superintendents of Public Instruction, who was really a great man, in speaking of the early teaching of geography said:

"I can well remember when Morse's geography came into the State. It was about the year 1825, it created a great sensation. It was a period in school history, before this but few had a clear idea of the earth's rotundity, many could not understand the subject well enough to reason upon it and many were emphatic and persisted in repudiating the absurd idea that the world is round and turns over. Debating clubs discussed the subject, and to the opposition it was perfectly clear that if the world turned over we would all fall off, and the water in the ocean would be spilled out. Morse's geography cleared away the fog and when Comstock's Philosophy, with its brief out-lining of astronomy, was introduced the school boy could understand the subject well."

In this early day geography was very much opposed because of the reasons above cited. Men would put a bucket of water on a stump to find the water there the next morning which to them was ample proof that the bucket had not been standing wrong end up over night. They further argued that if the world turned over that we would go so fast that no one could stick to it. As an evidence that we did not turn they would cite the fact that the same side of the tree was always north and never in any other position, more than that, if the earth was round the Mississippi river would have to flow up-hill to empty its water into the Gulf and "any fool knew that water would not run up-hill."

The feeling became so great that in some communities the "heresy" was preached upon from the pulpit, many an early minister taking the view that it was against the teaching of the Bible, for indeed did the Bible not say in Isaiah: "And he shall set an ensign for the nations and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel and gather together the dispersed of Judah from four corners of the earth," in Revelations when John said: "I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth," and how indeed could the earth be round and have four corners? The apple was a physical proof that such teachings were absurd and out of harmony with divine revelations, therefore the earth must be flat.

The last of the common school subjects to be added to the curriculum was physiology. The first science to be developed by man was astronomy and the nearest object he could study in that was the moon, thousands of miles away. Later his attention was given to botany and physics, studies of objects about him. It seems strange that his last subject to be studied and investigated would be the one to him the most important and the greatest of all creations,—himself. The storm of opposition that arose to the study of grammar, history, or geography, was mild, indeed, to the tempest that broke forth when it was suggested that physiology be taught in the schools. It seems almost impossible that people should ever object to this study, but they did. It was thought that physiology should be studied alone by doctors and that the child should know nothing about his "inards." Many people looked upon it as unwise, indiscreet and even immoral to study the composition of one's own temple. But, like all other objection made to modern thought, the objection to the study of the human body had to give way. Later the study of physiology and anatomy gave way largely in the schools to the study of hygiene and sanitation, perhaps of the greatest benefit of any subject now taught in our schools.

As has been before noted, the writing of the early day was a very laborious task. No lead pencils were to be had and the writing must be done with the pen. No teacher could get along without a sharp knife, which, from its size and purpose to which it was put was known as the pen knife, for it was with this knife that the teacher made the pens for the children to use. The child would perhaps pick up a goose quill or turkey feather on the way to school and from it the teacher would form the pen to be used that day. The typical master of that period is always pictured as having the pen stuck behind his ear. The juice of the poke berry served as ink for schools. Commercial ink, of course, could be purchased. Ink purchased at that time was usually of splendid quality, as is shown by the early records. The first record made in this county, in August, 1818, is as clear today as on the day on which it was made (due, of course, to the quality of the ink and the paper).

It has long since been said that "as the teacher so is the school." This saying is largely true, but it is no wonder that the schools of that period were crude if they were to have the same state of culture as the teacher. As we have said before, the teachers were often people who had come west through the spirit of adventure and were, Micauber like, "waiting for something to turn up," and in the meantime teaching school. This naturally brought people of all conditions.

Judge Banta, in his early "Schools of Indiana," printed in the Indianapolis News, in 1892, says: "A few years ago I had occasion to look into the standing and qualifications of the early teachers of my own county, and in looking over my notes I find this statement: All sorts of teachers were employed in Johnson county; there was the 'one-eyed teacher,' the 'one-legged teacher,' the 'lame teacher,' the 'teacher who had fits,' the 'teacher who had been educated for the ministry but, owing to his habits of hard drink, had turned pedagogue,' and the 'teacher who got drunk on Saturday and whipped the entire school on Monday.' "

A paragraph something like this might be truthfully written of every county south of the National road and doubtless every one north of it. The lesson this paragraph teaches is that whenever a man was rendered unfit for making his living any other way he took to teaching.

Owen Davis, of Spencer county, teacher, took to the fiddle. He taught what was known as a "loud school," and while his school roared at the top of their voices, the gentle pedagogue drew forth his fiddle and played "Old Zip Coon," "Devil's Dream" and other inspiring profane airs with all the might and main that was in him.

Thomas Ayres, a Revolutionary veteran, who taught in Switzerland county, regularly took his afternoon nap during school hours while his pupils, says the historian, were supposed to be preparing their lessons, but in reality were amusing themselves by catching flies.

One of Orange county school masters was an old sailor who had wandered out to the Indiana woods, and under his encouragement his pupils spent a large part of their time, it is said, roasting potatoes.

What is true of the school of which Judge Banta speaks was true of all the schools, Randolph county being no exception.

Laughable, indeed, were some of the attempts at school-keeping in those old-time "wood colleges." In many cases, "readin' and spellin' " were the limits of what the school master dared to undertake. And the books and the classes—they were wonderful in their variety. Whatever a pupil brought, that he used; and no high-fangled teacher nor nosing school committee interfered to "shut down" on the pleasure of parents or of pupils; but, as in the days of Israel of old, "every one did that which was right in his own eyes." It might chance, indeed, that a presuming youth, fresh from the schools of "Yankee land," (though such an event was almost never known), would venture, with his armful of books, to enter the school room door, thinking that his "Yankee books" would surely "pass muster out west." But no; the teacher would examine briefly, and bluntly say, "Them ar books ain't no use—take 'em home and keep 'em thar."

One of the prominent men of the county gives an amusing experience in this respect. His parents had just come to the West from "Old Massachusetts." The boy, perhaps ten or twelve years old, marched proudly to the sylvan temple of wisdom with his armful of New England books—Colburn's mental arithmetic and Adams' new arithmetic, those mathematical gems of olden time; Greenleaf's grammar, Goodrich's reader (perhaps), Smith's geography, etc. The teacher, a long, lank, gaunt, ungainly fellow, rapped on the window. The children suddenly ceased playing, and crying, "It's books! it's books!" ran pell-mell into the log school house. School began. The teacher came along, eyeing askance the formidable pile of books; and fingering the one that lay on top—"Old Zerah Colburn," he opened the volume, and, leafing it over a while, broke out, "Boy, take that ar book home and tell your 'pap' to burn it up. The man what made it did not know what he was about and couldn't do the sums." (The work has no answers.) Taking up the grammar, he said, "That seems like it mought be a good enough book, but grammar ain't teached here, and you kin take that home, too." Next came Adams' new arithmetic, at that time one of the best text books on arithmetic in existence. Turning the leaves over one by one, he drawled out, at length, "This is some better, the man knows how to do about half his sums. But, see here; take that ar book home, too, and tell your 'pap' to send Pike's or Talbot's 'rethmetic. Them's the kind we use." And so with the rest. He made a clean sweep of the books, and the poor, crest-fallen boy, chagrined beyond measure that his "Yankee books" had thus summarily passed under utter condemnation, went home at night (or perhaps at noon) and made report to his astonished father of the reception which had been accorded to the books he had so proudly lugged to school in the morning.

We are told of one early teacher in Randolph county whose greatest diversion was in seeing how far from the wall he could stand and spit through a crack in it.

Another, whose farm adjoined the school house, punished the boys (and they did not have to do much to be punished) by sending them into his nearby clearing and compelling them to pile brush.

Of another teacher it is said that he brought yarn to school, out of which, for certain minor offences, he would compel the grown-up girls to knit his socks.

No doubt many of these stories told are exaggerated, but the fact remains that the teachers as well as the schools were very crude affairs, but the old school master with his iron will, his hickory rods and "repressive teaching," soon gave way to the more refined spirit brought about by the introduction of lady teachers in the school, but with all that many a man owed his strength of character to habits formed in those primitive schools. The teacher had to have but little qualifications so far as law was concerned to teach school. If he were able to satisfy the three "good district fathers," whose duty it was to "run the school," that he was able to manage the big boys, he was almost sure of a job. Frequently no examinations were held at all by them, and if any at all were held they were of little, if any, consequence.

In time the state organized the school systems in such a way as to ascertain the qualifications of applicants to teach. The township trustees conducted the examination. Mr. Hobbs, before referred to, tells this amusing experience of his first examination for a teacher's certificate:

"The only question asked me at my first examination was, 'What is the product of 25 cents by 25 cents?' We had then no teachers' institutes, normal schools, nor 'best methods' by which nice matters were determined and precise definitions given. We were not as exact then as people are now. We had only Pike's arithmetic, which gave the sums and the rules. These were considered enough at that day. How could I tell the product of 25 cents by 25 cents, when such a problem could not be found in the book? The examiner thought it was 6¼ cents, but was not sure. I thought just as he did, but this looked too small to both of us. We discussed its merits for an hour or more, when he decided that he was sure I was qualified to teach schools, and a first-class certificate was given me. How others fared, I can not tell. I only know that teachers rarely taught twice in the same place."

Later on the state provided for a county examiner, whose duty it was to ascertain the qualifications of teachers. Frequently they were but little better for this purpose than the trustees had been, for they were appointed by the county commissioners, who had a habit of appointing lawyers, doctors, and more commonly preachers. As to the character of these examinations the following stories will speak for themselves:

When James S. Ferris, who was prominently identified with the early educational interests of Randolph county, came into the state he applied for a position of teacher in Henry county. The county examiner was a "Pennsylvania Dutchman," noted more for his loyalty to Pennsylvania than for his academic training. Mr. Ferris, like all other applicants, knew of this loyalty and immediately proceeded to acquaint himself with the geography and history of Pennsylvania. When he presented himself for the examination the old German seemed to be very happy to meet him, and upon being informed by Mr. Ferris that he desired to take an examination told him he would give him an oral examination. His first question was: "How many counties are there in the great commonwealth of Pennsylvania?" Mr. Ferris was "loaded" and, as luck would have it, knew the number of counties in Pennsylvania and immediately gave the examiner the required number and, to the surprise of Mr. Ferris, the examiner told him, "You need not answer any more questions, for any one that knows that much about the great commonwealth of Pennsylvania can teach school in Henry county." Whereupon, Mr. Ferris was issued a first-class license.

It must be remembered that no time was fixed by law for holding these examinations, but the examiner could hold them at any time and any place, which was usually at his home and at any time an applicant or applicants would present themselves.

Mr. S. M. Cougill, now living in Randolph county, had the following amusing experience on his first examination:

Mr. Cougill lived north of Parker two miles and rode horseback to Winchester for the purpose of taking an examination. When he arrived he went directly to the home of the examiner, J. G. Bryce, commonly called "Daddy" Bryce, for the examination. Mr. Bryce was a minister and was preparing at that time, it being Saturday forenoon, to start on his circuit. Being in a hurry, he told Mr. Cougill to take his horse to the livery stable, get his dinner and return at his earliest convenience, as he desired to start on his trip. Mr. Cougill presumed that the examination would be a very difficult one and that Mr. Bryce would give him a series of questions to answer that would take the remainder of the afternoon. Upon presenting himself, however, he was given the problem known in Stoddard's arithmetic as the fish problem. Mr. Cougill was a student at Liber College, where mental arithmetic was one of the principal things taught, and, like all other young men of the time, knew Stoddard's arithmetic from start to finish. Mr. Bryce offered him paper on which to solve the problem, but Mr. Cougill informed him that he was used to solving problems from memory. This, no doubt, was done because of the fact that the problem and its solution had been committed to memory long before. Mr. Bryce gave the problem and Mr. Cougill of course solved it very readily, whereupon Mr. Bryce commented upon his ability to teach school, and being in a hurry to get on his circuit wrote Mr. Cougill a first-class license for his trouble.

Scores of other such incidents could be told of the early examinations in Randolph county, which was no exception to all the counties of the state at that period.

Concerning these same things, Mr. Tucker, in his history of Randolph county, says:

"Somewhere in this volume may be found a racy sketch of a 'woods school' in Randolph county, taught by no less a personage than Hon. N. Cadwallader, late senator and banker of Union City, Indiana, said school taught by our worthy fellow-citizen in the year of grace 1845, only thirty-five years ago. But the sketch is so rich that it will bear reproducing, and we will tell the story again, partly in his own words:

" 'I taught in an old log building in a clearing. It had once boasted a (clay and puncheon) fire-place and a stick chimney; but the house at that time had neither, for the chimney and fire-place were wholly gone, and the end of the house was all open. The books were anything that the parents happened to have at hand at that time—Bible, Testament, Marion, Washington, Franklin, spelling book, Murray's Sequel, or anything else; and each one used what he brought, be it what it might. School book uniformity was not in vogue then in that institution, but glorious liberty was the order of the day. Of course, classification was out of the question, but each urchin was head (and foot, too,) of his own class.'

"In discipline, Mr. Cadawallader was unique. One day he had four undergoing, all at once, on the puncheons, the solemn penalty of violated law. Two were standing face to face, with a stick split at each end, and one end snapped to each boy's nose. One had been thrown astride of a naked joist-pole overhead, while a fourth was stationed with his hands behind his back and his nose plump up to the wall. Was not all that a sight? The state can never know how great is her loss in not having appointed Mr. C. state school superintendent, for that original bent of genius would have wrought wonders ere this in the line of methods of instruction, of architecture, or discipline, of amusement. At any rate, such was 'school-keeping' thirty-five years ago in our beloved Randolph, full thirty-one years after its first settlement."

COUNTY SEMINARY.

In 1824 a law was passed providing for higher education in each county. This institution of learning was to be known as the county seminary. About fifty counties in the state took advantage of this law and established county seminaries. Randolph was one of these.

These schools were supported by private tuition fees, and the scarcity of money at that time kept many a child from attending who might otherwise have done so.

We have been unable to learn when the county seminary was established in Randolph county, but are sure it was before May, 1827, as on the 8th day of that month we find "Robinson McIntire is reappointed trustee of the county seminary for the county of Randolph for and during the term of three years from and after this date." Evidently the seminary had been formed before that time, but this comes in the period of which the records of the county are lost. We find many items of interest concerning this school. Mr. Tucker, when writing his history of the county, gave the subject no little attention, and has the following to say concerning it:

"At a called meeting of the trustees of the county seminary of Randolph county, on the 7th day of May, 1839, present, Hiram Mendenhall, John J. Peacock and Edmund B. Goodrich:

"Ordered, That Carey S. Goodrich be appointed clerk of the board.

"Ordered, That E. B. Goodrich be appointed treasurer, and that he call on Zachariah Puckett, late trustee of the county seminary, for all books, notes, bonds, papers and moneys in his hands as trustee aforesaid; and that the said Edmund B. Goodrich report to this board at their next meeting.

"The board hath this day conditionally purchased of David Heaston a lot in the town of Winchester for the purpose of erecting a county seminary, the aforesaid purchase subject to the supervision of the county commissioners."

And then the board adjourned until Monday, the 14th inst.

Hiram Mendenhall, Carey S. Goodrich (clerk), John J. Peacock, Edmund B. Goodrich, Seminary Building Trustees.

Board met May 14, 1839.

Considered that the fund at command is not large enough to warrant the erection of a county seminary; therefore,

"Ordered, That the funds be loaned so as to be due May 1, 1840."

Board met February 29, 1840, and voted to commence the erection of a county seminary, and they directed George W. Goodrich to draft a plan for a building, with dimensions as follows:

Size, 35x45 feet; first floor at least three feet from the earth; first story, twelve feet in the clear; second story, ten feet in the clear.

Board met March 13, 1840, and ordered the house to be only one story.

Board met March 18, 1840, and directed advertisements for bids for building the seminary, to be put up at Winchester, Windsor, Spartanburg, Mendenhall's Mill and Deerfield.

House to be finished May 1, 1841, and to be built of brick.

Board met April 10, 1840, and let the erection of the building to George W. Moore for $2,300, that being the lowest bid, and ordered that $20 be paid George W. Goodrich for draft and specifications.

June 1, 1841, board met and voted to borrow from the surplus revenue fund $1,000, under a law then lately passed.

June 10, 1841, board ordered the letting of two jobs: 1. Digging well, erecting pump, building privies and leveling yard. 2. Making and fixing forty-nine desks in the school room. Both jobs were to be done by October 1, 1841.

June 10, 1841, board met, opened bids, and let the jobs as follows: First, to George W. Goodrich, for $170; second job, to Ernest Strome, for $124.

December 18, 1841, board met and accepted, with some slight reservations, the seminary and ordered the contractor to be paid for the same $2,200.

January 1, 1842, board met and adopted rules for the care of the school building and other property and for the behavior of the students.

The rules adopted were quite precise and somewhat strict, e. g.:

Section 1.—Be it ordained that any person or persons who shall break any glass or shall break any locks, hinges, or latches, or break or lose any keys, or any of the sash, cords, or pulleys, or springs, or shall tear any of the curtains of the windows, shall be fined as follows:

For each glass, 50 cents; for each lock broken or key lost, $4; for each latch or hinge broken, 50 cents; for each light or sash broken, 50 cents; for each pulley cord broken or torn loose, 25 cents; for each pulley string broken, 37 cents; for each tearing window curtain, 37 cents; for injuring desk, seats, etc., not above 50 cents for the first offence, to be doubled for any subsequent offence; for scratching the wall, etc., not over $3; for breaking or injuring the gates or fences, not above 50 cents, to be doubled upon repetition; for injuring trees or shrubbery, not above $1, doubled for repetition.

The studies allowed were orthography, reading, writing, arithmetic, English grammar, geography, algebra, geometry, surveying, philosophy chemistry and latin.

March term, 1842, seminary trustees' report to the board of county commissioners as below:

Receipts, $3,145.02; expenditures, $2,857.82; balance on hand, $287.20.

August 30, 1842, board ordered payment to George D. Moore $200, for building of the seminary.

The seminary opened in the spring of 1842, under the charge of Prof. James S. Ferris.

Mr. Ferris was an acceptable teacher, and the school grew and prospered under his instruction. He remained several years, and was succeeded by Rev. Thomas Spencer.

Mr. Spencer continued for several years, and his successor was Prof. E. P. Cole, who retained connection for three or four years. During his administration much was done in procuring library, apparatus, etc., for the use of the school, which, however, was all sold back to him in liquidation of debts due him as principal of the seminary.

The school, on the whole, was flourishing and prosperous, and did excellent service in furnishing the opportunity of higher education to the youth of the county and the region.

The county seminary plan would seem, indeed, to have been a wise provision, and might well have been continued. Under the constitution of 1851, however, the county seminaries were closed, the property sold, and the avails applied to the general school funds.

During their existence very many youths were aided in their efforts after knowledge. Most who have been prominent since that time, who were then in their youth, attended the seminary more or less.

Schools were kept for a while in the building by private enterprise, but it was finally sold by the trustees and employed as a woolen factory by the Carter Brothers, and afterward by another as a wagon shop.

The instructions given in that institution were of a kind of which those who gave them had no need to be ashamed. Modern educators appear to imagine that before them was nothing, and after them shall be—what? And echo answers, What? Yet, it is nevertheless true that the methods practiced and the results obtained by the gentlemen who presided over the labors of that seminary in those early years were good enough even for an age so fastidious and boastful as the present.

One instance must be given to show that the teachers in the Winchester Seminary knew how to perform thorough work, and to make the pupils do the same.

It was the custom in that school—and not by any means a bad one, either—to have classes examined separately, and whenever any class might chance to be ready, and then to call upon a teacher of the region to conduct the examination. An arithmetic class was ready, and a neighboring professor was summoned to the work of finding out how much that particular group of youngsters knew about "figures." The method of examination was this:

The subject of arithmetic, as found in "Rays' Third Part," was divided into topics. Each topic was presented under sub-heads, adapted to bring out fully and clearly its true nature, and the mutual relation of each to all the rest.

Slips of paper were prepared, each containing the matters belonging to a distinct topic. The class was numbered, and the professor, knowing no pupil in the class, assigned to them by number the topics simply by chance. Each pupil took his topic, and, with no opportunity for preparation by text-book or otherwise, going to the board, put the needful work thereupon, and, when his time came, explained, in a clear and connected manner, the whole subject assigned him (or her), since several of the class were females. No questions were asked; none were needed. The examiner merely sat and listened. In fact, the subjects were presented so clearly, so fully, so exhaustively, that, as the professor sat gazing on their work, and hearing their recitations and explanations, the lines of Goldsmith, adapted, might be applied:

> And still he gazed, as still the wonder grew,
> How that bright class had mastered all they knew.

He had witnessed and conducted many examinations before, as he has done many since, and some that were by no means poor nor unworthy; yet he is, in candor, obliged to declare, that, for completeness, for thoroughness, for clearness and uniformity of knowledge, for absence of failure, for lack even of hesitation on the part of the pupils concerned, for excellence in general and in particular, that performance stands unrivaled within his knowledge. Some dozen pupils were in the class, but not a poor one among them all. Half-grown boys and timid girls alike stood the test, and went through their work calmly, smilingly and triumphant. The author would be glad to record the names of the members of that class as a slight token of admiration for their instructor and themselves, as he feels sure that a group, who, in boyhood and youth, could pass so heroically such an examination as that to which they, on that eventful day, submitted themselves, could not fail, in the coming years, to be otherwise than men and women of mark in the life struggle into which they were so soon compelled to plunge. But the examiner knew not then whom he was examining, nor does he to this day. All honor to the faithful, earnest, enthusiastic, laborious, successful instructors of that olden time. By the great teacher it was said, thousands of year ago, "By their fruits ye shall know them," and well and confidently may the educators of "Auld Lang Syne" appeal to the apparent, unquestionable results of their laborious energy in triumphant vindication of their faithfulness, and of their wisdom and their practical skill as well, in the department of instruction."

We have at this time an organization in the city of Winchester known as the "Old Seminary Girls," which organization is inspired by the many happy associations while attending this school. True, they were among the last to attend this famous institution, but, nevertheless, they caught the spirit of higher learning while attending there. No doubt much of the educational interests to be found among the citizenship of Winchester today is due largely to the influence of the old seminary.

The first school or association for school purposes, so far as we know, was formed by some citizens of Winchester and the immediate vicinity, record of which is made in 1827. These gentlemen, whose names were: Thomas Wright, Jr., William Wright, Paul W. Way, Abner Overman, David Heaston, Caleb Odle, Thomas Hanna and Jonathan Hiatt, Jehu Robinson, David Hayworth, Aaron Dolby, John Odle, John B. Wright, Jonathan Hiatt, Sr., Albert Banta, James Davis, Jonathan Edwards, William Edwards, John Wright, Jacob Porson, David Wright entered into the following agreement:

"We, the undersigned, citizens of the State of Indiana, and of Randolph county, being aware of the importance of school education, do mutually covenant and agree to and with each other, to form ourselves into a society, under the name of the Winchester School Association, and to elect out of our body three trustees to manage the business of the society. August 21, 1827."

There was evidently some connection between this school association and that of the county seminary, as Winchester, then a mere village, could not, under any condition, support two schools. Each of these schools were supported by private subscription and by tuition collected from those attending. While we presume the schools were conducted as one school we have been unable to find any authentic relation existing between them.

The county seminary was intended to be and to a great degree became "The College of the Poor Man." It was the intention that one was to be established in each county of the state. This was almost realized, as seventy-three really were established.

No one can estimate the good done by these institutions and no doubt the cause of free education in later years was made possible through their influence.

Indiana did not vote upon free education until 1848, and it is a matter of history that the vote was heaviest for free public schools in the communities where the seminaries were most popular.

Public libraries were maintained in connection with the seminaries, and this, indeed, became the "disseminators of public knowledge." The seminary was democratic in its organization and reached out to every one who had a desire for higher education. Even at that remote period no one could, with truth, claim lack of opportunity for not having an education.

The culture about this institution was high and the scholarship of the professors good; the morality of the student body well cared for and protected by the stability and honesty of those connected with this institution of learning.

They were the direct forerunners of the present high schools of the country and have always been looked upon by all the educators as the real "pioneers of learning."

Prof. Richard Boone, in his history of education in Indiana, pays this high tribute to the old county seminaries:

"After the extremest criticism has been passed upon the deficiencies of the means of general public education during the period, it must be said that more efficient teaching, more generously supported considering their resources, or more generally appreciated, than in the supplementary institutions that made the state honorably famous just prior to and following the middle of the century. On a frontier not yet freed from the swamp and thicket, where there was little wealth and less leisure, in more than a score of towns and country neighborhoods, were well-known and prosperous centers of the severest classical and disciplinary culture. No compromise was made with the practical. Their training was altogether 'liberal' and general. They imitated the older East in the curriculum, and rivaled it in method and efficiency. The really classically educated, both among pupils and teachers, were relatively far more common than now."

In August, 1848, by vote of the people of the state, free public schools were established in the State of Indiana and the seminaries soon gave way to these great institutions. It is interesting to know that in the election where the question to be determined was "shall we maintain free public schools?" Randolph county's vote was in the affirmative. It may seem strange today that the vote was not practically unanimous, but it carried in this county by only about 6 per cent. The heaviest vote for it was in and around the communities whose center was "The Quaker Church."

UNION LITERARY INSTITUTE.

The influence of the Quaker belief and the influence of the Quaker church as exemplified in the lives of its members, was shown in as marked a degree in the early schools as it was in the church.

These great and good people believe in following the dictates of their own conscience and obeying the faithful injunctions made known to them by the "moving of the spirit," not only in private life but in public life as well and in the school as well as the home and the church. All honor must be given to these men and women, simple in faith, who had the courage as well as conviction to do something for their fellowmen.

In the quietude of their home deliberations or the spiritual environment of their week-day meetings came a convicting desire to put into effect what seemed to them to be the Will of God. Under such environment and desire to be of service to a down trodden race a few members belonging to the "New port Meeting" conceived the idea of endowing an institution for the high and noble purpose of carrying knowledge and learning within the reach of those who desire it.

With this end in view, Nathan Thomas, William Clemens, David Wilcuts, Eli Hiatt, Jacob Hackett, Henry H. Way, John Randle, Daniel Hill, Thornton Alexander, Albert Smith, William Davidson, John H. Bond and Charles Clemens were selected by the donors as the board of managers of the new institution of learning to be established in the Edgewater colored community of Randolph county.

At the first meeting, 9th month 4, 1845, of the board, William Clemens was elected president, and Daniel Hill, secretary. The next day they met again and resolved, "That this institution be called the Union Literary Institute."

They immediately proceeded to arrange for what they hoped to be a great school, and appointed "Daniel Hill, John Randle and Thornton Alexander a committee to superintend the building of a hewed log house thirty feet long, twenty feet wide and two stories high" and to "finish it off for the accommodation of a school."

These men were actuated by the highest of motives and sincerity and lost no time or opportunity in the execution of the trust placed upon them.

They immediately appointed a committee to prepare a constitution for the government of the institution. In this they were aided by Mr. James S. Ferris, of Winchester, a man of scholarly attainment. Mr. Ferris was elected to the board of managers in 1845. In April, 1846, they arranged definitely for the organization of the school. "On motion, resolved that we open a manual labor school on the 18th of next month and that Nathan Thomas and Thornton Alexander be permitted to report at this meeting at what age pupils shall be admitted and the length of time they shall be required to labor each day." After retiring a short time the committee reported that students be admitted into the manual labor department at the age of fourteen, be required to labor four hours per day." This is, perhaps, one of the oldest, if not the oldest, vocational schools of the state.

Every effort was made to get a suitable person for principal of the school. It depended largely upon Oberlin College, and in June, 1846, they secured the services of Ebenezer Tucker, a graduate of that institution, "for the term of eight months for the sum of two hundred dollars, the school to commence on the 22d of June." They immediately entered into an agreement with Mr. Tucker to teach the school and agreed to furnish a team to assist in moving him from his residence in Ohio to the institution. Thus it was that Mr. Tucker became an early factor in the education of Randolph county. Mr. Tucker's influence was always for the best and he succeeded in building up an institution that was known far and near, as one of the very best. It attracted attention, not only throughout this county, but as far east as the New England states; in fact, the success of the institution was due more to Mr. Tucker than to any other one man. We shall have more to say of him later on.

"At a general meeting of the contributors to the Union Literary Institute, held in Friends Meeting at Newport, Wayne county, tenth month, first, 1846, a report of the proceedings of the board of managers the past year was read, accompanied by an essay of a constitution for the government of the institution."

The earnestness with which the managers considered their work is shown by the fact that the constitution was discussed all that day, and, desiring to give it due deliberation, "adjourned until early candle lighting tomorrow evening to re-discuss the matter." The meeting assembled according to adjournment and considered and adopted their constitution. Their high ideals and purposes are fittingly set forth in the preamble, which is as follows:

PREAMBLE:

"Whereas, a number of benevolent men and women have given lands and contributed money and goods for the purpose of building up and sustaining a Manual Labor School. Principly for the benefit of that class of the population whom the laws of Indiana at present preclude from all participation in the benefits of our public school system and further for the purpose of placing the blessings of an education in the higher branches of science within the reach of all who have not the means and facilities for the acquisition of scientific knowledge, which are always at the command of the wealthy. Now therefore that the greatest possible good may be derived to those whom the munificence of the donors was designed to reach and bless. To secure and employ for the same benevolent end all gifts, grants, contributions, devises and donations that may hereafter from time to time be made in furtherance of this laudable and christian enterprise. To provide for the due and proper application of the same, according to the true interest and design of the donors. And to define and fix some general principles for the good government and promotion of the best interests of such school and collegiate institution as may grow up on the foundations. We do ordain and establish the following:"

The constitution itself is rather an able document and in many of its articles shows the true motive back of the promoters of the institution. Article 1 affirms the name "Union Literary Institute." Article 6 gives a majority of the board "power to make rules and by-laws for their own government, and that of the school in all matters relating to discipline and manual labor. Fixed rates of labor, board and tuition, to contract for necessary buildings, to employ teachers, tutors and professors, to provide suitable libraries, philosophical and chemical apparatus." Article 8, 9 and 10 are worthy of special interest, as they show the attitude of that institution toward slavery and religion.

"Art. 8th. There never shall be tolerated or allowed in the Union Literary Institution, its government, discipline or privileges any distinction on account of color, rank or wealth.

Art. 9th. In all matters relating to ecclesiastics each person connected with the school, either as teacher or pupil, shall be left to his or her denomination preference: nor shall any teacher be employed or other instrumentalities used, to favor one church organization sect more than another; but the authority of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments and the divinity of the Christian religion shall be maintained inviolate; and no person known to hold contrary opinions shall be admitted to any official station in the Institution.

Art. 10th. The incompatibility of war and slavery with the Christian religion shall be a leading principle in the Institution."

After their constitution was adopted they immediately planned to build a boarding house in connection with the school and appointed a committee, which presented the following plan:

"A frame house with two wings, each fifty feet long, one twenty-six and the other thirty feet long and two stories high."

This building was completed in a short time and was placed under the charge of the superintendent of the school.

Naturally rules were necessary for the control of the students who made their homes in this building. We are informed by Mr. Bass, of that community, that the second story had the sleeping apartments on each side of a long hall which went through the entire building. The girls occupied the rooms on one side of the hall and the boys' rooms on the other side. This made the matter of discipline somewhat of a difficult one and Mr. and Mrs. Tucker, who had charge of this building for a great many years, proved themselves equal to all needs. The "code of by-laws" for the regulation of the school is another evidence that the founders of this institution intended it to be one of worth and force and one which the student body must respect.

The following are some of the rules laid down:

"No student shall absent himself, unless by leave from the principal nor be excused from any lesson or any school exercise except by the principal. No student shall at any time or place use any intoxicating liquor as a beverage. No member of the institution shall play at cards, checkers, chess or any similar game of chance or skill. No student shall burn gun powder in or near any of the institution buildings except by leave of the principal or superintendent. Students are required to be at their rooms by 10 o'clock p. m. and after 9 p. m. to avoid everything which may disturb repose. Students shall not be allowed, upon pain of expulsion, upon any pretense to visit the other sex at their rooms or receive them at their own except by special permission of the principal or the superintendent in cases of serious illness. Every student upon the age of fourteen years shall, unless he be prevented by sickness or shall for other reasonable cause be excused by the superintendent, perform manual labor under the direction of the superintendent four hours per day. Every student shall, unless prevented by ill health or other reasonable cause, rise by 5 o'clock a. m. Study hours shall compromise from five and one-half o'clock a. m. til 12 m. and from 1 p. m. to 5½ p. m. and from seven to nine p. m., allowing one hour for breakfast and provided that requisite time may be taken for manual labor so far as necessary from the above prescribed hour of study. All students of sufficient age and advancement shall engage in study at his room (or other proper place by permission of the principal) during the hour of study hours. The laws of the Christian morality shall be binding on every member of the institution and any breach of them shall be regarded a violation of these laws. No distinction shall be allowed on account of complexion and especially every member of the institution shall carefully avoid unkind, reproachful or approbrious names or languages. Quiet shall be observed on the first day of the week by carefully avoiding any unnecessary noise and no unnecessary labor shall be done by students or others at the boarding establishment. And the students shall (except such as may be regularly excused) assemble twice in the day, morning and evening, in company with the principal or superintendent to read or hear read portions of the scripture. The students shall be required to furnish bed and other necessary accommodations for their rooms; to keep their rooms clean and decent, to mop the floors at least once in three weeks, to take it by turns to keep the hall, alley and stairs clean and to take care that all the rooms be arranged, beds made, floors swept, etc., by the first breakfast bell so that the hall, alley and stairs may be put in proper order before breakfast. Smoking tobacco shall not be allowed in any of the rooms of the institution. The sexes shall refrain from spending time with each other—provided that the public sitting room shall be free for such as choose to occupy it on first day (Sunday) from one to three p. m. and from half past six to half past seven on Thursday evening. Males and females may walk out in company only by permission of the principal or male or female superintendent. Students shall not spend time in the kitchen except when engaged in necessary labor."

The attitude of the institution toward slavery is manifested on all occasions; in 1847, at a meeting in the Friends Meeting House at Newport, "Ebenezer Tucker was invited to address the meeting on the condition of people of color, which he did in an able and interesting manner."

Lewis Coffin, a great leader of the under-ground railway, was at that time made one of the members of the board of managers. Mr. Coffin was instrumental in making the community about this institution one of the leading stations on the under-ground railway.

In 1848 they asked for a charter from the Legislature of the State and were granted it. A mistake was made in the charter by calling the institution "The University Institution" instead of "Union Literary Institute," and the board asked the Legislature to change the name to the correct one and it was done in 1849.

The institution was supported from the income of the land which had been donated and from donations made to solicitors or agents for the institution. The board had its regularly authorized agents, who traveled through the entire United States soliciting aid for the institution. These agents made claim, and truthfully so, that the institution was primarily in the interest of the children of slaves or ex-slaves and was maintained as a philanthropic institution for these people .

Statements as to the financial condition were published annually in such papers as the Pre-territorial Sentinel, Cincinnati Weekly Globe, Rochester, N. Y., North Star and now and then a Boston paper.

The solicitors received ten per cent. of the amount collected for their services. All kinds of donations were acceptable and the records show such donations as "one day's work," "one horse collar," "one steel trap," "five pounds coffee," "6 pounds sugar," "fifty pounds flour," "four bushels wheat," and in fact most any kind of articles that could be used in the institution.

The report of James Moorman, treasurer, May 8th, 1850, shows the receipts from October 5th, 1847, to May 8th, 1850, $375.18; disbursements, $375.22. Receipts, however, sometimes went as high as $600.00 for four or five months. The highest collections were during the year 1850, and to show the scope of territory covered we shall give the report of William Beard, agent:

"To the Board of Managers, U. L. I.:

"I hereby present the following report of my collections and services as General Agent for the U. L. Institute from my appointment as such agent up to the prst. time.

Newport 8 mo. 24th 1850.

The higher ideals of the board and their anticipation of a glorious future for the school is shown in the organization of what they called a "Professorship Fund." By this fund they hoped to have an endowment that would, in the future, support "the principle teacher of the Institute." This movement, however, met with little encouragement as only $250.00 was donated to that fund.

The success of the school was for a long time very marked as many as ninety pupils at one time being in attendance. As we have said before the success of the Institution was largely due to the individuality of Ebenezer Tucker. The school lost in attendance very rapidly upon his removal in 1850 and regained somewhat of its former prestige upon his return in 1873. Prof. Tucker, however, was never able to put the school upon a very solid foundation after his return. The spirit of giving had given way to the spirit of receiving. The old records show the time, money and services were always donated but later records show that the trustees, managers and all others who performed services for the Institution demanded and received pay for the same.

The Institution rapidly deteriorated and it soon became necessary to support the school partially by public funds. Politics entered into the control of the Institution. The Indiana and Ohio members became antagonistic, each trying to gain control of the Institution. The Indiana side finally gained control. The Ohio contingency brought suit to gain control of the Institution. The case was taken to Wayne county for trial which resulted in the Courts assuming control and appointing thirteen Trustees for the management of the Institution. The land had been sold and the proceeds squandered. The Board of Trustees were able to re-purchase a part of the land and the Institution now owns one hundred ninety-three acres.

While they were undergoing this it became necessary to build a new barn, new house, new fences and to do a great deal. This completely exhausted all resources and the township was compelled to assume control of the school. This they did by maintaining a district school in the "seminary building" until 1910. That year the trustee found that they had nothing to maintain the school so the next year, 1911 they had enough money to pay a portion of the expenses. School, however, had in the meantime, been abandoned because only eight colored pupils remained in the district.

At this time, 1914, the trustees of the Institution transport the children of this school to the Spartanburg consolidated school.

What will be done with this one time noble institution is entirely problematic and it can only be hoped that some way can be devised by which the original intent of the founders of this institution will be carried out.

Through the leadership of Prof. Tucker the school did a world of good to many who were entirely worthy of its beneficience. The influence of the Institution has been for the best and will no doubt last for generations to come.

Prof. Tucker in his history of Randolph county has the following to say concerning this school:

UNION LITERARY INSTITUTE.

After some years of pioneer school work, a new aid to education arose in the county in the shape of the Union Literary Institute, near Spartanburg, and literally "in the woods." There was the green stump of a huge oak, four feet through, not ten feet from the schoolroom door; and the immense tree trunk lay there, prostrate, just as it fell, with its huge body for the children to run on, and to play over and across. And the boarding house stood above several green stumps, to make room for the house.

Prof. Tucker, its first principal, and his goods, had been brought from Central Ohio, 160 miles, in big open wagons, by two teamsters from Wayne county, Ind., who went clear through by land to bring the young professor, his wife and their infant child, and his few household goods, all lonely and solitary, into the Indiana woods; and to that hewed-log schoolhouse in the forest, and to the boarding house, made of timbers cut and hewed wholly from the green woods, with home-shaved shingles and studding split, like rails, from a tree, with rafters and sleepers and joists all hewed from logs, made ready with the broad-ax, the Hoosier and the Buckeye lads and lasses began to come; and, as years rolled, they came still more and more, and, during eight years and more, nearly five hundred persons from many counties and several states were at some time members of the institute.

And, as those days come up in memory, and the picture of those old-time scenes is renewed, the question presses, Why did those young men and maidens flock into that boarding house, working for their daily food, and living almost literally on bread and water at that? And the more one thinks, the more the wonder grows. Why did they come? But come they did, and for eight long, but happy and fruitful years, did the work of that school go on, under the shadow of the wilderness, till, from sheer exhaustion, the professor gave up his task, and pushed still farther west upon the untrodden prairie, feeling that not for the best farm in the west would he repeat the labors of those eight years, since he felt literally worn out. And well he might be. For months his days were spent thus: One recitation at home before breakfast; at 7 a. m. algebra and geometry before school; at 8 p. m., school began, and classes recited solid, without intermission, till 12 or 12:30; school 1 p. m., and recitations solid again till 6 p. m., sometimes two at once; and then at home, through the evening, till 9 p. m., classes in his own room, making fully twelve hours of solid teaching every day. This labor went on day after day and night after night for months and months. Not seldom would two classes come forward at once and both would be put through their "paces" at the same time. It was once said of him by a friend that he could hear three classes explain a problem in algebra and read the newspaper all at the same time. This, of course, was a terrible exaggeration, but the labor undergone during some of those years in that forest college was "fearful." These lines are written today not in the least by way of boasting, but simply to give the present generation some faint idea of the way in which were laid, in days gone by, the foundations of knowledge and wisdom in the Randolph woods. But the years fled apace, and the last came, and the farewell word was spoken, and that dear old spot was left to the care of other men; and those pioneer days are gone, and cabins and hewed-log buildings are used as schoolhouses no more. And the teacher of today may be glad that it is so, yet he may beware not to despise those low and humble beginnings, for truly, unless those old things had been in those years long ago when this whole region was a wilderness, the present happy and better times could never have come to pass. The change, indeed, is wondrous; from a rude log cabin, with rough puncheon floor and split-pole seats, with greased-paper cracks for light, puncheon desks against the wall, and huge fire-places, with heaps of wood piled on, sled length, and roaring in full blaze on the hearth, and $7 a month, to the comforts and even luxuries of today, with the princely wages that now prevail. Forty years ago, it was no uncommon thing for a teacher to go to his school-room by sun-up, and to begin to teach, even at that early hour, those who were already in waiting to take up the labors of the day. Eight hours were the regular and expected time, and that whole time had to be spent, and not seldom, ten, and even twelve hours were put in each day in the work of the school-room.

And all this for the mere pittance that now would hardly suffice to pay a boy to watch a gap in the fence!

But the question remains still unanswered—Why did those students in those old times flock to that hewed-log schoolhouse in the Indiana woods?

The answer, however, is easy. A fountain of knowledge had been opened in the wilderness, and these young people were thirsting after wisdom, and they came to slake that burning thirst.

They were determined to rise, and they pressed eagerly forward to sieze the means put into their hands for that purpose.

Ah! to teach in those by-gone times was a pleasure, rather than a burden.

So anxious, so eager, so earnest were they all, that the instructor could wish the day to be forty hours long, that he might have time enough to teach his longing, hungry pupils all they desired to learn.

No urging heedless dunces, no pushing, no forcing, were needed. The eager students, hungry for knowledge, had to be held back, to be restrained, lest they should study themselves to death.

One feature of this institution, unique for those times, was that no distinction was made for race nor color nor sex. Black and red and yellow and white, male and female, have from the very beginning, even to the present hour, been welcomed without distinction to its advantages.

Established by the munificence, chiefly, of some anti-slavery friends, and managed by a board chosen from several religious denominations, and of both colors, race prejudice and class favoritism have been utterly banished from its walls. Even the distinction of sex, on which is founded, throughout the land, so widely varying systems and methods of training, made no difference here. Whatever a boy had to do, that a girl had to do. And the same practice the same instructor has maintained through more than forty years of his life, spent in the business of teaching. His motto was and is, "Give to each and all the best possible chance, and let each make the most and highest that he can."

And times have changed, also, for the "nigger college." In place of the hewed-log house, built among the green stumps, now stands a comfortable, sightly brick edifice, that, for five and twenty years, has opened its doors, with no warmer nor more kindly welcome, indeed, than did its predecessor in previous years, yet gladly and freely, to receive the youth of all colors and conditions, both from near and from far, inviting them, without prejudice and without distinction, to partake, without money and without price, of all the riches of knowledge that it has to offer.

Prof. Tucker left the institution in 1854, returning, however, in 1873 and remaining till 1879. After being under the management of various instructors—Messrs. Parker, Housh, Bagby, Smothers and others—the school was for a time mostly intermitted, and the chief part of the landed estate sold, the proceeds being vested in a fund, the income of which has been and is to be expended in maintaining the school. Some of the land sold has come back into possession of the institution, and they own at the present time forty acres, with the schoolhouse, teacher's dwelling and a farm residence.

The Trustees of the institution originally were Daniel Hill, John H. Bond, John Randle, John Clemens and Nathan Thomas, and besides these William Beard, William Peacock, Richard Robbins, William H. McKown, Reuben Goens, Ebenezer Tucker, Jesse Okey.

The school has a charter from the State of Indiana, vesting the property in five trustees. The constitution of the company provides for a board of thirteen directors, five of who are the five trustees, and eight more are chosen by the donors to the institution, four annually, to hold for two years, and till their successors are elected and qualified."

Into this short article must be read, between the lines, the influence of that truly great man, Ebenezer Tucker, whose modesty prevented him from telling the entire truth.

"Rev. Ebenezer Tucker, Congregationalist, Union City, born in Cherry Valley, N. Y., in 1819, attended common schools and Cherry Valley Academy, 1826-29; Oneida Institute, New York, 1836-40; teaching winters, and manual labor summers; Auburn and Oberlin Theological Seminaries, 1841-44, graduating at Oberlin in 1844; married Lois Patchin, North Gage, Oneida county, New York, September 25, 1844; Fredericktown, Ohio, 1844; pastor Congregational church eighteen months, 1844-46; principal Union Literary Institute, near Spartanburg, Indiana, 1846-55 (school mainly for colored youth, established largely by Anti-slavery Friends); farmer, Nora, Illinois, 1854-59; president Liber College, Jay county, Indiana, 1859-68; principal Union City one year; lamp agency, 1869; New Orleans, professor in Straight University, 1870; Tougaloo University, Mississippi, 1871-72; missionary, Raymond, Mississippi, 1872-73; Union Literary Institute, Spartanburg, Indiana, 1873-79; Union City, 1879. He began teaching April 5, 1835, and taught, in all, a time equal to forty-two years of eight months each. He has been a clergyman since 1844, preaching mostly without compensation, being pastor eighteen months at Fredericktown, Ohio, and nine years at Liber, Indiana. His teaching has been laborious and exhausting, but not without power for good. About four thousand youth have been members of the schools under his charge, and great numbers of young men and women in Ohio, Indiana, Mississippi, Louisiana, New York, etc., ascribe to his counsels and instructions an impulse toward light and knowledge which has urged them onward to grander heights of wisdom and usefulness. He has had six children (four living), as follows:

Granville Clarkson, Caroline Amelia, Julius Edson, Laura Frances, Charles Finney, Philo Andrew. G. Clarkson, farmer, teacher, soldier, miller, died 1882; Caroline A., died, Nora, Illinois, 1858; Julius E., carpenter, miller, cabinet-maker; Laura F., teacher, milliner; Charles F., teacher; Philo A., telegrapher. G. C. married Mary A. Pomroy—Emma Teagle; Julius E., married Sarah Ellen Knight—widower; Charles F. married Cinderella Maria Campbell; Philo A. married Janetta Clapp. Ebenezer Tucker's parents were both of New England descent, his father having been born in Vermont. His maternal grand parents were natives of Connecticut, the grandfather having been a soldier in the Revolutionary War at Stonington, Connecticut, and an early and active pioneer of Cherry Valley, New York. His father's father was born in Marlboro, New Hampshire, about 1740, and his father's mother in Roxbury, near Boston, in 1747, fifteen and eight years before the French and Indian War respectively. His father was one of twins who were the youngest of nineteen children by one marriage, many of whom were born in the state of Vermont. Being married at sixteen, the mother bore nineteen children by one husband, and lived to be ninety-three years old, dying in Cherry Valley, New York, in 1840. They were married at Roxbury, Massachusetts; kept house several years in Keene, New Hampshire; moved into Vermont, hauling their goods with oxen, and the married couple riding on the same horse two hundred miles into the Green Mountain land. In about 1790, they set out for what was then called New Connecticut, and now Western Reserve, in the winter, upon a sled, with two horses, the group consisting of husband and wife and nine children, two being twins a year old. They crossed the Green Mountains; the snow left them, and they left the sled and kept on with the two horses. One horse died, and they still pressed forward with the other. They pawned their things as they went on, the last thing disposed of thus being the woman's shawl, seventeen miles from where they finally stopped. They quit traveling, because—because—well, because they could get no farther, ending their wearisome journey in Montgomery county, New York, removing shortly to Otsego county, New York, about fifty-five miles west of Albany. There they settled, and there they resided till they left the scenes of mortality, the husband in about 1822, and the wife in 1840, at the great age of ninety-three. Poor and destitute, they reached that hard and rugged region, and poor for forty or fifty years longer they continued to be, during their whole sojourn in this sublunary sphere; that poverty and destitution made deeper and more desperate by the sad fact that twice in that country their house was burned to the ground, the last time escaping barely in their night clothes, losing everything in their dwelling. Thus did emigration take place, and thus did emigrants live in those olden times in that Eastern land. Such a group as the one described—man, wife, nine children, one poor, woe-begone horse, wandering, strangers in a strange land—would be a sight to behold! Yet of the great crowd of descendants of these poor emigrants, scattered east and west, Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, the great body have always been, and are to this day, upright, thriving, respectable, industrious, intelligent, and by far the larger portion of the whole number God-fearing people. The tree was good, and the fruit has been good for many generations. God bless and prosper the poor, but hardy and virtuous, emigrant, and let all the people say, Amen! Let no man despise the poor and the lowly, but let all conspire to favor and to encourage the humble and desolate, for out of such shall come, in the following years, through successive ages and generations, those who shall become the strength and substance of the nation, and the pride and glory of the land! The region of New York to which they came is famous in the annals of the Eastern land. Cherry Valley was settled in 1740, one hundred and forty-two years ago, by intelligent and pious people from Scotland. The winter after their establishment of the colony, the snow lay in immense depth for months upon the ground, and they came near starvation. A friendly Indian discovered their condition, and kept them alive by successive trips to the settlements on the Mohawk river, some fifteen miles distant, traveling upon snow-shoes and carrying provisions upon his back for their sustenance, persevering in his friendly work till the return of spring enabled them to obtain their own supply. In the Revolutionary war, the town was burned, and the inhabitants were either killed or carried captive to Canada. One person, who was then an infant in his mother's arms, became afterward the distinguished Judge Alfred E. Campbell, of Cooperstown, New York, who became the author of the work entitled "Annals of Tryone County," embracing the whole of New York west of Albany county, a most valuable and interesting treatise, and crowded with information concerning those olden times. Cherry Valley was burned near the same time with the massacre of Wyoming, in Pennsylvania, both being in the Susquehanna valley, the former town being at the head of Cherry Valley creek, one of the sources of that river, and Cooperstown being the residence of Judge Fennimore Cooper, the famous novelist, who immortalized that whole region by the productions of his vigorous and fertile brain. Some of the families of the original settlers one hundred and forty-two years ago still occupy the homesteads of their ancestors.

The Campbell family in particular still remain where their progenitor established his home in 1740, after crossing the stormy ocean-wave from the rocks and mountains of his native Scotland. One of his sons was a colonel in the Revolutionary army. General Washington, in his Presidential tour through New York and New England, was a guest at the Campbell mansion, and one little boy, a lad of some ten years, who saw President Washington at his father's residence at that early time, lived to be more than ninety years old, and had the honor, in General Grant's administration, to be able to say that he had seen the first president and the last. Wheen President Grant visited Troy, in the state of New York, to attend the funeral ceremonies of General Wool, Mr. Campbell, then above ninety years of age, made a journey from his home to Troy on purpose to have it say that he had seen the first president and the last. He saw and was glad, and in a short time he lay down to take his last earthly sleep, and was gathered to the sepulchers of his fathers. The ancestral graveyard in that village is, indeed, a most interesting spot, containing, as it does, the tombs of several generations. In the fall of 1880, a centennial celebration was held, attended by perhaps twenty thousand people, and addresses were delivered by Governor Horatio Seymour and other distinguished personages of the state and region, commemorating the capture and burning of the town by the Indians under the famous Mohawk chief, Thayandanega, or Brant, and the cruel Tory partisan, Col. Walter Butler, who, in merciless ferocity, exceeded the savages themselves, and who was himself shot and tomahawked on the banks of Oneida creek by an Indian, who cried, in answer to Butler's appeals for mercy as the avenging savage took his scalp, "Remember Sherry Valley! Remember Sherry Valley!" The subject of this sketch was an early Abolitionist, joining that much abused and maligned group of men and women in his early youth, in 1835. He attended the Oneida Institute at Whitesboro (near Utica, New York), the first collegiate school in the United States which opened its doors to colored youth. While there and at Oberlin, he became acquainted with many of the young men of color who have since became famous in the country. Among them were Messrs. Freeman, Sidney, Loguen, Whitehorne, Day, Garnett, Crunmell, Rogers, Vashon, Allen and others not now recollected. He graduated with the class of 1840 a member of which class was Rev. Highland Garnett, then and ever since—till his death in Liberia, in 1882, whither he had gone by presidential appointment as consul to that African commonwealth—an energetic, talented, influential and greatly successful clergyman, being, from his youth, remarkable for his oratorical ability. It is an interesting fact that Mr.

Garnett was the first colored person who was permitted to speak in the United States Hall of Representatives, which he did, to a crowded assembly, on the 12th of February, 1865. He was pastor of a church in Washington City at the time, and their choir also officiated upon the occasion. The spacious hall was crammed, both upon the floor and in the galleries, and the vast audience hung spell-bound upon his lips. One who heard the memorable discourse concludes an account of the remarkable scene as follows: "It is needless to say more. Men who went to the house to hear a colored man, came away having heard a man in the highest and fullest sense. Many who went there with feelings simply of curiosity came away wrapped in astonishment. Not only a man, but a great representative man, had spoken, and they were amazed. In fact, Mr. Garnett was the finest colored orator in the land—far superior, not, indeed, in reasoning power, yet, in dignity and impressiveness of personal presence, in the graces of finished oratory, and in the grandeur of natural and cultured eloquence, to the far-famed Fred Douglas, for so many years a prominent personage before the American public." As stated, Ebenezer Tucker graduated in 1840 from Oneida Institute, the class numbering eleven, most of whom are still living, after a lapse of forty-two years, but not one of whom he has ever seen in the flesh since the morning after the commencement, when that band of earnest young men took the parting hand and separated to their life-work for Christ and for the welfare of the human race. His business has been chiefly teaching, and, during the larger portion of the more than forty years spent in that employment, his work has been in institutions fully and warmly open to the youth who have been guilty of the heinous crime of possessing a "skin not colored like our own;" fifteen years Principal at Union Literary Institute; nine years President of Liber College; and nearly four years in Straight University, New Orleans, and at Tougaloo University, Mississippi, bringing him thus in connection with some thousands of young persons of color, many of whom have since become prominent among their people and before the country. And, though still poor in purse, he feels rich in the reward of the esteem and affection of his pupils now of the olden time, and the conviction that his hands have been enabled to scatter seed upon the furrows of the great world-field, which is even now yielding, and shall, in the growing future, continue still more largely to yield an abundant harvest for the garner of eternal life."

The above article was written by a close friend of Mr. Tucker and appears in his history of Randolph county.

Upon the death of Mr. Tucker, April 11, 1885, Mr. I. P. Watts, a very intimate friend of Mr. Tucker, wrote the following concerning him, which no doubt reflects the universal opinion of all who came in contact with him:

"From 1844 to the day of his death, he was a minister of the gospel, preaching most of that time for very little compensation. He was a man of great will power and untiring energy and perseverance; a man of strong convictions, and radical on all reform questions; a man who never councilled expediency or trimmed his sails to catch the popular breezes.

"He has inherited a strong and vigorious constitution from his hardy ancestors, and was temperate in all things (except mental labor).

"He never acquired much property, and was poor in this worlds goods, but he was rich in having a contented disposition which made his life full of sunshine to those who surrounded him. The best days of his life were given to the education and elevation of the then despised and downtrodden black man. From boyhood he had been an earnest advocate of the equal rights and equality of all men before the law, and for this cause he went to Mississippi after the war, and right in the hotbed of secession, he bore the persecution and sneers of his own race, simply that he might aid the freedmen in acquiring knowledge, and no question of dollars and cents ever drove him from this, his chosen path of duty.

"He was of that type of man who honored God by serving men who are the salt of the earth, and one of the pillars that supports the cause of truth and justice.

"Socially he had few equals. His long life of studious habits had filled his mind with a wonderful fund of general knowledge on all subjects, and he was a most interesting conversationalist to those who sought his company. Especially to the young he was like a new book, full of light and knowledge, mingled often with wit and humor.

"For his old students, many of whom are now the heads of families in this and adjoining counties, he always cherished the warmest feelings of love and friendship, and to many of them he seemed more a father than friend. With him he said the "old friends were the best friends, and the old days were the best days," and in his later years he loved to talk of the days of toil that had passed. His life was a labor of love, and few men have done more for the cause of humanity, for so little pay, as Mr. Tucker. But he has the reward of all good workers in the fact that in the hearts of those who knew him best, the memory of his bright example will leave a halo of blessed light so long as memory lasts.

"The brightest tribute to his memory which loving friends can give, is the testimony of his christian character. He was emphatically a man of faith and a man of God.

"While, to some, he appeared to be gruff and austere in his manners, yet a kinder, more tender and loving-hearted man never lived. "He loved righteousness, and he hated iniquity," but he had that charity which is first pure, then peaceable and easy to be entreated. He was a pure man in his thoughts and in his conversation. No one ever heard him utter a vulgar or profane word, or indulge in idle talk or foolish jesting. In this respect his life is a blessed example to all who would live Godly in this present evil world.

"He was a man of prayer, and such pathos and eloquence in simple prayer as he possessed is seldom the gift of mortals. There were no vain repetitions, no stereotyped phrases, no set forms, but his whole soul was full of fervent sweet prayers, ready to gush forth at all times in loving tenderness and supplication, and his words fell like a heavenly benediction on the heads of those who heard.

"As a minister of the gospel, his prepared sermons were models of eloquence logic and gospel combined. His power to touch the heart was most felt when he spoke extemporaneously, which he often did with great effect for good. He was a man who lived out his religion in his daily life. He literally walked humbly, he dealt justly and loved mercy, and his life was devoted to the interest of the poor, for he had walked in the same pathway from boyhood.

"He never was rocked in the cradle of luxury or sought for the easy places. He was literally a son of toil, but he was 'strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might.' 'He fought the good fight; he kept the faith and henceforth there is laid up for him a crown of righteousness which the Righteous Judge shall give.'

"He died as he had lived at peace with God and men. He rests his labors and works to follow. Let us thank God, who hath given him victory our Lord, Jesus Christ. I. P. WATTS."

Mr. Tucker was buried in the cemetery at Union City but upon the death of his wife in 1901 was taken to Fountain City where his body now rests.

RIDGEVILLE COLLEGE.

Another institution of great importance which the county has had was the Ridgeville College. This institution was located at Ridgeville and for many years gave promise of becoming one of the principle institutions of the state.

In their catalogue of 1896-1897 we find the following history:

"About the year 1867, Rev. John Collier and other Free-Will Baptist ministers, together with a few enterprising citizens of Ridgeville, conceived the idea of founding a college, to be under the control of the Free-Will Baptist denomination. The erection of the large building now in use was commenced soon after, but was only recently completed.

The hope of the founders of the school was that the denomination would recognize the institution by act of their General Conference, and properly equip and endow it. In these things they were sorely disappointed from the fact that the denomination already had more schools than they could furnish with the means necessary for aggressive work. From the first the college was crippled and weak from the lack of funds, and, in spite of the heroic efforts of Presidents Collier and Bates, the actual endowment never reached $20,000. While the attendance at times was encouraging, the fact became more and more apparent that the Institution must cease to exist, or pass into other hands.

In August, 1891, a correspondence was opened between the Prudential committee and Rev. E. D. Curtis, D. D., Superintendent of the Congregational Home Missions in Indiana. The object in view was the transfer of the college to the above named body. At the request of Superintendent Curtis, Rev. C. A. Gleason, of Angola, Indiana, visited Ridgeville and held a conference with the college authorities, the result of which was a call for a joint meeting of the trustees of the school and representatives of the Congregational churches, to be held at Ridgeville, September 13 and 14, 1891.

After a careful study of the situation, a second meeting was arranged for, and held on November 3rd and 4th. The trustees and delegates of the Salem Free-Will Baptist Quarterly meeting voted in favor of the transfer, and in this were enthusiastically supported by the citizens of the town and vicinity. From the first, the secretaries of the Congregational Education Society, Rev. J. A. Hamilton, D. D., and Rev. T. Y. Gardner, heartily favored the enterprise and pledged the sympathy and aid of their society.

The third and final meeting was held in the college building, January 19 and 20, 1892, when the entire property, valued at $40,000 was transferred to the Congregational churches of Indiana. A new board of trustees was elected, with Rev. E. D. Curtis, D. D., President and Rev. C. A. Gleason, Secretary.

That the Congregational churches of Indiana are in sympathy with the college may be readily inferred from the following resolutions passed by the General Assembly at Marion in May, 1895.

"Resolved, That the relation of this school to this association requires thorough work and exercising the highest moral and Christian influence, and therefore worthy of our hearty co-operation.

"Resolved, That the relation of this school to this association requires of us that we all, so far as we can, exercise our influence in encouraging young people to attend the college, and to help it in all other reasonable ways.

"F. E. KNOPF,
"J. H. CRUM,
"W. A. BELL, Committee."

Thus we see the college passing from its originators to that of new hands. This was, in a way, best for the Institution, yet it must have been disappointing to the originators, principally to that of its first president, John Collier. Mr. Collier was one of those self-sacrificing men who labored for the benefits of his fellow men. It is said during the years of his presidency of this college that he thought not of himself but of others, wholly. It is even said by those who knew him, that he literally starved himself in order that the Institution might live and grow. Such spirit of sacrifice and devotion can only exist in the heart of a man who feels the burden of his fellow men.

It is pathetic that the efforts of this great man were seemingly lost in the death of the Institution.

The first catalogue of the Institution was issued for the year 1871-1782. At this time Prof. S. D. Bates became president; I. D. Atkinson, assistant; William Reed, professor mathematics; Mrs. I. D. Atkinson and Warren S. Montgomery composing the faculty. Elisha B. Wood was the graduate of that year. Benjamin E. Boyer, a senior; Marcus Bosworth and Tillman A. Howell sophomores; the freshman class was composed of Benjamin F. Boltz, Benton Webb, Henry Kitselman, William A. Long and Russell W. Vaughn. The "Ladies Course" had as its students Ruth Bosworth, Jennie Higgins and Ida Marot. The "Practical Course" enumerated as its students James J. Eagy, David Odle, Asa Orcutt and Eli Wickersham. The Trustees at that time were H. B. Vaughn, Lagrange; Arthur McKew, Edbert Payne and William J. Shoemaker, of Ridgeville; E. C. Clough, Jordon; David Pollt, Union City, and Stephen Straley, Westchester. That year they enumerated one hundred thirty students. The following year one hundred seventy were enumerated.

In 1875 Prof. John M. Davis, now president of Rio Grande College, Yellow Springs, Ohio, became a member of the faculty.

Elias Boltz became professor of mathematics in 1878. President Bates was succeeded in 1886 by E. O. Dickerson, A. M. B. D. In 1890 the college was reorganized under the name of "Ridgeville College and Indiana Normal." Prof. Dickerson remained as its president and J. E. Souers became principal of the normal school, with P. S. Tracy an assistant.

This year the school became somewhat pretentious in the number of courses offered, as their catalogue of that year advertised a College of Music, College of Oratory, College of Business, College of Shorthand, College of Typewriting, College of Pen Art and a College of Telegraphy.

In 1892, as we have seen in the above history, the school was put under the control of the Congregationalists of Indiana, with Edward D. Curtis as president of the board. Charles A. Gleason, secretary, William Charles Kruse, A. M., became the acting president. Mr. Kruse remained as president until 1896, when he was succeeded by Prof. George Hindley, B. D. Prof. Hindley was a very strong man, but the lack of financial support and the limited number of Congregationalists from which to draw as a church school, and the growth of other educational institutions about it made it impossible for him to build up the college. He was succeeded in 1899 by H. C. Garvin, P. H. D., of the University of Munich. Mr. Garvin battled against fate for two years, when he married Miss Westrader, a member of the faculty, and left the Institution May 30, 1901. Mr. Garvin was a strong professor and a profound student, but was unable to make any headway whatever with the institution. He was a man of unusual training, but cared little for any other subject than his chosen subject of philosophy. It is said he cared so little for his diplomas of various colleges that he bound books with them.

It is an unfortunate thing for the county that an institution like Ridgeville College must not be maintained. The influence of such a school was broad and many of our best citizens found their inspirations for higher ideals and training within the halls of that institution. The school, as such, has been lost, but the school as an influential factor of society will live in generations to come.

These are the only educational institutions other than the common and high schools that have ever gained any footing in this county.

THE LINCOLN, WHITE RIVER TOWNSHIP.

NORMAL SCHOOLS.

A few years ago it was the custom to have summer school or local normal school for students preparing themselves to teach or for the teachers wishing further help in their work. It was the custom for the county superintendent, together with one or two helpers, to conduct such a summer school or normal school during the summer. Mr. Dan Lesley was one of the first to undertake this movement, conducting a six-weeks' term at Winchester. The next year the school was conducted at Union City and the following year two schools of a like nature were held in Union City, one in Indiana and one in Ohio. Since that time schools were held in Winchester almost each year until 1896. Many teachers attended these schools simply to be able to pass an examination. The county superintendent was at the head of the school and it was the custom at the close of the term to hold an especial examination for teachers' license. It is easy to see why they attended. This privilege became so badly abused over the entire state that the Legislature passed a law making it impossible for a county superintendent to have anything whatever to do with summer normals. This sounded the death knell of the institution.

Some of the teachers who have taken part as instructors in the summer schools of Winchester are Messrs. Butler, Ault, Wood, Caldwell, Bowers and Baker, superintendent of the Winchester school, Driver, of the Winchester High School, Bosworth, and Branson, of Farmland, Lesley, Denney and Paris, county superintendents, and many others who were teachers in these schools.

Much good was no doubt accomplished in this school, but it was supplanted by the larger and better institutions all over the state.

Another factor that has entered into the schools of the state is the Township Institute. These institutes were originally voluntary associations on the part of the teachers, whereby they would come together and discuss questions of professional interests to them and their schools. It is said that Prof. E. P Cole was an enthusiastic supporter of this movement and many such meetings were held by him and his teachers. The movement grew throughout the entire state until eventually the teachers were paid for attending the institute, the Legislature feeling that the public would be sufficiently benefited to justify the expense.

In 1865 a larger institute, the County Institute, was organized by the Legislature of the state. The first of these institutes was held by Pleasant Hiatt, then county examiner of this county. These institutes have continued and grown in influence and importance until now they are looked forward to as the educational institute of the county.

The Randolph County Teachers' Association and voluntary association of teachers held upon Friday and Saturday following each Thanksgiving, was organized in 1897 by the teachers of the county. This association has been held each succeeding year and is attended by every teacher of the county, each teacher being allowed pay for attending this association.

The most modern and progressive movement that has been instituted in the schools of Indiana has been that of the consolidated schools. It has long since been observed by all those who have given the question study, that the child in the small district school does not have the advantage that it has the right to demand of the state. The small number of pupils in the school does not afford the social intercourse demanded by every child and through which culture is largely attained. The few pupils found in each class removes the element of contest which is the inspirator and invigorator of every child. Then, it is impossible to have teachers of special ability in special subjects, such as music, drawing, manual training, cooking, sewing, which today is regarded as very essential to the life of every child.

As to the consolidation of schools in this county the following article appeared in the report of the state superintendent of public instruction, 1911-1912:

CONSOLIDATION OF SCHOOLS IN RANDOLPH COUNTY—BY SUPT. L. L. DRIVER.

It is not the intention in this article to discuss the question of the superiority of consolidated schools over the district school, as that question has been settled by comparison in scores of consolidated schools all over the state. We wish to show, especially, the influence of these schools in the enrollment and attendance of the eighth year graduates. Randolph county, like all others of the state, for years depended solely upon its district schools, and we should not in any degree minimize the great work of these schools, for through them alone is the present high efficiency made possible.

Consolidation first began in this county by the school building at Losantville, in Nettle Creek township, having been condemned by the state board of health. The school authorities thought it wise to transport two small district schools to this place. Although this brought about a storm of opposition, the experiment was tried and has proved a great success. The building was built in 1905 and is of concrete, costing $14,000, and has since been equipped at a cost of about $300, not including desks, globes, maps and library. For the first time in the history of the county schools the flush system of closets was installed in a township building. A high school was established with a three years' course of six months each. This has been increased to a four years' course of seven months and is now a certified school. From the very first this school has been a success, which is shown by the fact that 94 per cent. of the eighth year graduates have entered high schools.

The school corporation of Lynn was laid down and the township took charge of its school and built a six-room building at a cost of about $24,000. At the dedication of this building Doctor Hurty, in making an address, spoke of the "large and commodious building, sanitary in every part, large enough to meet the needs of the community for years." The people of the community, realizing the advantages of such a school, abandoned two of the district schools and it became the duty of the same Doctor Hurty to condemn the building because of its lack of room in 1909. A four-room addition was built to meet the growing needs of this school, but again we find an insufficiency of room, as the building is now crowded in every part. Laboratories for physics, botany, agriculture, manual training, sewing and cooking are installed and efficient work is being done in all of them. From a school requiring six teachers and having a high school course of three years it has grown to a school requiring thirteen teachers and is commissioned. The enrollment of eighth year graduates has increased from 80 per cent. to 97 per cent.

In 1912 five districts in the north part of this same township petitioned the trustees to abandon the district schools and consolidate them. To this end a $15,000 five-room building was erected in 1912. This school, "Beech Grove," is accredited.

In 1908 a four-room dilapidated, unsanitary fire-trap of a school house in Greensfork township gave way to a modern eight-room building. This building is not only sanitary and modern in every particular, but is an architectural beauty. It is situated in a maple grove near the center of the township and accommodates the pupils from six districts.

The high school maintained here has grown from a three years' course of six months to a four years' course of eight months and was commissioned in 1911. The per cent. of attendance of the eighth year graduates has increased from 80 per cent. to 97 per cent. since the erection of this building.

In 1908 the trustee of White River township found himself facing the problem of several small schools and poor buildings in the western part of his township. It was deemed advisable to build a consolidated school. To this end a four-room building was erected at a cost of $14,000. Many people looked upon it as a foolish undertaking, as it is situated entirely remote from any town or village. In fact, at the dedication of this building, known as the "Lincoln," prophets were heard to say that the time would never come when the building would be half filled. This school began with an enrollment of forty-three. Its advantages were soon seen by the people of the surrounding districts and the following year three heavily populated districts petitioned to be abandoned and transported to this school. Many others from surrounding districts also seeing its advantages transported their children, at their own expense. This reduced the attendance in other schools until three went down for lack of attendance. The high school was established in 1910 and was commissioned in 1913. The experiment was so successful and the attendance so large that the building soon became inadequate. As some of the high school children were transported from the east end of the township it was thought that the situation might be relieved by building another large building in the eastern part of the township. This was done in 1911. but so great was the demand and need of more room in the "Lincoln," 97 patrons out of 101 petitioned the trustee and advisory board to double the capacity of the school building. This was done in the summer of 1912 and instead of a failure, as was predicted by some, we find it an eight-room building equipped for botany, agriculture, manual training, sewing and cooking, attended by 237 pupils.

The other building referred to in the above paragraph is known as the "McKinley" and is situated one mile east of Winchester. It is a seven-room building, costing $28,000, modern in every particular and fully equipped for all the needs of a modern school. Seven schools are transported to this building. The enrollment for the current year is 176. The high school maintained here is commissioned.

For five years previous to the establishment of the township high schools in this township the enrollment of eighth year graduates had been 53 per cent. Since these high schools have been started, 93 per cent. of the eighth year graduates are enrolled in high school.

In 1909 Parker abandoned its school corporation and its management was assumed by Monroe township. A new building was necessary. Four acres of ground near town were purchased by the trustee and a building costing $34,500 was erected. This is also equipped and maintains a commissioned school having twelve teachers. The children in the western half of the township are transported by wagons and interurban to this school. This building is equipped for manual training, sewing, cooking, botany, agriculture and physics. There yet remain four district schools. The per cent. of attendance of eighth year graduates has increased from 67 per cent. to 90.

The banner year for school house construction was 1910, as three townships erected buildings that year.

Green township erected a six-room $19,000 building upon a three-acre school lot in the center of the township. This is the first township in the county to have complete consolidation as all of the eight schools are now abandoned and transported to the central school. For five years previous to the establishment of this school but 21 per cent. of its eighth year graduates enrolled in high school. This low per cent. is perhaps due to the fact that no high schools were near this township. The growth of this school has been remarkable, and a four years' commissioned high school is maintained. The per cent. of attendance of the eighth year graduates has increased from 21 to 92 per cent., every member of the class of 1911 enrolled. This school is commissioned.

Jackson township is another that built in the year 1910. Its building was erected in the center of the township and, like the others, is modern in every particular. It has five rooms and was built at a cost of $18,000. Two rooms were occupied the first year, but this year, 1912, finds every nook and corner filled. Every indication points to the building of an addition in the very near future. Five schools are centralized at this place, and the enrollment of eighth year graduates has increased from 31 to 95 per cent. In 1913-1914 the Jackson was commissioned and was the fourth largest high school in the county.

Ward township had a high school at Saratoga previous to the year 1910, but Saratoga is in the extreme corner of the township, which made the high school inaccessible to most of the children of the township. Two schools abandoned for lack of attendance, together with three abandoned by petition were centralized in the "Jefferson," near Deerfield, in the western part of the township. This building has four school rooms and two recitation rooms and was built at a cost of $17,000. The high school is now certified and is growing very rapidly. The attendance of eighth year graduates in the territory covered by this school has increased from 31 per cent. to 92 per cent. It is only a question of a short time until this building must be increased.

In the spring of 1911 the board of health condemned the joint school building between Nettle Creek and West River townships at Modoc, and the trustees of these townships built a five-room building at a cost of $18,000. During the summer three district schools petitioned to be abandoned and consolidated with the school at Modoc. The high school, which had been a two years' course of seven months, was put upon a commissioned basis immediately, and has grown from an attendance of 15 to 40. The school is now certified, and the per cent. of enrollment of eighth year graduates in the territory covered by this school has increased from 68 per cent. to 96. It is now equipped for botany, agriculture, manual training, sewing and cooking.

At the same time in which the Modoc school building was condemned another building in West River township at Huntsville was also condemned, but the board of health realizing that a township would be burdened by building two buildings during the same year extended the time for condemnation to 1912. In the summer of 1912 a four-room building was erected at Huntsville at a cost of $15,000. This school, like the one at Modoc, has been increased from a two years' course of seven months and placed upon a commissioned basis. Three abandoned schools are transported to this school, leaving only two district schools in the township. The eighth year enrollment has increased from 68 per cent. to 92 per cent.

In the spring of 1912 four districts in the central part of Wayne township petitioned to be abandoned and consolidated in a central school. To this end five acres of ground were purchased and a contract let for a seven-room building at a cost of $23,000. The Wayne is the only school to have a residence for the use of the school. The high school is upon a commissioned basis and gives every evidence of being as successful as the others of the county. But 44 per cent. of the eighth year graduates for the past five years have entered high school.

In mentioning the number of rooms in each of the buildings named above we have made no attempt to enumerate such rooms as might be termed recitation, library, laboratory, rest or playroom. Each building has from two to six of such rooms which are as valuable in their place as the rooms mentioned in the description.

These buildings have been built according to the rules and regulations of the state board of health, as to lighting, heating and ventilating. The heating is by furnace and steam, the ventilation being by fans. Automatic regulation is installed in most of these buildings, thus insuring a constant temperature. The flush system of toilets is made possible by cess-pools which are easily drained and which have proved very satisfactory.

The cost given is in most cases the contract price and does not include any improvements or equipment.

In some cases the old school buildings are used for barns and in others new barns are built. These are used for the horses of the hack drivers and of children who furnish their own transportation.

These barns are constructed so that by removing a temporary stall the school hacks may be stored during the summer.

The greatest problem in consolidated schools is the transportation of the children. This can be best done only by the best men as drivers with the best teams to be had, and these attached to the best hacks possible. Too great care cannot be taken to insure the best service in this line. The hack routes must be as short as possible so that children may be in the wagons for a minimum period only. The hacks should be commodious, warm and well ventilated. To this end the trustees of this county are purchasing only hacks that have glass sides and ventilators. They should be heated by coal stoves and thus eliminate any fumes.

The glass sides give good opportunity for ventilators and insure plenty of light, both of which are not only essential to good health but are conducive of good deportment. Hack drivers who formerly drove the hacks with curtained sides report that the discipline in the modern hacks is much better. This is due largely to the fact that the hacks have plenty of light and that the children can see over the country as they pass along. This is also an insurance against accidents while crossing railroads.

The hacks used here have double floors, which also adds much to the comfort of the children.

Good roads are also a necessity to successful transportation. Since these hacks have to go over the roads at all times of the winter they are equipped with wheels having two and a quarter inch tires to prevent any unnecessary wear upon the road. Hack routes, like mail routes, bring about good roads, as the best service is only possible under the most favorable conditions.

Only men of the highest moral worth should be employed as drivers. As much care should be exercised in the selection of a hack driver who has charge of the children to and from school as in the teacher who has charge of them while in school. The best of men can only be secured when the position pays the price demanded by a first-class man. Bids for driving a hack should never be taken by a trustee, as this brings about unsatisfactory complications.

The rules and regulations of the hack service should be a part of the contract into which the hack driver enters and in which he gives bond for the successful performance of the work. The contract here shown is the one used in this county and attempts to reach and overcome some of the difficulties encountered in the past.

Each hack driver is required to make a daily report to the principal of the school. This not only secures his co-operation but the children in this way learn of their responsibility to the driver. A report is also required of each driver to the county superintendent so that official may be made acquainted with prevailing conditions.

These buildings are constructed for a broader purpose than merely school buildings. Many of them have become the centers of community interests because of their facilities for the accommodation of public gatherings. Many of the townships have no other public buildings of sufficient size to accommodate general meetings of the community. Without exception these buildings have auditoriums which are made by combining two to four rooms, and sometimes the corridor. Folding doors of unusual height are used for this purpose. These auditoriums vary in size, depending on the size of the building, but in most instances will seat from 300 to 400 people. These facilities have brought about many entertainments such as are given in lecture courses of high quality. Commencements, township institutes, both teachers' and farmers', political meetings, Sunday school conventions, farmers' organizations, parents' and teachers' meetings—in fact, all meetings found in any high grade community are being held in these buildings. This has brought about a closer relation between patrons, children and the schools, and this alone is well worth the extra cost of any auditorium.

These schools have brought about a higher appreciation of school work in advance of the eighth grade. Families are now represented in the high schools of the townships which were never represented before. Children no longer are discussing the question of stopping at the eighth grade, because they have in their own midst an institution of higher learning. We know of no more convincing proof of the above influences than a reference to the statistical report of this county. In 1908-1909, the year before these schools were started outside the towns, this county had 371 eighth grade pupils enrolled, 191 high school pupils. In 1911-1912, by a strange coincidence, the report shows the same number of eighth grade pupils, but the enrollment in the high school has increased from 191 to 417. Seventy-one per cent. of the pupils of the townships of the county are in consolidated schools.

During the school year of 1913-14 the increased activity was more marked than ever before.

The township high school enrolled during that year 539 pupils, all of whom in addition to the regular academic work had the advantage of sewing, cooking, manual training, and agriculture. Seventy-three per cent. of all the pupils in the townships were in graded schools and 94.7 per cent. of the eighth year graduates of the year previous were in high school during that year. This is a phenomenal record when one considers that the average for the state is by far less than one-half that amount.

The schools of Randolph county were far in advance of what is known of the vocational movement in schools. This movement was brought about by the Legislature of 1913 passing the "Vocational Educational Bill," whereby it was required to teach agriculture, sewing, cooking and manual training in all the certified high schools of the state. This Randolph county had been doing and the school year of 1913-14 found all its consolidated schools equipped completely for all the vocational subjects mentioned.

Randolph county's schools today stand among those at the head of the great educational system of Indiana, and the fight for better schools has been a difficult one and has been met by the opposition of those who are not in the progressive spirit of the present school age and has been met with the threadbare statement that "the old schools were good enough for me and my father, therefore they are good enough for my children." In spite of all this the growth has been phenomenal and will result in a higher citizenship, an asset beyond value. As one reflects upon the schools of the past and compares them with those of the present, with all their advantages the question arises, "What great things are in store for the children of the next generation?"

The county schools at this time are under the management of the county board of education, composed of G. Walter Hiatt, White River township; Henry Nichols, Washington township; George O. Wise, Greensfork township; Clarkson Puckett, Stoney Creek township; Robert Lumpkin, Nettle Creek township; Smith Lee, West River township; Emanuel Zimmerman, Green township; Albert Delong, Ward township; W. P. Noffsinger, Jackson township; G. C. Shultz, Wayne township; Daniel Grove, Monroe township; Albert Zimmerman, Franklin township, trustees; Thomas C. Hinton, president Ridgeville school board; Samuel Miller, president Farmland; W. J. Purdy, president Winchester, and Theodore Shockney, president Union City.

At the present time White River township has two consolidated high schools, the McKinley, one mile east of Winchester, and the Lincoln, four and one-half miles west; six district schools, and has abandoned sixteen district schools. Wayne township has two consolidated schools, the West Union and the Wayne; has four district schools and has abandoned seven district schools. Greensfork township has two consolidated schools, the Witter and Spartanburg; has four district schools, and has abandoned six district schools. Washington township has four consolidated schools, the Lynn, Beech Grove, Bloomingsport and Carlos, and has abandoned eight district schools. West River has one consolidated school, the Huntsville, and a joint consolidated school with Nettle Creek at Modoc; has two district schools and has abandoned nine district schools. Nettle Creek has a consolidated school at Losantville, four district schools and has abandoned four district schools. Stoney Creek township has at this writing no consolidated schools, but has one two-room graded school at Windsor and six district schools; however, at the present time a majority of the patrons of that township have petitioned the trustee to establish a consolidated high school; this, however, is being opposed by a certain element and it will take court decision to determine it. We fancy that in a few years from now the children of the opponents will wonder why their parents were so short sighted. Monroe township has one consolidated school, the Monroe; has three district schools, and has abandoned five district schools. Green township has but one school, the consolidated high school, the Green, in the center of the township; they have abandoned eight district schools. Franklin township has one consolidated school; has three district schools, and has abandoned three. Ward township has two consolidated schools, the Saratoga and Jefferson; has six district schools and has abandoned five district schools. Jackson township has one consolidated school, the Jackson; four district schools, and has abandoned six district schools.

Were we to offer a prophecy concerning the school situation it would be that in fifteen years from now there will not be a district school in Randolph county.

In addition to the township school excellent schools are maintained in Winchester, Union City, Farmland and Ridgeville. The first of these four towns to have schools was Winchester.

It is impossible at this time to know where the first school was located, as no records have ever been kept of it. No doubt, however, it was a private school located in the cabin of some enterprising, intelligent citizen who taught a subscription school.

The first school house of which we have record was "built of logs with the ends projecting at the corners." This description would indicate that it was built of poles rather than of hewn logs, but be that as it may, it was built some time prior to 1830, and stood upon Broad street (Washington) and East street just north, across the street, from the present site of the Friends church. Jacob Henderson was teaching school in this log cabin when it was burned down in 1836. Nothing was saved from the building, hence the pupils lost "all the books." This perhaps was not a very heavy loss, because no child was known to have over three books, seldom two, frequently only one and occasionally none.

Mrs. Smith, daughter of Jacob Elzroth, was a girl eight years old when they moved to this county in 1833. Mrs. Smith attended school in this log building and has the following to say concerning it:

"The house was built of logs and stands where Dr. Hunt's office now stands; it was a one-room building, not very large; the door faced the east, and windows on the south side were made of ten small glass placed side by side as if a log had been left out and this put in its place; there was also a window on the west side. There was a large paddle fastened to the wall by a string hung near the door. This paddle had the word "out" printed on one side and the word "in" printed on the other, the rule being that when the child left the room the paddle was changed so that the word "out" would show and upon their return the paddle would be turned. We would get full of mischief sometimes and fail to turn the paddle and in that way two or three of us would get out at the same time and have a good time. The seats were made of big slabs with pegs in them and reached clear across the room. Polly Heaston was the only pupil who had a slate and Polly received a great deal of attention from the other pupils because of this. The slate was borrowed by as many pupils of the school as could find time to use it. The only book we used was a spelling book and no other book was used until we got to the upper grades. There weren't many books burned when the house burned because there weren't many there, but we had a good time in the old school. My father taught one term because he did not want to see the children go without an education; he had young men and women come to him who were almost of age, who didn't know their a-b-c's."

The school was next held in the old Methodist church, which stood on Main street, one square south of where the county jail now stands. The school was moved from this site to the old seminary, which stood on West Franklin street. Later on a brick building, which is still standing, was built on the north side of Will street, east of the G. R. & I. raliroad. This served as a building for public schools, for a number of years, when it became necessary to build another building. This building was built on North Main street and north of Third street, and it is now used as a residence. This served their purpose until the year 1867, when the schools, having become better organized, and the needs much greater, it was found necessary to build a new building.

The town (whose schools were conducted by the township), was fortunate in having as the township trustee a man of indomitable courage and determination to give the boys and girls splendid facilities for school. This man was Thomas W. Kizer. Mr. Kizer, in spite of the opposition of those opposed to higher education, persisted in carrying out his plans and built the "Central" school building, which was finished in 1867, at a cost of about $22,000.00. This building was one of the best-equipped and approved structures of its time. Few men would have had the courage to build such a building, but, thanks to Mr. Kizer, the community was given this splendid edifice. School was opened in this building on March 9, 1868. A short time after this Winchester incorporated for school purposes and the building became the property of the town.

The school held in the old seminary was transferred to this building and Prof. James S. Ferris became the first acting superintendent of the city. Mr. Ferris acted as superintendent until June, 1870.

For the history of the schools from this time until 1888 we shall copy a history compiled at that time by Superintendent C. H. Wood and printed in the Winchester Journal. Mr. Wood, however, has said nothing in this article concerning the erection of two new school buildings, commonly known as the North and South wards. These buildings were built about 1879 and were located, one on Orange street, between Main and Meridian, and the other on the corner of East and Third streets.

The earliest records found in the superintendent's office show that in the month of June, 1870, John Cooper was appointed superintendent of the schools and that he entered upon his duties in the month of September following. The teachers were T. S. Gordon, Daniel Lesley, Miss L. E. Lamme, A. Wells, E. Abshire and Mrs. Emma Thompson. The school was known as the Winchester Graded and Normal Schools, and the board of trustees consisted of T. W. Kizer, Joseph Edger, J. W. Diggs, J. B. Routh, Hon. T. Ward and General A. Stone. The course of study did not differ materially from that of the present day except in the order in which the subjects in the high school succeeded each other. Trigonometry then appeared in the tenth grade, and the graduating class studied evidences of christianity, moral philosophy and political economy.

The next year the board of education remained the same except that Hon. E. L. Watson was substitute for Joseph Edger. The new teachers were Thomas Hiatt and Misses L. Erlougher and Mollie Hutchens. The length of the school was nine months. There was an increase of five pupils in the number enrolled and an increase of sixty in the average daily attendance. There were thirty-two cases of corporal punishment.

The next year the board of education seems to have consisted of J. W. Diggs, township trustee, and T. W. Kizer, director; the other three members were the same as those of the year previous. Lee Ault was this year made principal of the high school and the other new teachers were Misses Libbie Fay, Kate Williamson, Mary Lamme and Elva Witt. Logic was added to the work of the senior class and some other subjects dropped. As the statistical reports were not left on the record this year it is impossible to give those facts.

The next year, 1873, Lee Ault was elected superintendent, with J. M. Hodson as principal of the high school, and the other new teachers were Misses Rebecca Weaver, Jennie McClure and Emma Henderson. The board of education consisted of A. J. Stakebake, president; A. R. Hiatt, secretary, and T. W. Kizer, treasurer. The course of study remained materially unchanged, except that Natural Theology appeared in the senior year in the place of logic; surveying, leveling and navigation had been taught for several years previous. The number of pupils enrolled was 540, and the daily attendance was 270, just 50 per cent. of the number enrolled, you will observe. The superintendent was paid a salary of $1,500 and the janitor $235. The average per diem of teachers was $2.37½.

For the next year, 1874-75, James Clenny and J. W. Polly were the new teachers added, the latter being the principal of the high school. At the close of this school year, among the names of pupils promoted from the first to the second grade, we happen to recognize Mamie Frankenstine, Emma Engle, Lou Jaqua, Linkie Reinheimer, Eddie Ludy and Rosa Bosworth. We give the names as they appear upon the record, and ask you, dear readers, to recognize them if you can.

From the second to the third room, among many others, we recognize Stella Way, Rosa Frankenstein, Minnie Evans and Eddie Diggs. Promoted from the third to the fourth room, we find among a few others, Eddie Riley, Annie Tooker, Leroy Chapman and Gracie Watt. We preserve the spelling of the record scrupulously. In the fourth room we find Willie Edger. Do you recognize the staid Deacon? Percy and Jimmy Goodrich, and Frank Kizer. And here are all the names that appear in the fifth room as having merited promotion. The figures following the names indicate their average per cent. for that year of 1874-75: George Neff, 87; Charles Yunker, 89; Allie Pennington, 89; Ina Watts, 97; Hortence Robinson, 95; Bell McNeil, 96; Ida Teal, 96; Minnie Wright, 90. The whole number enrolled was 475, a decrease of 65 on the previous year, but the average daily attendance was 269, thus lacking but one of being as many as the year previous. The number of cases of tardiness this year was 762; the superintendent was paid $1,500, and the average pay for the teachers was $442.50. This year the first graduating exercises of the high school were held, the class consisting of W. E. Monks.

The next year, 1875-76, Alice Kizer was added to the list of teachers and the board of education consisted of W. E. Murray, F. M. Way and T. W. Kizer. The number enrolled was 529 and the average daily attendance, 273. The salary of the superintendent is given at $1,500, and that of the janitor, $230, while the teachers average $442.50. The school property and apparatus was valued at $22,500. The record says that in the month of February the school was seriously injured by the smallpox. In room one, among those who were examined and promoted, we recognize the following with the average per cent. indicated by the numbers following their respective names: Charles Arbaugh, 90; Philip Kayser, 93; Charles Kelley, 93; Ivie Ginger, 98; Lee Bosworth, 98; Clara Swain, 93; Lillie Swain, 88; Eddie Preston, 90. In the second room we find such smart boys as Omar Tripp, 100; Willie Preston, 100. Also Ida Favorite, 95; Gracie Carver, 98; May Chenoweth, 96; Willie Cheney, 95.

The next school year, 1876-77, we find that Miss Flora Steele was added to the list of teachers, the board of education consisting of William Moore, F. M. Way and J. L. Stakebake. One more grade was added to the school, and it was taught in the basement of the Friends church by Mary Lamme. The per cents made by the different pupils this year and the names of those promoted are not recorded. The salaries of the superintendent and teachers remained the same, but the board economized by reducing the janitor's salary five dollars.

Next year, 1877-78, the teaching force was as follows: E. H. Butler, superintendent; H. W. Bowers, principal of high school; Alice Kizer, Mary Lamme, Clara Crane, Flora Steele, Rebecca Harker and Emma Henderson. For the eight succeeding years E. H. Butler remained superintendent, and the following persons, in addition to those mentioned above, were at different times employed as teachers in the schools: B. F. Marsh, Jennie Will, Alice Nichols, Kittie Nichols, A. L. Nichols, Alice Henderson, Emma Williamson, Cora Frist, Lizzie Moon, Rosa Frankenstine, Annie Tibbott, May Wiseman, Ella Bowen, Annie Tooker, Lyda Hadley, Vina Moorman, Mary Swain, Jennie Penland, C. H. Wood, F. S. Caldwell, Charlotte Hill, May Chenoweth, Chloe Lesley, J. T. Day, Emma Engle, S. A. Canada, and perhaps some others. During the nine years Mr. Butler held the position of superintendent, there were fifty-four graduates from the high school, the enrollment increased from 547 to 630, and the number of teachers from seven to thirteen; also the north and south ward buildings were erected.

Miss Phillipine Kerwer was employed to teach German in all the grades during the year 1883-84. In 1881, W. S. Montgomery was employed to teach music. He held this position two years when he was succeeded by James McKeever. After teaching a few months the latter gentleman resigned and the following year Professor Davis, of Union City, filled this position, and he in turn was succeeded the next year by Annie Tibbott.

In June, 1886, C. H. Wood was elected superintendent, and immediately entered upon the duties of the office. School opened September 20th with the following teachers: F. S. Caldwell, Misses Annie Tibbott, Elma Brooks, Mrs. Lizzie Moon, Misses Rosa Frankenstine, Emma Williamson, Allie Henderson, Lizzie Nichols, Mrs. Mary S. Swain, Misses Toda Frist, Emma Engle, May Wiseman, Myra Ross. Janitors: Oscar G. Puckett, Archie Arbaugh and David L. Stine.

For the past two years the high school has been under the principalship of F. S. Caldwell, who has rendered faithful and efficient service. He was recently offered the superintendency of the public schools of Miles City, Montana, at a salary of $1,500 per year, but our board would not let him go, as it would be absolutely impossible to fill his place.

We desire to say to the young people of Randolph county who may be preparing for college, or the duties of life, that no pains will be spared to give those who may attend this school, facilities for acquiring a sound education surpassed by no other schools of this grade in the state. The enrollment in this department of the school last year reached eighty-three, an increase of nine over the previous year, and the number graduated was six. It is very gratifying to know that there is a commendable interest on the part of the pupils to complete the high school course of study. The studies pursued have been selected with special reference to the wants of pupils in practical life, while it does not ignore those who desire to prepare for college. The State University at Bloomington and DePauw University at Greencastle admit graduates from the regular high school course without examination, and it is likely that any of the higher institutions of the state would do the same.

Several graduates of the high school are enrolled in various institutions of learning, among whom we might mention: John R. Commons, senior, Oberlin; John J. Wilmore, senior, Purdue; Grant C. Markle, sophomore, Wabash; Thomas Ward, Jr. Preparatory, Oberlin; R. J. and L. U. Bosworth, sophomores, Indiana; F. G. Keller, freshman, Indiana.

The board this year very wisely determined to require all pupils of the tenth, eleventh and twelfth year grades to take Latin. Satisfactory results have not been obtained in this study in past years, for the reason that as the course has heretofore been arranged, pupils who, of their own accord, chose to take Latin were all the time laboring under the disadvantage of having one more study than their less ambitious classmates. Consequently many of our graduates who have gone away to enter the various higher institutions of learning of this and adjoining states, have been compelled to make up the Latin which should have been given them in their high school course. It is gratifying to notice an increasing interest among those who are going out from the Winchester high school to secure the benefits of a college education, hence the necessity of a strong course in Latin. This year the pupils use "Smith's Principia Latina," part one. Next year they will be able to take Caesar and perhaps some Virgil. This will leave one more year for Cicero or some other authors.

Some of the higher classes last year having shown the inability of the pupils to reason logically, or to obtain mathematical results mentally, the board, at the beginning of the second term, ordered mental arithmetic taught daily in grades six, seven and eight. The beneficial results obtained from this partial course last year have warranted its continuance as part of the regular course of these grades.

Special attention was paid to the teaching of reading last year. Stories adapted to the capacities of the pupils of the different grades, were selected by the teachers or the pupils of the higher classes, and rewritten in words of one syllable. These were then printed on the typewriter by the janitors and used in the different rooms as lessons in sight reading. The results obtained were very satisfactory and sight reading as well as good supplementary reading of all kinds, is made a prominent feature of this year's work.

For the last three years we have had but two lessons per week in each grade in vocal music, but it is this year ordered by the board that instruction be given in this subject in all the grades every day, that all pupils be required to take this study and pass the examinations, just as in other branches of the course. Further, the per cent. obtained in the examinations in music will be held equal in value to that obtained in any of the other studies, in determining the standing and promotion of pupils, and no pupil will be excused from taking the course in music except by consent of the board.

Professor Williams is a teacher of more than fifteen years' experience in this and adjoining counties of Eastern Indiana, and the work this year so far has been very satisfactory.

The teachers hold their regular meetings every Tuesday afternoon from four to five p. m., in the superintendent's office, for study and consultation regarding the wants of the school. They are taking the "Indiana Reading Circle Work."

My predecessor fought heroically for nine years against tardiness, which evil had grown to terrible proportions before he took charge of the schools. This evil he in a great measure subdued. Our greatest difficulty now seems to be to get the boys and girls of the town to enroll. With an enumeration last year of one thousand and thirty-three and an enrollment of six hundred and thirty-seven, we surely have a serious state of affairs staring us in the face—an enrollment of not 62 per cent of the young people of school age who are entitled to school privileges; and so far as I know none of those boys and girls were receiving any instruction except such as the streets afford. Parents, you will some day wake up with alarm, to the terrible consequences that must ensue to your sons and daughters whom you have raised in ignorance despite the great Indiana free school system. Every good citizen, every one who has the welfare of our common country at heart should urge upon careless parents their obligations in this regard, not only to their own children but to their native land.

The record of every pupil who enters these schools is carefully preserved in the superintendent's office, and these records are open to the inspection of visitors at all times."

Mr. Wood remained as superintendent of the schools until the year 1891. He was fresh from college and enthusiastic in his work and under his charge the schools made rapid progress, in fact, Mr. Wood made such a record for himself and school that he was offered the superintendency of the New Harmony schools, among the oldest and best schools of the states and accepted that position. He was afterwards city superintendent of the schools at Valparaiso. During Mr. Wood's administration it became apparent that a new building must be built to accommodate the growing needs of the city. A great deal of strategy and diplomacy had to be used to accomplish this purpose and Mr. Wood's skill was shown in handling the matter.

The school board at that time was composed of J. T. Chenoweth, W. W. Canada and A. R. Hiatt. Mr. Hiatt was very much opposed to the building of a new building and was even more opposed to high schools. Fortunately for the new project a crack appeared at this time in the old "Central" building. Immediately the report was circulated that the building was unsafe and that it had been condemned, however, it was never condemned except as Mr. Wood puts it "by the members of some sewing society." This however, was done for effect and Mr. Hiatt gave his consent to the building of a new building and for this reason the building is known yet as the "East Ward" building. The building was completed and used for school beginning in the fall of 1891.

Mr. Woods served as superintendent in this building one year only, when he was succeeded by F. S. Caldwell, who had been principal of the high school six years previous to that time. Mr. Caldwell who was one of the most popular teachers the school has ever had, was equally as efficient and popular as a superintendent, however, Mr. Caldwell did not desire to make school work his life work and resigned at the end of his first year to take up the practice of law, at which he has been equally as successful, being at this time a member of the Appellate Court of the State. Mr. Caldwell was followed in 1892 by superintendent H. W. Bowers, who remained for three years, at which time he resigned to take charge of the Union City schools which position he held one year. He was then elected superintendent at Union City remaining five years in that position, at which time he moved to Portland to take charge of the schools of that city.

Mr. Bowers was succeeded in 1895 by Mr. O. R. Baker, who had been principal of the high school three years previous to that time. Mr. Baker immediately proceeded to put the schools upon an entirely different plan from what they had been heretofore. The second story of the high school building was remodeled, an assembly room was made and class rooms arranged for so that the school might be put upon the departmental plan. Amos C. Maple was selected principal with Victor Hedgepath and Esther Conway as assistants. The departmental plan was at that time a new one in the school but Mr. Baker was far sighted enough to see the benefits from it and was fortunate enough to have good support both of the faculty and the people to make it a success.

The policy of the Winchester school has been to keep a teacher, principal or superintendent so long as they desire, provided they have made good. This has added greatly to the efficiency of the school. No doubt due largely to the splendid plan which was really inaugurated by Mr. Baker.

Mr. Hedgepath resigned at the end of his second year as teacher in mathematics and botany and was succeeded by Lee L. Driver who succeeded Mr. Maple as principal of the high school two years later, and continued as such until his election as county superintendent in 1907. Mr. Driver was followed as principal of the high school by C. E. McKinney who had been a teacher of Latin in the high school during the school years of 1903-04 and 1904-05.

Other teachers of the high school, other than those of the present time, have been, Emma Engle, Fuller Combs, W. C. Hunter, Delmar Owen, Isabel Bush and W. F Regan.

Winchester is the only corporation in Randolph county to maintain a free kindergarten. This institution has been under the management of Miss Flora Steel and Miss Belle Edger since its organization and has proved to be one of the most popular divisions of the Winchester schools. The kindergarten has had the loyal support of the patrons of the school and is looked upon as essential in the life of the child as any other division of the work.

The east ward building, which was built in 1890, was destroyed by fire in 1898 during the school year of 1898-1899. School was then held in the old Central school building, the high school being located in the third story. The next year the new building, which is the present high school building, was occupied and is one of the best school buildings in the country.

The growth of the city made necessary the building of a new grade building which was done in 1906. This building is located in the southwest part of the city and is known as the "Frances E. Willard." This is a splendidly equipped building costing twenty-seven thousand dollars and at the present time the vocational work of all the schools is done in this building. Upon the completion of the new building the south ward building was abandoned and the building sold.

At the present writing, 1914, the North ward and the "Central" buildings have been condemned by the State Board of Health which of course will necessitate the building of new buildings to take their place.

Winchester has an enviable reputation as to the number of its graduates attending college, which of course is due largely to the influence of the teachers with whom these boys and girls came in contact.

UNION CITY SCHOOLS.

Mr. Ebenezer Tucker being a resident of Union City when writing his history paid especial attention to the schools of that city and was very diligent in his research concerning it.

Mr. Tucker has given especial attention to Union City schools and covers a period up to 1882.

Mr. Tucker has the following to say about them:

Union City.—The first school was taught by Miss Mary Ensminger, in the fall of 1853. The first public school was taught by George W. Brainard, 1853-54. Next, was a school by J. T. Farson, in the "Bee Line Boarding Car," standing near the old Presbyterian church. Next, Mr. and Mrs. Osborn taught in the little brick house on the state line, north of Mr. Dixon's. Also, Miss Anderson in a house lately occupied by Mr. E. Bunch, Columbia, north of Oak. Pinneo Case taught in White's Ware House, where Branham's restaurant now is. That ware-house, with all the books, etc., was burned in 1857. During the next two years (1857-59), N. Rowe taught in a building now owned by N. Moore, on Pearl street, and Messrs. Hitchcock and Dady, in a building opposite the former Eagle office. In 1858, a brick public schoolhouse was erected, the east part of the present main building. Mr. and Mrs. Gray taught the first school in that building, and after them, William A. Wiley, with an assistant. In the winter of 1860-61, Wright and Russell opened a select school in Paxson's Hall, and Miss Amanda Farson taught a school in 1861. In the winter of 1862-63, Levi Wright and wife taught the public school. Pupils enrolled, 168; compensation, $2 and $1.13 per day. Mr. Wright continued till 1864 (April). The statistics of the last term are as follows: High school, L. Wright, $2; Intermediate school, Simon Hedrick, $1.50; Primary school, Mrs. Wright, $1. Enrollment, 201. Teachers in the following years: 1864, Mr. Frash and three assistants; 1865, William D. Stone and three assistants; 1866, J. S. Leckbider and three assistants; 1867, Elias Loofbourrow and four assistants; 1868, Ebenezer Tucker and four assistants; 1869-70, Della Posey and four assistants; 1871, Ariston Dwinell and four assistants; 1872-73, W. B. Page and four to six assistants; 1874-78, J. C. Eagle and seven to eleven assistants; 1879, G. F. Meade and ten assistants (died in February, 1880); 1880-81, F. Treudley and ten assistants; 1881-82, F. Treudley and eleven assistants.

The following is the account of teachers in Union City schools since 1866:

1866—Principal, J. S. Leckbider, $4.50; Ella Fisher, $2; E. E. Anderson, $2; Minnie Swain, $1.

1867—Elias Loofbourrow, $3; Jennie Baldwin, $2; Joanna Knapp, $2; Rebecca Wharton, $2; Mattie Wharry, $2.

1868—Ebenezer Tucker, $5.75; Mary M. Wright, $3; Miriam Grist, $2; Joanna Knapp, $2; Jennie Baldwin, $2.

1871—Principal, Ariston Dwinell. We have no account of his subordinates.

1872—Principal, W. B. Page, $5; E. P. Connor, $2.50; Olive Williamson, $2.25; Flora Rush, $2.25; Alice Parent, $2.

1873—Principal, W. B. Page, $5; M. J. Swayne, Lizzie D. Starbuck, Ella R. Ferguson, Lizzie Williamson, Jennie D. McClure, Olive Williamson, Mattie B. Powers, $2.25 each.

1874—Principal, J. C. Eagle, $1,000 a year; J. V. Stewart, $4 a day; Jennie L. French, Sallie E. George, Martha A. Wilson, Emma A. Marshall, Alice Kemp, Ruth Hutchinson, $2.50 each.

1875—Principal, J. C. Eagle, $1,100 a year; Daniel Lesley, $4.75 a day; Lizzie Meredith, H. S. Foster, $2.50 each; Cyrus Woodbury, Mrs. Willson, $2.37½ each; Mollie Banks, $2.25.

1876—Principal, J. C. Eagle, $1,100; Charles W. Paris, $4; Lizzie Meredith, H. S. Foster, $2.50 each; Cyrus Woodbury, Mollie Banks, Martha A. Willson, $2.25; A. R. Kemp, Laura Palmer, Edith Leslie, Clara S. Crane, Nettie Wiggs, $1.75 each.

1877—Principal, J. C. Eagle, $1,100 per year; Lizzie Meredith, H. S. Foster, $2.50 each; G. Reynard, M. A. Willson, $2.12½ each; Joanna Torrence, Nettie V. Wiggs, Susie Bowersox, Ella Ferguson, $2 each. [Whether there were others we do not know.]

1878—Principal, J. C. Eagle, $1,100 a year; Olive Coffeen, $3; H. S. Foster, $2.50; Ella Ferguson, M. A. Willson, $2.12½ each; G. Reynard, $2.25; Mr. Torrence, Nettie V Wiggs, $2; Susan Bowersox, $1.75; Ella Dill, $1.50; H. R. Knauer (German and music), 30 cents per hour.

1879—Principal, Giles F. Mead, $1,000 a year; F. Treudley, $3; M. D. Ozias, M. A. Harlan, $2.50; J. C. Torrence, $2.25; Inez Bartholomew, Bell Dwinell, Susie Bowersox, Ella Ferguson, M. A. Willson, $2 each; Ella Dill, $1.50. Professor Mead died February, 1880, and Mr. Treudley took the vacant place.

Teachers for 1880-81: Frederick Treudley, superintendent, $1,000 a year; Mrs. M. A. Mead, high school, $540; M. A. Harlan, teacher of No. 9 and teacher of music, $720; Mrs. J. M. Knapp, No. 8, $450; Miss Aurie Hedrick, No. 7, $405; Miss May Meredith, No. 6, $360; Miss Bell Dwinell, No. 5, $360; Miss Libbie Reeves, No. 4, $360; Miss Ella Dill, No. 3, $360; Miss Ella Ferguson, No. 2, $360; Mrs. M. A. Wilson, No. 1, $450.

Enrollment for 1880: No. 1, 100; No. 2, 84; No. 3, 83; No. 4, 67; No. 5, 56; No. 6, 48; No. 7, 46; No. 8, 45; No. 9, 37; high school, 36. Total enrollment, 602 average for 1880, 388; highest monthly average, 446; lowest monthly average, 325.

The trustees of the Union City schools have been as follows: J. N. Converse, Nathan Cadwallader, J. M. Jaynes, Edward Starbuck, Henry Jackson, Tilghman Tritt, David Ferguson, W. A. Wiley, C. S. Hardy, L. D. Lambert, O. C. Gordon, Allen Jaqua, H. H. Yergin, John S. Starbuck, C. S. Hook, William Harris.

A regular course of study has been established, requiring twelve years for its completion. Ninety-nine hundredths of the pupils in attendance never go through the prescribed course, but drop out anywhere between No. 1 and the third high school year. A few, however, do persist in the arduous chase after their diploma, and succeed in capturing it at last. The graduates are given elsewhere.

Some efforts are now being made to obtain a library for the high school, but the attainment of that desirable end is yet mainly in the future. A good beginning, however, has been made, and some valuable volumes have been obtained. A praiseworthy enterprise has been inaugurated here and elsewhere to create a love for higher and purer literature, and with some success. The form the enterprise has taken has been chiefly the celebration of the birthdays of certain distinguished poets, as Bryant, Longfellow, Whittier and possibly others, by reading and reciting extracts from their works, writing essays and critiques, etc. The effect, both in this city and elsewhere, has been very good. The light of a new world of beauty and love and wisdom has dawned upon the minds of the young, and they are surprised to discover how vastly superior are Thanatopsis, Evangeline and the sweet and soft flow of the mild and gentle "Quaker Poet's" verse to the trashy dime novels, or even the blood and thunder stories or the love and murder tales of the Ledger, or the Weekly, or the Saturday Night, or any of the legion of sensational sheets that weekly spawn their noxious brood upon a gaping and astonished world.

The first schoolhouse in Union City was built in 1858, made of brick, with two stories and three rooms. The first addition was made in 1868, at a cost of $5,500, also built of brick, with two stories, two schoolrooms, two halls, a pump-room and an office. A second addition was made some years afterward, of wood, with two stories and two rooms. Another building has since been put up, made of wood, with two stories and four rooms. The main school building as now existing has the greatest amount of school room, with the smallest space of hall, entry and stairways, and withal, the most ready and convenient of access that we have ever seen. There are eight large schoolrooms and an office, with only one stairway, one lower entry and one upper entry, both small. There are no halls nor passage ways properly so called. A single teacher standing at the top of the stairs can oversee almost the entire ingress and egress of the pupils of all the rooms through the entries up or down the stairway and through the outer door of the building. The course of study as at present existing may be stated in substance thus:

First Year, D Primary—Reading, charts, primer and first reader; writing, print and script on the slate and board; spelling, words in their lessons; numbers, addition and subtraction, amounts not to exceed forty. Language and oral lessons.

Second Year, C Primary—Reading, second reader; spelling, words of the lessons. writing, slates, board and copy-books, with pencil; number, fundamental operations, not above three figures, signs, Roman numerals to C; language, short sentences, correct common errors, kinds of sentences, etc. Oral lessons.

Third Year, B Primary—Reading, third reader; spelling, words in the lessons; writing, penmanship No. 1; numbers, up to $1,000,000, subtraction, no carrying, multiplication to nines; language, review verb, subject, predicate, make sentences. Oral lessons.

Fourth Year, A Primary—Reading, fourth reader; spelling, McGuffey's speller to pages 50; writing, copy-book, no. 3; number, written arithmetic commenced; geography, eclectic no. 1, commenced. Language and oral lessons.

Fifth Year, B Intermediate—Reading, fifth reader begun; spelling, eclectic speller to page 71; writing, No. 3 copy-book; geography, eclectic No. 1 continued; arithmetic, mental and written continued. Language and oral lessons; no text-books.

Sixth Year, A Intermediate—Reading, fifth reader completed; spelling, eclectic speller to page 91; writing copy-book No. 4; numbers, mental and written arithmetic through reduction; geography, primary geography completed; language, continued; no text-book. Oral lessons.

Seventh Year, C Grammar—Reading, sixth reader; spelling, electic speller completed; writing, copy-book, No. 5; numbers, mental and written, to partial payments; geography, eclectic No. 2, begun; language, grammar (in text-book) begun. Oral lessons.

Eighth Year B Grammar—Reading, sixth reader; spelling, selected lessons; writing, copy-book No. 6; numbers, mental, through Ray's Intellectual; written, through Ray's Practical; geography, eclectic No. 2, completed; language, grammar continued. Oral lessons.

Ninth Year, A Grammar—Reading, sixth reader; spelling, selected lessons; writing, copy-book No. 7; numbers, higher arithmetic begun; history, begun; geography, physical, Cornell's; grammar, false syntax, analysis, parsing, composition. Oral lessons.

High School Course—First year, grammar, arithmetic, physiology, botany, algebra, German and book-keeping (elective).

Second year, algebra, natural philosophy, rhetoric, Latin, begun. Third year, geometry, Latin completed, chemistry, United States History, United States Constitution. Spelling, definition, composition, declamation, etc., through the course.

Recapitulation—Primary course, four years, Nos. 1 to 4, through fourth reader; intermediate, two years, fifth reader; grammar, three years; high school, three years; total course, twelve years.

If the great body of the pupils could spend twelve years in the pursuit of those courses, one might suppose they would thereby gain "oceans" of knowledge. As it is, one in a hundred "gets through," but where are the ninety and nine? And conjecture sadly answers, "I know not where, indeed."

The text-books are as follows: McGuffey's reader and speller—new series; arithmetic, Ray's; grammar, Harvey's; geography, Eclectic; geography, physical, Cornell's; algebra, Loomis & Ray's; history, Ridpath's; botany, Wood's; geometry, Loomis'; physiology, natural philosophy, chemistry, Steeles; Latin, Harkness'; Virgil and Cæsar.

The following are the graduates:

1876—Perry Shank, Webster Lambert, Preston Woodbury, Edna Thomas—four.

1878—Jessie Ruby, Winnie Scott, Flora Hutchinson, Ella Dill, Lizzie Wiggs, Flora Branham—six.

1879—Jennie Reed, Charles Proctor—two.

1880—May McNeal, Neva Harrison, Aurie Hedrick, Libby Reeves—four.

1881—Herbert Mitchell, Samuel Bartholomew, Alicia Fowler, Clara Hutchinson—four.

1882—Nettie B. Jackson, Clara Kavanaugh, Dora A. Clark, Jennie Hanlin, Anna Deem, Sarah A. Murray, Susan Stewart, Maynard B. McFeely, Morton H. Lambert—nine. Total, twenty-nine.

The commencement exercises, May 18, 1882, held in the capacious Methodist Episcopal church, were of a high order. The graduation essays and orations were well prepared and finely delivered in the presence of a crowded and deeply interested assembly, the music was splendid, the presentation address was excellent and impressive, and the whole performance was such as to reflect great credit upon all concerned in any way therein.

We have printed the above in full because Mr. Tucker was a man of broad school experience and this article shows what he considered the most advanced conditions of his time. The mention of the library for the high school is worthy of note.

Could Mr. Tucker again visit Union City and see their splendid library his heart would no doubt rejoice.

His idea of a school building seems to be that it should be constructed with as little space for stair ways and hall ways as possible. How different he would see things today were he to enter the present high school building with its many stairways, broad and commodious halls, ornamented by pictures and statuary, ample basement room and gymnasium. The schools of Union City like those of other cities of Indiana have made wonderful progress since 1880.

Mr. Treudley remaining in the schools for several years and started them upon a high plane. Mr. Treudley was followed by James R. Hart, who, in turn was followed by Mrs. Susan G. Patterson.

Mrs. Patterson has been a very successful principal and under her superintendency the schools made rapid progress. She was followed in 1896 by H. W Bowers who had been principal of the high school one year.

Mr. Bowers, through his interest and enthusiasm in the school was retained for five years as superintendent, when he was followed by Linnaeus Hines.

Mr. Hines during his five years as superintendent put the high school upon an entirely different basis from what it had been before—that of the departmental plan. Mr. Hines also aroused considerable enthusiasm in athletics. He was especially strong in school management and took quite an interest in the public library. It is largely through his personal influence that the splendid Carnegie library of Union City was instituted. Mr. Hines left Union City in 1906 to take charge of the Crawfordsville schools, which place he now occupies. He was followed in that year by Mr. O. H. Blossom who was retained for three years being followed by J. W. Stott.

Mr. Stott kept the school on the high plane and increased its efficiency and left it only for a larger field. He was followed in 1911 by John P. King.

It was through the influence of Mr. King that the high school again took an especial step in advancement, as it was under his administration that vocational work was instituted. Some of the principals of the high school, other than the already mentioned, have been D. C. Arthur, Eleanor Deem, Ethelbert Woodburn, James Gray, John Stanley, James O. Batchelor, Carl H. Mote, W. Morrison, Clyde Cleveland, W. O. Love and W. O. Stockinger. The Union City schools, like the others of the county, stand very high and the patrons are loyal and enthusiastic in their support and great things are certainly in store for their school.

FARMLAND SCHOOLS.

When the present school building of Farmland was dedicated Dec. 2, 1909, the usual dedicatory exercises were held. At these exercises two papers of unusual interest were read; one written by J. W. Macy, the other by Omar Caswell.

Mr. Macy's paper gave so graphically the organization and development of its first school we are quite sure it will interest all the readers of this book. The history of the first school in Farmland is practically the history of most "first schools" of the country.

Mr. Caswell's paper was written after weeks and months of careful investigation and study and may be taken as authentic for anything he may have to say.

FIRST PUBLIC SCHOOL.

By J. W. Macy.

In the year 1855 the town of Farmland then about three years old, had a population of perhaps one hundred and fifty of which about three-fifths were eligible to admission to public schools and the only places bearing any semblance to school houses were two old log houses, one about where the late Dennis Thornburg's residence now stands, and one just east of the residence of the late Elias F. Halliday, then owned and occupied by Dr. William Macy and they both together would not afford room for fifty pupils, and besides were unfurnished even with seats. The necessity for immediate provisions for school facilities was apparent and urgent. There was then on the statute books of our state a law authorizing the formation of school associations for the erection of school houses, and authorizing such association to receive contributions and accept subscriptions and take and hold title to real estate for such purpose and further providing that such associations when so organized and when a building was constructed by such efforts, to employ teachers and draw the public money due from the public school fund to support schools, pay teachers, etc. In that year a few of the citizens of the new town met, organized a school association, pursuant to the provisions of this law and purchased the tract of ground on the west side of town upon which the old school house stood. The deed was made by Dr. William Macy and wife Lucy to the Farmland School Association and was dated December 21, 1855. The records of this association unfortunately have been destroyed so that we can not know certainly how it was organized, the amount of subscriptions and donations, or the names of the subscribers and donors, all of which would be interesting to us now, but from public records at Winchester it seems reasonably certain that the trustees of the association were Dr. William Macy, James Pursley and David Macy.

The foregoing conclusions are reached from recorded facts. Thenceforth I must depend entirely on my memory. In the early spring of 1856 the work of clearing away and laying the foundation for the new seat of learning began. I remember it as of yesterday. The site was an unbroken forest. The day a superb spring morning. I distinctly remember that it had rained during the night, and the branches and buds of the underbrush were wet and dripping. The morning sun came up gloriously in the east, and, shining on the clinging drops, glistened and glittered like emeralds. The ground was soft and yielding and we began the work of grubbing and cutting away the timber every stroke would bring down a shower upon our heads, which made it great sport for us boys. I also remember many of the people who were there. I hope after the lapse of nearly fifty-four years the omission of a name will not be charged as an intentional omission of deserved, honorable mention, but that it may be laid properly to defect of memory, excusable under the circumstances. I remember that earnest, dignified Judge Peter S. Miller was there, and so was Dr. William Macy, then and always enthusiastic and optimistic on all educational subjects. David Macy, my father, energetic and whole hearted in the enterprise and a firm believer in the doctrine that education and christianity are inseparably linked, indissoluably bound and must survive or perish together. And James Pursley, a practical cool-headed man who realized the need of education and went about this work like he was building a barn. Doctor Ford, fine generous, intelligent, with a house full of girls to educate, but not a boy among them. All of these men who had boys large enough to handle an axe or a grubbing hoe or pull one end of a cross-cut saw, had them on the ground.

The whole crowd "waded" into the clearing with such vigor that before the sun was half way down the western horizon, the underbrush was grubbed, piled and burned, the trees felled, bodies trimmed and branches stacked and burned, blocks sawed to put the sills upon, as a foundation and the ground staked off for laying the same. And as the work approached completion I distinctly recollect that my father and Dr. Macy who were great personal and political cronies, but on theology were as wide apart as the poles, became engaged in an argument of religion. The Doctor was a materialist or at least he thought he was, and my father, a most devoted, orthodox Quaker.

The argument became heated and to an extent personal and acrimonious, so much so, that Judge Miller put an end to the debate by a demand for the previous question, on the subject of a new school house. Meanwhile we boys taking advantage of the lull in active operations selected the driest point and engaged in wrestling and jumping matches then the principal athletics for the boys in the spring time. From this beginning and from that time on, the work was prosecuted with more or less vigor and to an extent irregular and spasmodic. Nearly every carpenter within a range of ten miles worked on that building one time or another. If a carpenter owed a merchant, blacksmith, shoemaker, wagon makers, tanners, or what not of the town, the value of a day's work he was immediately called in and put to work. But it meant something to build a house in those days. It is probable that when we began the work on that spring morning every stick of timber afterwards put into that school house was then standing green in the woods; the frame timbers had to be hewed from the round logs, all the saw timber, boards, shingles, weather boarding, had to be cut into logs, hauled to the mill, sawed, then stacked into dry kilns and dried, even for the doors and windows, window sashes. The stone for the lime had to be ground and burned for the plastering. A man in those days couldn't take a hand saw and hatchet and put up a frame house, as in the present machine made age. So, notwithstanding all the energy, enthusiasm and vim put into it, the house was not near completed when time to take up fall school arrived. I know my father made most of the desks, having turned one of the rooms of our dwelling into a work shop for that purpose, and after school began kept making and putting them in as he could find time to do so. And now, I imagine, if we had one of those desks here, it might, when compared with the beautiful furniture of this school room, be a source of amusement, but to me that old school house and those old desks were sacrificial offering upon the altar of duty to family and country, by rugged, earnest, God-fearing, family and country loving men and patriots. Well the old, or rather the new, school house was completed and the boys and the girls came, the boys clad in home spun jeans and flannel and shod in cow skin boots, the girls in their home made linsey woolsey frocks, wearing substantial calf skin shoes, with soles half inch thick, and poke bonnets, I think that was what they called them, but whatever they called them, my recollection is, they partially concealed the sweetest rosey faces ever worn by girls since time began. And when these girls sailed up the aisle to their seats it may not have been noiseless, but it was with the air and grace of queens, and so they were queens, and ever shall be to me. And what a host of these boys and girls there were! They came from the families of Judge Miller, Doctor Ford, Solomon Robbins, Jacob Simmons, the four Macy families—Jonathan, William, David and Aaron—John and Elisha Doty, James Pursley, Samuel, John and Newton McNees, John McIntire, George Gray, William Peterson, Eli Hiatt, Thomas Connor, Francis Wilkins, Nicholas Caywood, Dr. James M. and John W. Keener, Beneville Moyer and George Ludwick and doubtless many others, which I can not thus hurriedly call to mind. And they came through the mud, oceans of mud, think of it! There wasn't a sidewalk in the town, board, gravel, or otherwise, save about 50 feet of bark in front of Miller & Ford's store, and when the worst came the larger ones had to carry the smaller ones from their homes to the school house.

But to my subject, the first school house. It was used for everything under the sun, for school, for town hall, for shows (strictly moral, of course), for prayer meetings, revivals, school exhibitions, to hold court in political rallies, temperance and scientific lectures, war meetings, and I vividly remember one hot August day in 1862, that about one hundred of us met there under the lead of Captain Burres and elected officers of Company "A" of the Eighty-fifth Indiana. And there were our teachers, Samuel McKee, Francis Marion Way, Major Stine, Captain Peoples, all good earnest educators. But Farmland's favorite teacher was Mr. Way. He was the idol of his pupils. In person, tall, straight as an arrow, broad shouldered, symetrical, a perfect athlete in build and in fact. In the school room he was an earnest, intelligent tutor, exacting from pupils, obedience to rules, close application and hard work, giving them kindest attention, lucid instructions and encouragement. He rejoiced in their successes and sympathized in their failures. On the play grounds he led in every play and was the play fellow and familiar comrade of every girl and boy. He was most anxious to be with you today but ill health and the infirmities of old age prevented his attendance.

Not only was it the scene of busy hours and the buzz of the school room, full of happy, hopeful, lazy, caged and restless boys and girls, deep in grammar, arithmetic, reading and writing, but its walls have echoed to the declamations of embryo orators in the rendition of such old pieces as "Rienzis address to the Romans" Shakespeare's dramatic history of "The quarrel of Brutus and Cassius," the "Maniac," Patrick Henry's "Give Me Liberty or Give Me Death," Webster's "The Union One and Indivisible," "The Border Ruffian" and it resounded to the philips of orators against the crime of human slavery, the ignus fatus of squatter sovereignity the awful crime of intemperance, to the appeals of flush faced oratory to stand by the old flags and of preachers to come to the mourners' bench and give your soul to God. And at its north door afterwards stood we young male gamin, shivering with fear and burning with desire, waiting for the girls, and dreading the mitten.

I have briefly outlined the building of the first public school house in your beautiful town and it should end the task assigned me, but I crave one word more. I loved that old school house and carried its picture, architectually ugly as it was, in mind all through life, not because I had had something to do with its building, but because of the tender memories it invokes, because within its walls and upon its play grounds, I passed the happiest hours of my life, because of the friendships there begun, lasting through all the trials and vicissitudes of life ending, or ended, only by death. Oh, the beauty, the strength, the purity, the unselfishness, may I say the immorality of the friendships of youth and finally because of the happy hopeful young faces lastingly impressed on my memory, faces made radiant by the morning sunlight of life, its hopes, its aspirations, its expectations.

CASWELL ARTICLE.

In the spring of 1855 Mary Ellen Macy taught the first school in Farmland. The school house was a log cabin, 14x16 feet, which stood across the street from the Christian church where the residence of the late Dennis Thornburg now stands. The salary of the teacher, of this school, and that of the next one was paid by subscriptions of the patrons. The second school was taught during the winter of 1855-1856 by James McNees. He had recently married Miss Macy and they lived in a two-room house on West William street. In one room he taught school, assisted by his wife.

On December 31, 1855, William Macy made a deed to the Farmland school association, for a lot on the angling pike on the west side of Farmland. This association was probably organized under the statutes of 1843, with Doctor R. Ford, Peter S. Miller, and David Macy as trustees. On this lot was erected the first public school house in Farmland. In this house Francis Marion Way taught the public school, during the winter of 1856 and 1857.

During the summer and fall of 1863 another school house was erected, on the east side of Farmland, where the Friends' church now stands. The deed to this lot was made by David Macy to the trustee of Monroe township, but not until March 22, 1867.

The deed for the ground, on which the first brick school building was erected, was made by Curtis Thornburg and wife, April 18, 1868. The building was three-story without basement and contained five rooms. It was erected while James S. Davis was the township trustee. About this time there was an advisory board, consisting of Elias Halliday, Captain William Burris and Dennis Thornburg. Mr. Lee Ault says, 'The schools had not been graded, prior to 1869. The present building was erected in that year and was not ready for occupancy when the schools opened. I remember that we organized the different grades in the Methodist church, while the workmen were cleaning the school building, putting up blinds, etc.'

In 1876 the Farmland schools were taken from under the control of the township trustee and put in charge of its school board. The town did not own the school building, but paid the township rent for its use, at the rate of eight dollars per month, and kept the building in repair. The town continued to pay rent until this territory was taken into the corporation. In October, 1888, the town trustees gave notice that they would present a petition to the county commissioners, asking for the annexation of lots, on which the Friends' church stands and territory owned by Monroe township.

The town council passed an ordinance, at the regular monthly meeting of the board, Monday night, May 5, 1890, authorizing the issue and the sale of bonds to the value of five thousand dollars for the purpose of erecting a new school building, on the site of the present dilapidated structure. This was an addition to the old building.

The contract was let to David Wasson for the sum of three thousand four hundred thirty-eight dollars; not including heating and ventilating and installing of closets. These were let to George H. Hess Co., $1,230.00.

The alumni association of the Farmland High School was organized in 1894. Norman Wood, president. Russell Wilson, vice-president; Vinnie Eby, secretary; Earl Wood, treasurer. Esther McProud, Grace Collins, Carrie Eby, executive committee.

The high school library had gained good proportions by 1894.

The building dedicated December 2, 1902, is one of the most commodious and best equipped school buildings to be found in eastern Indiana.

The teachers have been as follows:

1855 Mary Ellen Macy, subscription school; 1855-56 James H. McNees, subscription school.

The public school teachers and superintendents have been, Marion Way, 56-57; J. B. McProud, 57-58; Marion Way, 58-59-60; James H. Stine, 60-61; H. A. Schoolfield, 61-66; R. D. Norveil, 66-67; James S. Davis, 67-68;

Mollie Watts, 68-69; Lee Ault, 69-72. Charles W. Paris, 72-73; C. S. Atkinson, 73-75; William Loy, 75-76; C. W. Paris, 76-77; Marcus Bosworth, 77-79; Ira M. Branson, 79-80; J. V. Stewart, 80-81; J. Hancock, 81-82; U. B. Huron, 82-84; John Hancock, 84-85; C. W. Paris, 85-86. H. D. Good, 86-89; U. O. Cox, 89-91; O. B. Zell, 91-92; J. D. White, 91-97; G. C. Powers, 97-1900; J. F. Bobbit, 1900-02; J. O. Batchelor, 1902-06; Omar Caswell, 1906-11; Harry McKinsie, 1911-13. E. E. Zimmerman, 1913-14.

Mr. Caswell deserves great credit for the work done in compiling the above as no records had been kept of a great deal of it.

SCHOOLS OF RIDGEVILLE.

The early schools of Ridgeville had practically the same experience as has been described in Mr. Macy's article concerning Farmland schools.

At the time high schools were being organized Ridgeville was fortunate to have its college, and the needs of the community were supplied by it rather than having a high school organized; however, an attempt was made and a high school started but this merged into the Ridgeville college. This brought about a very bitter school fight, which resulted eventually in the high school being organized as a separate institution.

H. W. Bortner was its superintendent at that period. He was succeeded by M. S. Gragh in 1900. But little high school work was done in 1900, as that was the year the "school fight" took place; however, Mr. Gragh reorganized the high school in 1902 and put it upon a sound basis.

The history of the Ridgeville high school was virtually a history of Mr. Gragh's work, because he has been superintendent since that period.

J. E. McFarland later taught the eighth grade and part of the high school work; in 1905 Thurlow Shugart became principal, and was followed by John Shook in 1906, and Mr. J. E. McFarland, who had been in the grade work of the eighth grade, was chosen principal of the high school, which position he retained until 1910. Miss Alice Newman was elected to this place; in 1912 Mr. C. C. Bair was principal; in 1913, W. S. Fagley.

The first class graduated from the high school was in 1906.

Under the efficient management of Mr. Gragh and his teachers the school was commissioned January 7, 1909.

The Ridgeville school at the present time is laboring under disadvantages of equipment and assessed valuation sufficient to build a new building which it requires. No doubt this, in time, will be done.

MONROE, MONROE TOWNSHIP.

Other teachers in the high school of Ridgeville have been: Ferne Allen, Harold Trimble, Margaret Hardin, Marcia King, Alice McFarland, Bessie Rubey, and others whose names can not be learned at this time.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS, UNION CITY, IND.

A Catholic school has been maintained for many years. The building contains two rooms, the upper room being entered by an outer (covered) stairway. The school is conducted by two female teachers and a music teacher. It is wholly free to the pupils through the income of a fund established for that purpose by Peter Kuntz, lumber dealer, a public-spirited citizen of the town and a worthy member of the Catholic church. This school is well patronized. The number of pupils reaches and sometimes surpasses a hundred. If the Catholic friends seem disinclined to patronize the public schools, which are supported by public taxation and freely open to the whole community, it is well, at least, that by the princely munificence of one large-hearted citizen, liberally contributing out of his honorable and abundant gains for the praiseworthy object, the poorest child shall have equal opportunity at learning with the richest man in the land!

The schools, like all other institutions in the land, have made wonderful progress.

The child of today, surrounded, as he is, by the modern schools, with every convenience, as to sanitation, perfect heat and ventilation, with walls ornamented by splendid pictures, copies of the masterpieces of the world, statuary of the highest class greeting him in the corridors, teachers of culture, graduates of normal schools and colleges to teach him, books in plenty upon all subjects which he may wish to investigate, laboratories equipped for the sciences, manual training and sewing rooms, kitchens, and, in fact, with all up-to-date conveniences, can scarcely appreciate or imagine the conditions under which his grandfather struggled for these same things which he has handed to him.

The old school, with its meagre equipment and lack of facilities, however, turned out men and women capable of meeting and solving the problems of their time. All honor is due them and can be paid them for the advancement which they made under such adverse circumstances. They have made civilization and culture of today a possibility, and the boys and girls who today avail themselves of the modern school is only doing as his grandfather did—living up to his highest opportunity.

The hope of the country lies in its schools, and no citizenship can possibly attain its highest degree without having the most efficient schools. The community that in any way fails to offer its children the best of opportunities is robbing itself of the possibility of the highest citizenship of the future.

Formerly students were appointed by the county commissioners to attend Indiana University, Wabash College and Purdue University. These privileges were not extended from Wabash College for very many years and was soon withdrawn from Indiana University, but is still continued to Purdue University.

The first student appointed to Indiana College was Samuel Hawkins, appointed in 1834. W. D. Wood and William J. Shoemaker were appointed in 1846. Isaac Jenkinson and John W. Jarnigan were appointed in 1848. LaSalle Bailey and Elisha H. Wood in 1866. There seems to be but two more appointees to Indiana University.—Leander U. and Rosecran J. Bosworth were appointed in 1886. Albert Price was appointed to Wabash College in January, 1847, for five years. Paris P. Thomas was also appointed to Wabash in 1881, they being the only appointees of the county to that school. Purdue has had more appointees than any other school; they are as follows: J. J. Wilmore, 1884; Emerson Lasley, 1885; William W. Kennon, 1891; Edwin G. Chenoweth, 1891; Harry Platt, 1897; Don Shockney, 1897; Gerald Johnson, 1903; T. F. Moorman, 1904; Clarence W. Driver, 1905 and 1908; Fred S. Boltz, 1905; Merle B. Davis, 1909; Oscar Britt, 1909; Merle B. Davis and Glenn Holmes, 1910; Lawson Thompson and Seward Wright, 1911; Edward Davis, 1912; Walter Simmons, 1912; Jesse Haynes and Chester Macy, 1913, with Walter C. Simmons and Reed Clevenger alternate students of 1913.

SCHOOL OFFICIALS.

The management of schools has always been and will always continue to be a very important factor in the development of the schools. The framers of the Constitution recognized that the school system must have a head and that it must also have in each county, township and district a representative who would be held responsible for the schools.

Indiana has what is known as the township unit of schools, or the schools of the township are under the management of one man. This management, however, was not given to the township trustee until 1853. Prior to that time schools were under the control of the "three good district fathers," the picture of which is so graphically drawn in the "Hoosier School Master." It was the duty of these men to build the school house and provide a teacher.

In 1845 they were given the power of examining the teachers. It soon became evident that this was a very poor plan, and as early as 1853 examiners were appointed for the county instead of each district. From 1853 to 1861 there were two examiners for each county.

James Brown was one of these examiners in 1853-54-57-58-59-60; John W. Cheney, 1853-60; Colonel Colgrove, 1855-56. June 7th, 1861, Pleasant Hiatt was appointed for three years and was again appointed in 1864 for three years. Mr. Hiatt served during the war period, and the records of the county superintendent's office show that he had his difficulties. Some of his teachers were considered disloyal to the Union and Mr. Hiatt did not hesitate a moment to revoke the license of any one so inclined. Mr. Hiatt's theory was that any patriotic man does not lose an opportunity to show his patriotism, and a lack of showing it was construed by Mr. Hiatt as disloyalty.

Mr. Hiatt was succeeded by John F. Cooper June 11th, 1864. Mr. Cooper was elected for a period of three years, but removed to Wayne county in a few weeks after his election and was succeeded by J. B. Harrison on October 24th, 1864. Mr. Harrison was elected to serve until the first Monday in June, 1867. For some reason Mr. Harrison resigned. Mr. Pleasant Hiatt was again elected October 24, 1864, to serve until the first Monday in June, 1867.

For some reason not understood by the writer, the commissioners, on June 19, 1865, "Appointed Pleasant Hiatt school examiner for Randolph county for the term of three years from this date." Mr. Hiatt served until September 7th, 1866, when he presented the following to the county commissioners, through the county auditor: "To the Honorable William E. Murray, auditor of Randolph county. Sir: I hereby tender my resignation as school examiner of said county—You will please accept the same to the satisfaction of myself and all parties concerned. Pleasant Hiatt." The commissioners accepted the resignation and on the next day John G. Brice was "appointed school examiner to fill the vacancy in the unexpired term of Pleasant Hiatt who had resigned." Mr. Brice immediately qualified.

Mr. Brice was reappointed June 5, 1868, to serve a period of three years.

The first evidence of a contest for this office is shown in the June election of 1871, when "the petitions of J. G. Brice and A. J. Stakebake and the application of Prof. John Cooper for the appointment of school examiner were presented "And the board having seen and inspected said papers and being satisfied with the matters and things therein contained and having maturely deliberated thereon hereby appoint Andrew J. Stakebake school examiner for Randolph county for the term of three years and until his successor is appointed and qualified."

Mr. Stakebake was the last to hold this office of county examiner. It was evident that the office of the county examiner was not far reaching enough in its powers to be of sufficient service to meet the growing needs of the schools. The examiner merely held examinations and issued licenses; he also had the power of revocation of licenses. He had no supervision of schools; his office contained no powers of superintendency, which left the township trustees the sole directors of the school interests. Even the power of examination was very much abused on the part of a great many school examiners and applicants.

Boone, in his "History of Education in Indiana," says:

"The office was not an onerous one, and was rarely filled by persons appointed for their fitness, sometimes by teachers or ex-teachers, generally by professional or tradesmen, often in a perfunctory way. The law required only that they should 'examine such persons as should apply for that purpose, and certify what branches they were qualified to teach.'

"With persons of different degrees of attainment and experience, each operating independently of the others, there was no possible or uniform standard of examination. 'He who was most lenient and superficial was most patronized. A teacher failing to pass with one examiner frequently applied to another and received license.' In no respect does a system show itself weaker than in the careless or indiscriminate selection of teachers. Good schools mean good teachers. This requires a wise and critical sifting of applicants, in which sifting most laws fail, notably the earlier ones."

It became apparent to the leaders of education that a more central system was necessary. Various state superintendents of public instruction recommended changes in these laws, but it was not until 1873 that the Legislature heeded this recommendation and passed what is known as the "County Superintendent Law." This increased the efficiency of school government perhaps more than any law up to that time. Doctor Smart says of it: "The act did not create a new office, as many have supposed, but merely enlarged the powers of an old officer and changed his title. The county examiner was a county superintendent in fact. The county superintendent examines and licenses teachers; so did the examiner. The superintendent makes certain reports to the county auditor and to the state superintendent of public instruction; so did the examiner. The superintendent visits the schools of the county; so did the examiner; the superintendent holds county institutes; so did the examiner. The truth is that we have had (December, 1876. See Eighth Biennial Report, p. 91), county superintendency in Indiana for more than twenty-five years, the chief difference between the present and the former system being that the one provides for an efficient supervision, while the other did not."

Under this law the county examiner was made county superintendent and was required to visit schools, look after their organization, personally direct township institutes; examine official reports or trustees in school matters—in fact, was given the general superintendence of the schools. Instead of being elected by the county commissioners, as the county examiners had been, he was elected by the township trustees, who, with the county superintendent and president of the town school boards, constitute the county board of education.

The county superintendent has charge of all the schools of the county except those of towns and cities. He examines all teachers and becomes advisor of the teachers and directs the school work of his county. Pursuant to this act the trustees met in June, 1873, and elected Charles W. Paris, county superintendent of schools for a two-year term provided for by law. Mr. Paris was limited to thirty days per year for visiting schools, certainly a very short time in which to do a very tremendous work. Mr. Paris was succeeded June 16, 1875, by Daniel Lesley. Mr. Lesley served the county until 1883, and Mr. H. W. Bowers was elected.

Mr. Bowers served two terms and was succeeded in 1887 by Mr. J. W. Denney. Mr. Denney served for ten years, until 1897, when Mr. Paris was again elected for two years. At this time the term of office was made four years instead of two, and Mr. Paris was re-elected for two successive terms, being succeeded in 1907 by the present incumbent, Lee L. Driver.

The following are the men who have served as trustees of the various townships of the county:

Randolph county has had, for the most part, a superior grade of teachers, many of whom have worked their way to higher positions of learning. The life of a teacher is only a little over three and one-half years; however, there have been some noted exceptions to this average. The most striking exception to this is Mr. A. H. Ward, of Wayne township, who taught forty-two years, thirty-six of which were in his home township. Mr. Ward was of this class known as "a young old man," who always kept in touch with the most modern thought and method of teaching.

Superintendent O. R. Baker, of the Winchester schools, has served as superintendent longer than any other man of the county. Mr. Baker came to Winchester in 1892 and served as principal of the high school three years and has been city superintendent continuously since.

The excellence of the Winchester school is due largely to the progressive spirit of its superintendent. Mr. Baker has a record equalled by few men in the entire state, and let us say is a man equalled by few men in the state.

The enumeration of the school children of Randolph county shows and has shown for many years a gradual decrease.

Franklin township has in 1914, 188 pupils, a loss of 60 in ten years.

Green township, 261; a loss of 49.

Greensfork township, 483; a loss of 122.

Jackson township, 348; a loss of 66.

Monroe township, 476; a loss of 125.

Nettle Creek township, 469; a gain of 4. (Nettle Creek township has a peculiar record as to school enumeration; in the last forty years the enumeration has not gone below 465 nor above 469.)

Stoney Creek township, 257; a loss of 44.

Ward township, 510; a loss of 25.

Washington township, 637; a loss of 87.

Wayne township, 421; a loss of 84.

West River township, 387; a loss of 72.

White River township, 198; a loss of 96.
Farmland, 207; a loss of 37.
Ridgeville, 262; a gain of 8.
Union City, 713; a loss of 55.
Winchester, 1,212; a gain of 217.

A comparison on receipts and expenditures for the years 1880-81 and that of 1912-13 show the vast difference in the cost of the schools at that time and those of the present day; however, the disbursements for 1912-13 were more than normal in most cases, due to especial expenditure for buildings and equipments which many of these townships had expended during this year.

CHAPTER X.

CHURCH AND DENOMINATION HISTORY.

When John the Baptist, clothed in a raiment of camel's hair, and a leather girdle about his loins, and subsisting upon locust and wild honey, appeared in the wilderness of Judaea, admonishing the people to repent, "For the kingdom of heaven is at hand," and proclaiming the fulfillment of the prophecy, saying: "The voice of one crying in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight," he was heralding an institution that was to revolutionize society and become the civilizer of the world.

This doctrine was to go into all parts of the world and make possible the high state of advancement found in this great country of ours today. As the disciples of Christ carried the message to the world, so the pioneer father and mother brought the message to their own families and established it in the hearts of their children, while yet around the family hearth.

The itinerant preacher followed closely the footsteps of the pioneer; he also came into the wilderness proclaiming with fervor and enthusiasm the doctrine of repentance. Riding to the cabin door and calling to the occupants, he made himself known, and he was always a welcome visitor regardless of what his denomination might be. His coming was a welcome visit from the outside world and especial attention was always paid him as a guest. He was sure to have the best the household could afford and "yellow legged chickens were sure to enter the ministry" upon his coming. As soon as he expressed a desire to remain over night, as many of the household as could be spared were dispatched over the surrounding country to invite the neighbors to attend the services to be held in the cabin of his host that evening.

Most churches were represented by this class of ministers but it was particularly a strong element in the Methodist church. To this class of people Oliver H. Smith, in his early "Indiana Trials and Sketches," pays the following tribute:

"I should be false to the history of early Indiana were I to pass by in silence the itinerant Methodist preacher who contributed so much to the establishment of good order, quiet, intelligence, morality and religion among the first settlers and without intending to give voice to others I venture the remark that early Indiana, nay, more, Indiana today, owes more to the itinerant Methodist preacher than to all other religious denominations combined.

Their system carried other churches into every settlement, and where two or three were gathered together, there was a Methodist preacher or exhorter in the midst.

They were at the bed-side of the dying man, on their knees, and at the grave their voices were heard in songs of praise.

Other denominations waited for the people to come up from the wilderness to worship while the itinerant Methodist preacher mounted his horse and sought out their cabins in the woods, held his meetings there, carrying the Gospel and leaving the Bible and the Hymn book as he went."

The preaching of the early minister was always zealous, fervent and full of spirit. He believed in a future full of happiness or torment and despair. He dwelt but little upon happiness but preached almost incessantly of the eternal torment of the damned. Fire and brime-stone were frequently mentioned. His doctrine usually was "Be good for fear of punishment," rather than, "Be righteous for righteousness sake."

He preached upon texts taken from the Bible. The events of the day were left for others to discuss.

The minister was at that time one of the greatest factors of society and his method of preaching was in conformity to his environment. He preached fearlessly the truth, as the light from above revealed the truth to him. He admonished where admonition was needed. Position or policy did not protect the guilty from the needed advice. His sermons were frequently two or three hours long, depending upon the fervor and the zeal with which he preached. The adult portion of his audience never complained for they were, indeed, glad to hear the word of God. It became impressed upon the minds of the members of the church that a two or three hour sermon did not fit the spiritual needs of the child and out of this came the movement for the Sabbath school. These schools were established in almost every part of the county. A list will be found near the close of this chapter.

The Sabbath school has been largely built up by the persistent efforts of the women of the church and even the most ardent supporters of the church and church doctrine have found that Sabbath schools do not interfere with their rights and are a great help in bringing up their children in the "nurture and admonition of the Lord."

It is true we still have a very small per cent. of people who do not believe in the institution of the Sabbath school but the per cent. is getting to be almost a negligible quantity.

The first Sunday school in Indiana was organized by Rev. Isaac Reed, a Presbyterian missionary in New Albany, in 1818. Sunday schools are known to have existed in Randolph county as early as 1838 and no doubt existed much sooner than that.

The first church service to be held in the county was held in the cabin of Ephraim Bowen in 1815 and Stephen Williams, local preacher, exhorted at that meeting. The first sermon was also preached in Mr. Bowen's cabin by Rev. Mr. Holman, of Louisville, Kentucky, his text taken from Isaiah: "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Why then is the hurt of the daughter of my people not recovered?" James C. Bowen who was at the meeting said it was an excellent discourse and that it greatly edified the assembly.

FRIENDS.

Many of the first settlers of the county were members of the Friends or Quaker church. They had emigrated from the southland because of their disgust and antagonism for the institution of slavery. They believed that men were created equal and did not care to live and rear their families surrounded by the institution of slavery. These Christian people had been sober, devout worshippers in the southland and they brought with them, deeply settled in their inmost souls, the love of God and man and their hope in Christ and their sense of obligation to Him and their fellowmen.

Almost the very first thing done by them was to erect a church of the Lord in the wilderness, to which they went at stated times, through rain and sunshine and winter's cold, along forest trails, over paths dimly traced by blazed trees, on horse back or on foot, ever mindful of the command of their Lord not to "forget the assembling of themselves together."

Their week day meetings were usually held in the forenoon of the fourth day or fifth day and when that day came, the head of the household, together with his entire family and help, regardless of the condition of weather or urgencies and necessities of work, wended their way to church. The school house was generally located near the church and school children were dismissed from school to attend the week day meeting. This custom was adhered to in some parts of the communities of this county as late as 1884. There they sat in communion with the Lord for one hour responding to the spirit. Frequently the hour would pass with not a word having been said, and when the time for dismissal came the head man of the meeting shook hands and "meeting was out."

The churches were built with a partition running crosswise so as to form two rooms of one. The women sat on one side and the men on the other. The seats were placed in galleries—raised seats. During the business meetings the openings in the partitions were closed and the men and the womens' meetings were held separately.

When a young man and woman desired to get married they appeared in the monthly meeting and announced their intention of getting married by "giving in," that is, they gave to the clerk of the meeting a written statement that they desired to get married.

Upon receipt of this statement the men appointed a committee to examine the character and fitness and eligibility of the young man. The women appointed a similar committee to perform a similar duty for the young woman. Among other things the committees would ascertain would be whether the couple had the consent of the parents and whether either had promised anyone else in marriage. If the consent of the parents had been obtained and the committees found "favorable" to the contracting parties their report would be either "clear" or "passed." This report was made at the business meeting of the monthly meeting succeeding the meeting in which the "giving in" had been made.

The report of the committees being favorable the young couple appeared at the next fourth day or fifth day meeting. The bridegroom sat with his bride in the woman's meeting and waited for the head of the meeting to announce when the ceremony was to be performed. When the head of the meeting announced that the time for the ceremony had arrived the couple would arise, join hands and perform the ceremony as indicted it in the following copy of a marriage certificate recorded in Wayne county. Many of the grandchildren of Mr. and Mrs. Bailey now reside in Randolph county.

HIRAM BAILEY

AND

RACHEL THOMAS.

Marriage Certificate, 1820.

Recorded in the first Book of Marriage Certificates, page 165.

JOSIAH H. BISSHAM, Recorder.

Whereas Hiram Bailey, son of John Bailey, Clinton county and state of Ohio, and Rebecca Bailey his wife and Rachel Thomas, daughter of Edward Thomas and Mary Thomas his wife, of the county of Warren and state aforesaid having declared their intentions of marriage with each other before a monthly meeting of the religious society of Friends, held at Miami Missouri, according to the good order used among them and having the consent of their parents, their said proposal of marriage was allowed by said meeting. Now these are to certify to whom it may concern that for their full accomplishment of their said intentions this seventh day of the twelfth month in the year of our Lord, One Thousand and Eight Hundred and Twenty—They, the said Hiram Bailey and Rachel Thomas appeared in a public meeting of the said people held at Hopewell meeting house, and the said Hiram Bailey taking the said Rachel Thomas by the hand did openly declare that he took her, the said Rachel Thomas to be his wife, promising with Divine assistance to be unto her a loving and faithful husband until death should separate them. Then in the same assembly the said Rachel Thomas did in like manner declare that she took him, the said Hiram Bailey to be her husband, promising with Divine assistance to be unto him a loving and faithful wife until death should separate them or words to that effect and moreover they the said Hiram Bailey and Rachel Thomas (according to the custom of marriage, assuming the name of her husband), did as a further conformation thereof then and there set their hands.

HIRAM BAILEY,
RACHEL BAILEY.

And we whose names are hereto subscribed being present at the solemnization of said marriage and subscription have as witnesses set our hands the day and year above written.

Disputes or differences among the members of the church were settled by the meeting and very seldom resorted to the courts.

It is no wonder that a God-fearing people, such as these, should exert such a wholesome influence upon the early history of the county.

The Friends were the first denomination in the county to organize meetings and build churches. Up to 1820 they had six distinct communities, i. e.,

Arba, Lynn, (Old Lynn), Cherry Grove, Dunkirk, Jericho and White River. A church was built and a cemetery established in each of these communities and is maintained until this time. The exact year of the establishment of each one is not easy to state at the present time. Each one of them grew up, naturally, as it were, by the gathering together of those who in each locality were of one heart and one mind in the worship of God. The history of one is substantially the history of all, one in spirit, in faith, in love. This group of Friend's society has gone on hand in hand and heart with heart in its loving service of the Divine Master.

Arba, the oldest of these meetings was formed about 1815, in the community of what is known as Arba. "They built, during the fall of that year, a pole cabin meeting house of the most primitive kind, with neither fire place or chimney which served both as school house and church for some years. After a considerable time a new, hewed-log church was built which was occupied for some thirty years. This in turn gave place to a neat, plain brick structure, which now opens its welcoming doors for the general, quiet, loving Friends to assemble, 'in the spirit and wait on the Lord according to his appointment for the sweet and refreshing tokens of his gracious presence and for the power of the life giving spirit to work in their souls that which is well pleasing in His sight.'"

This church early established a "First Day School" (Sabbath school) and its members have been earnest workers in the cause of temperance and all other religious and moral movements.

Among the early members were Thomas Parker, Jesse Overman, Ephraim Overman, Eli Overman, Jacob Horn, Thomas Cadwallader, Micajah Morgan, John Thomas, Clarkson Wilcutts, Aaron Mills, Wm. Hill, John Cammack, Frederick Fulghum and Francis W. Thomas.

LYNN.

The Lynn meeting was formed very early in the history of the county perhaps as early as 1818, or thereabouts and meeting house was located upon the Beard farm one and one-half miles south and one-half mile east of the present town of Lynn. The chief members were Paul Beard, Sr., Jesse Johnson, Francis Frazier, James Frazier, Travis Adcock, John Moorman, Obadiah Harris and others not now known. The second house was built about 1830.

The summer of 1881 a new house was built one-half mile west and a half-mile north of the old church. It was located one mile south of Lynn and was sometimes called South Lynn. Meeting was held here until the new church was built in Lynn and the meeting trasferred to that point. The old building was removed in 1910.

JERICHO.

Jericho is located four and one-half miles southeast of Winchester on the township line dividing Wayne and White River townships. This meeting was established about 1820. They built a log cabin, no windows, merely holes for light, with shutters. The seats were poles with legs, the women's side had a big fire place but the men's side had a hearth in the middle of the room with a hole in the roof above to let the smoke and heat out. They would use coals from the fire place, bark, etc., that made but little smoke.

This meeting was organized by Benoni Hill, Henry Hill, Amos Peacock, Abram Peacock, Elijah Cox, William Cox and their wives. There was no minister for fifteen years. The first preacher was John Jones, about 1835.

The first church was built about one-fourth mile directly west of the cemetery on the Ed Chenoweth farm. It was about one-half mile directly northeast from the location of the present church. A frame house was built upon the present location about 1833. This house stood just east and north of the present brick structure which was built about 1865. This building was remodeled in 1878.

In 1843 a division took place in the society at Jericho a large company adhering to the anti-slavery Friends. A new meeting house was built near Henry Hills, and was occupied for about twenty years. The Hills, Peacocks and others were prominent in this separation at Jericho. The house which was built was known as the "abolition meeting house" and was vacated about 1865. About 1847 a dissension began to arise in the Friends church in the east over the question of "doctrine and practice" that is, should the church adhere to the old forms and practice or should they adopt more modern methods. This movement did not reach the west until about 1875 to 1878. In 1878 the Richmond yearly meeting decided to change the methods of procedure and modes of worship from those which had been prevalent for many years. Some of the Jericho Friends were unwilling to yield to these changes and in 1877 set up a meeting for themselves.

The two divisions occupied the same church for some time but the dissension became too strong and it became necessary to separate and those adhering to the old methods left for a while and occupied the old abolition meeting house, however, in a short time, about 1878, they built a new church across the road from the old church.

The two meetings have continued to meet separately until this time. The adherents of the old form of worship are but few in number having diminished to about twelve members. They are the only society of that division in the county at this time.

With the division of the church came school difficulties also, as it had been the policy of the church to have the school in close connection with it. The first school in this neighborhood was held in the church. The first public school to be built was located on the southeast corner of the cross roads where the new church is now located and the next was the compromised school one-half mile east.

WHITE RIVER.

White River is located one mile northeast of Winchester and was organized about 1820. The chief families in its organization were Benjamin Cox, John Wright, Jonathan Hiatt, Simon Cox, Thomas Ward and Joseph Moffett.

The second building, the one now standing, was built about 1840. This church is one of the most prosperous in the county today.

CHERRY GROVE.

Cherry Grove is situated about two and one-half miles southwest of Lynn upon a beautiful knoll.

The first house was built of logs and stood just south of the present building where the old school house used to stand. The second building was frame and was built upon the present site in 1838. That building was burned in 1856 and was followed by the present one which was built in 1857.

The Cherry Grove monthly meeting was established in 1822.

Cherry Grove had but one minister in its early history.

DUNKIRK.

Dunkirk is located three and one-half miles southwest of Winchester on the "Paul Way farm."

The first meeting house was erected in 1822 and was built of logs with puncheon floor and earthen fire-place in the middle of the floor without any chimney, the smoke escaping through the opening in middle of the house.

Among those who helped to build it were Jerry Reynolds, Isom Puckett, Jesse Green, Elijah Jackson, John Wright, Solomon Reynard, Solomon Wright.

The Friends there were led by Isom Puckett for thirty-six years; when he died in 1856 the church went down.

The Dunkirk society body went with the anti-slavery Friends and the meeting went down before that body dissolved its organization and meetings were again established in this community in 1912 at which time the society purchased the nearby school house and converted it into a church. The meeting is at this time thriving and prosperous.

NORWICH.

This church was located about a mile southeast of Spartanburg and was built about 1825. The society was discontinued about 1840, or perhaps sooner. The cemetery remains but seldom anyone is buried there at this time.

HARDSHAW.

Hardshaw was located in Stoney Creek township one-half mile north of the Neff school house. It was sometimes called "Thornburg." It was established before 1831 and was laid down about 1834.

CABIN CREEK.

Cabin Creek was commonly known as Cedar and is located three miles southwest of Farmland and was established in 1834. In 1843 it went mostly anti-slavery and continued as such until that society disappeared and a new meeting called Cedar was organized at the same place in 1860. The present one was built in 1881.

POPLAR RUN.

Poplar Run is located five and one-half miles southwest of Farmland and was organized in 1846 after the "separation." The leaders were Mark Diggs, John Diggs, Henry Moorman, Eli Townsman.

The first building was built of logs, the second a frame building was built in 1856. In 1883 the old church was abandoned and a new one built just across the road north from the old one. This church was remodeled only a few years ago and is now one of the most modern of the county.

BUENA VISTA.

Buena Vista is located one-half mile east of Unionsport and was built about 1870 by a union effort of all classes and was given into the charge of Friends. There was no society in connection with the meeting house but Friends from abroad made appointments for a time. Their meetings, however, were discontinued and the church has been re-built and is now owned by the Christians. The Friends church formerly stood about the middle of the burying ground. It was built by Thomas Gillum in 1850.

UNION.

Union is located about three miles southeast of Windsor. Rev. John Smith, United Brethren preacher, came into the neighborhood where John Thornburg lived about 1831. Upon his preaching, the people liked his doctrine well and the union church was formed by Friends and Methodists. The log church near the cemetery was built about 1838.

Divisions in the church arose and the meeting house was sold and another erected farther south. This church stood in the south edge of the old cemetery. Another was built there in 1883. Still another which is now standing was built just south of the old one in recent years.

FARMLAND.

The Farmland meeting was established in 1881. Benjamin Morris, a minister, was authorized by the Cedar preparative meeting to hold meetings at Farmland. They organized with about thirty members and held their first services in the old school house.

They then purchased the old Christian church located in the west edge of the town and kept that building until about 1890. This building was burned and the present structure has been erected only a few years. Other Friends churches in the county affiliating with the Friends church are Bear Creek, Franklin township, Mt. Pleasant, Martindale, Bloomingsport and Rural in Washington township; Brown's chapel, Greensfork, and Losantville.

WINCHESTER.

It was left for the largest town in the county to be among the last to establish the Friends church.

This was largely through the influence of Elkanah Beard and his wife, both prominent ministers among the Friends, who took up their residence in Winchester in 1873.

It would be impossible for people of their ability and energy to do anything but start a movement toward the establishment of a church. This they did and began to hold services in the city hall. The interest grew rapidly and two years later a preparative meeting was established as was also a monthly and quarterly meeting. A church was erected in 1876 which met every condition of the meeting for a number of years.

The Winchester quarterly meeting comprises the counties of Randolph, Blackford, Delaware and Jay and is said to be the largest quarterly meeting in the world. In 1901 a new church was erected and dedicated to the services of the Master. A short time afterward a pipe organ was installed in this church, and it is said to be the first church of Friends to have a musical instrument of this kind.

The Winchester meeting is an unusually strong one, full of interest and growing rapidly. This is due in a measure to the excellent influence for a number of years of Mr. and Mrs. Elkanah Beard. Mr. Beard was born in Washington township in 1833, the son of William Beard and a grandson of Dr. Paul Beard, one of the first pioneers of that part of the county. His wife, Irena, was the daughter of Silas Johnson and the granddaughter of Jesse Johnson, another pioneer of that vicinity. She was born in 1835 and they were married in 1852.

Mr. and Mrs. Beard lived near the Lynn Friends meeting house until 1873 when they moved to Winchester. For eight years they regarded Winchester as their home although much of that time was spent away from home. They spent part of the time during the war in the south, doing work among the freedmen. They had charge of the Friends schools in Mississippi and Louisiana. Schools being located at Vicksburg and Jackson, Mississippi, Levy, Papaw Island, Lauderdale, and Youngspoint, Louisiana. They came north in 1869 and went to India as missionaries. They spent one year in the city of Benares on the Ganges, and one year at Jabbalpoor, in Central India. After three years' service in India, Mr. Beard's health having failed, they returned to America. Mrs. Beard was also an invalid at this time. They were very successful as missionaries and much of the work established by them has today grown and is today a memorial to their many sacrifices. After they took up their residence in Winchester they entered other fields of missionary work. They spent a few years among the Indians, most of the time among the Arapahoes and Cheyennes. They also visited and carried the Gospel of the Master among the Modocs, Apaches and Camanches.

Mr. and Mrs. Beard after their many years of service, administering to the wants of others and carrying the message of peace and love where it is most needed, again moved near their old home in Lynn. They have been very thankful to be considered instrumental in God's hands, to do His will wherever called and the spirit of faith and trust has guided them through many a trial to great victory. Mr. Beard died in 1910 in Lynn and his wife still survives, peacefully waiting the summons to come up higher and "enter into the joys of the Lord."

Ministers of the church have been Elkanah Beard, Henry Merrill, Abijah Wooten, Simpson Hinshaw, Charles E. Hiatt, Edward Woodard, William J. Sayers, George C. Levering and Frank Cornell.

CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

"New Lights."

The Christian church has been a great factor in bringing the message to many people early in the history of the county.

Churches of this denomination began to be established in the various settlements of the county. One of the first and perhaps the first church to be built was at "White River," two miles southwest of Farmland. This class was organized in 1838 and for a short time held its meetings in the school house located near the present site of the church. In 1839 a log church was built. This gave way in 1850 to a brick church which is still standing. This church, however, was remodeled and made modern but a short time ago.

In 1854 a part of the membership of this organization formed a church at Farmland and met in the school building of that town. They built a church in the west part of the town known as the "West Church" in 1867 and worshipped there many years. They now occupy a modern church on North Main street. This edifice was erected about ten years ago. The church is in a very prosperous condition. The next church of this denomination was built in Washington township at Liberty. This was built as early as 1838. Their first preacher was Jesse Brumfield.

Internal dissensions created trouble. The church was practically broken down but was revived in 1866 and is today a very prosperous organization.

PLEASANT HILL.

This church was established some time before 1847. Meetings were held at a Mr. Constables. A frame church was built in 1850 and the present brick house in 1876. The church is located in the northeast corner of Jackson township and is in a thriving condition.

SHILOH.

This church is located two miles north of Farmland. Preaching began in that neighborhood about 1852. Meetings were held in a log house east of where the present building now stands. The first house was built in 1860 and was made of brick. In 1880 the present frame building was built. The church is not very strong numerically, having lost nearly all its members to surrounding churches.

PLEASANT GROVE.

This church is situated in the southwest corner of Stoney Creek township and was organized February 20, 1858, by Elder William Terrell, with nineteen members and it was originally organized under the name of "Stoney Creek," but in 1859 was united with the Pleasant Grove church, and assumed that name. The church has been a prosperous one.

OLIVE BRANCH.

This church is in Franklin township and was organized in 1858 by Rev. Larkin Mullin. The church was reorganized in 1866 and a new building erected in 1870. The church has been very prosperous. A new church was erected in 1913.

WINDSOR.

This church was built the fall of 1859, under the direction of Rev. Larkin Mullin as pastor. The church stands near the cemetery and school house. The membership is not nearly so large as it formerly was but is in a thriving condition.

PLEASANT GROVE.

Pleasant Grove, in Ward township, was built in 1877 as a union church. The Disciples, Methodists and Christians built the church and occupied it jointly for a long while. The Christian organization was affected in 1865. This organization now has use of the church. It is now known as Good Hope.

Pleasant Grove, in Stoney Creek township, near the south center of the township northwest of Poplar Run Friends church, was built in 1846. The original organization was affected south of where the church now stands, but when the building was built was decided to put it where it is now. The church has always been strong and active and is of a great deal of importance today.

HARRISVILLE.

This church was organized in 1865 and the house built in 1866. It started with a membership of about twenty-five good, earnest Christian people. The church has prospered, until today it is one of the most prosperous of that denomination in the county.

SHEDVILLE.

This church, in Green township, was organized in 1877 in the school house south of Shedville. They numbered about thirty-two at their organization. The present house, which they occupy east of Shedville, was built in 1880.

WINCHESTER.

The Winchester church was organized in —— and occupies a substantial edifice on the corner of North and East streets. This church is one of the most prosperous of the county and is a source of much good to the uplifting of the spiritual life of Winchester.

The Christian church has its centers in different parts of the county that are in a prosperous condition and doing much for the cause of the church.

There is Clear Creek church, in Ward township; Carlos, Buena Vista, in West River township; Mt. Zion and Antioch, in Nettle Creek township.

This church has had some organizations abandoned, among which were Unionsport, Pittsburg and Fairview.

Among prominent ministers of the Christian churches have been Rev. Thomas Addington, born in 1829 in Wayne county. He moved in Randolph county in 1834, settling near Maxville. In 1851 he married Martha Ann Hughes. They spent most of their life on a farm on Bear creek, in Franklin township. Mr. Addington was a student of the Union Literary Institute, and Liber College, in Jay county, and was ordained a minister in 1858. He was one of the most powerful preachers of that denomination in eastern Indiana. He was always found working in the cause of right, never fearing to extend his hand in the name of mercy. Mr. Addington was a soldier in the Civil war and was held in the highest esteem by his comrades. He is the author of a number of pleasant articles and has written at least one book, "Jim Baker," a story of a slave boy who was a classmate of his in Union Literary Institute.

Rev. Larkin Mullin, father of the Rev. Franklin Mullin, now living in Farmland, and himself a prominent minister of the Christian church, was another one of the pioneer ministers who did a great work among the early people of the county.

Mr. Mullin was an enthusiastic, God-fearing man, and never lost an opportunity to help his fellow-man or admonish him to a better and more upright life.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

The Disciples church, which is sometimes called the Christian, and to distinguish from the other branches of Christian, Campbellites, was not among the very first to appear in Randolph county, but its ministers began to come about 1830.

One of the earliest ministers was the Rev. Hosea C. Tillson, of Bethel, Wayne county. Mr. Tillson was one of these strong men who believe in carrying the Word to those who needed it and were willing to hear it, and served as a traveling minister for a great number of years. Mr. Tillson, at one time, in talking of his experiences, said "The outfit of the pioneer preacher was a large supply of the Love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Spirit, a pocket Bible, a hymn book, a horse, a pair of saddle-bags and a large cape overcoat to keep warm in winter and to shed rain in summer, tied on behind the saddle when not needed. He took no umbrella, because it could not be used riding through the thick woods."

Mr. T. began to serve in the ministry in 1830. He preached first at Lebanon, Warren county, Ohio, traveling to Cincinnati and Kentucky, crossing the river again at Aurora, Dearborn county, Indiana, and going thence to Wayne county, preaching and also working at his trade as a cooper.

In 1830 he first preached in Randolph county. Of this experience he said, in a paper, read at a meeting of ministers of the Disciples church, held at Spartanburg February 2, 1882: "A small settlement had been formed on the Little Mississinewa, four miles north of where Union City now is. My old school teacher and other friends had moved up there into the woods. James Wickersham, James Skinner and Thomas Wiley were among them. I preached there to twenty persons, which was all there were in the neighborhood." Returning home through Newburg (Spartanburg), he left an appointment to preach there, in June, which he fulfilled. Some of the Friends had moved to Fort Wayne, and he was invited to visit that place, which he accomplished in August, making a three days' horseback ride through the wilderness, and thence six miles down the river, where the meeting was held in a cabin on the banks of the stream. He says: "On Sunday morning large canoes came sailing on the river, loaded with people, and landed near, filling the cabin. One woman asked for immersion. Her request was granted, which was supposed to be the first baptism in the waters of the beautiful Maumee." Returning, scarce of money, he fed on blackberries and baited his horse on the wild grass, and, at other times he ate black haws, thinking of John the Baptist and his "locusts and wild honey."

He continued his visits to the settlement north of Union City in 1837, accompanied by the two Harlans, and, in 1838, began to baptize into the faith of Jesus. The settlement had increased and a cabin would not hold the people, and the men made a booth of bushes at the cabin door, with fence rails for seats, while the preachers' horses stood tied to the trees, eating corn brought in their saddle bags. We quote again, in substance: "The first week in January, 1840, the meeting was held in Thomas Wiley's hewed-log house before his large log-heap fire. Brother Wiley cut the ice a foot thick, and, in a heavy snow storm, we baptized James Wickersham and his wife and some others, and, at night, several more by the light of hickory bark torches, thus getting both my suits of clothes wet, but Sister Wiley had them well dried by morning. In the spring of 1842 we ordained Thomas Wiley and Charles Smith elders of the church there by the laying on of hands." In 1840 he was called by Jonathan Thomas to preach at his new saw-mill, on Clear creek, east of Deerfield, at which place he continued to preach for three years with much success. He preached also at Brook's creek, in Jay county, and at Petersburg and Walnut Corner, Randolph county.

South Salem, Springboro (north of Lynn), etc., were begun about the same time. He states: "We were called to Joel Howe's cabin, in the edge of the big woods west of Spartanburg, in the summer of 1839. An acre was cleared, a loose plank floor was in the cabin, but the cracks were not stopped. A large sycamore gum stood near, with a hole cut in one side for a smoke-house. The first two meetings, not more than eight persons were present, but in the early winter, at the third or fourth appointment, the house was so full of people that we could scarce get in. They had come from the settlements south out of curiosity. But the Lord was there in the power of the Spirit, and tears flowed freely. At night, we preached at Davis' schoolhouse, south of Spartanburg, to a crowded house."

Shortly afterward, at the same house, and at Brother Silas Davis' dwelling, two meetings were held at the same hour by Brothers Valentine Harlan and Tillson, and two brethren, John Starling and Nathan Hedgepeth, were baptized at Davis' spring. "Soon after that, Bethpage meeting-house was built and a great work spread through all that region. * * * I am the last one of the pioneer preachers left on the shores of time in these parts, and I am 'only waiting till the shadows are a little longer grown.'" Mr. T. baptized many believers, some years more than 200. He says in his paper: "The old horse was dead long ago. The old saddle was torn up in 1843 (when I was out with Brother Franklin), but here is the old saddle-bags and Father Harlan's old hymn-book, like the one I had, and here is the old cape overcoat; and last, and best of all, here is the old backwoods preacher in good health and with as warm a heart for the prosperity of Zion as he had fifty years ago."

Mr. Tillson's description of the bluff pioneers, who were the agents in God's hand for causing the beginning of the Gospel of the Kingdom in those wildernesses is very quaint and striking:

"Joel Howe, taking his little sorrel mare with rope-rein bridle and sheepskin saddle, and going to Bethel (eight miles) one Sunday morning dressed in home-spun clothes of flax and tow, with straw hat and feet all bare, was the angel of mercy appointed to be the herald of salvation that should open the gates of the New Jerusalem to that infant community. James Wickersham and James Skinner, two poor brethren coming down to Whitewater to buy breadstuff, urged me to come up on the Little Mississinewa and break to their famishing souls the bread of eternal life. Sister Nancy Leabo, at Walnut Corner, whose husband died, leaving her to struggle on in poverty and want, called me there to preach his funeral. Jonathan Thomas, in his shanty built of rough plank, urged me to come and speak the words of heavenly consolation to himself and his neighbors, east of Deerfield. The meetings there were held, first in a Methodist brother's cabin, then at the saw-mill, the men seated on the logs in the mill-yard like pigeons in the trees. When preaching on Bear creek, northwest of Winchester, Brother James Level and wife came on horseback nine miles to meeting on Sunday morning, returning at evening. Souls were 'hungry for the Word' in those times and would endure hardships to reach the spots of blessing, where stood the servants of Christ to feed the eager, waiting crowds with the bread furnished from the Master's hand."

The experiences of Mr. Tillson were the experiences of all pioneer preachers and a church established by such sincere men could not help but prove of lasting good. The church of which he spoke, New Lisbon, Jackson township, was formed July 7, 1839, and has continued to be one of the best churches in the county.

SPARTANBURG.—In 1838 a church was organized at Spartanburg. It was brought about by the division of the Christian (New Light) church of Bethel, Wayne county, dividing upon the doctrines taught by Rev. Campbell. The majority of the congregation left the original church and soon organized the Disciples church at Spartanburg where they built a log meeting house about 1840. This church was known as Bethpage and stood south of Spartanburg. This church immediately became a famous place for debates between the two divisions of the original church. The membership grew very rapidly and became sufficiently large to justify the building of new churches. One was built at Gilead, southwest of Spartanburg, three miles, in 1854 and the other at Sugar Grove southeast of Spartanburg which was used for meeting purposes until the building was built in Spartanburg, the church at the latter place was built about 1868 and is still occupied by the congregation of that community. It has, however, been remodeled and is a neat, up-to-date church, enjoying all the prosperity that comes to an organization composed of live, wide-awake, enthusiastic members. The next church in the county to be built was at White River Chapel north of Snow Hill. The church was built there about 1856 but the membership was never very strong and the church was eventually abandoned.

UNION CITY—The Union City church was organized in 1858 by the Rev. Thomas Wiley with twenty-four members. The trustees were Simeon Branham, Thomas Wiley, Isaac Beal and J. E. Paxson. The Rev. Thomas Wiley was the first elder and also the pastor. It was largely through the influence of this strong man that the church was put upon a foundation that should make it one of the strongest institutions of the country. Mr. Wiley had a good field in which to work, as there were no churches in Union City at that time, his being the first. The building was begun in 1853 but was not completed until 1858. The lots upon which the church stands were donated by Jere Smith, one of the founders of the city and one of the ardent adherents to the Disciples Church.

The congregation increased very rapidly and it became necessary in about twenty years to build a new building. This church was begun in 1875 but was not dedicated until the 1st of March, 1878, and was at that time by far the finest church in eastern Indiana.

The growing congregation again made it necessary to increase the capacity of the church. To this end the church was remodeled in 1901. At that time the large auditorium was made larger and the church modernized in every particular. A pipe organ was afterward installed.

The church was again remodeled in 1913 but scarcely had been completed until it was partially destroyed by fire. It has, during the summer of 1914, been rebuilt and stuccoed and is again placed in the class of the finest. The church today is one of the most prosperous in the country, regardless of denomination, and has perhaps the greatest membership of any Disciples church in the county, and perhaps the greatest of any church, regardless of denomination.

WINCHESTER.—The church at Winchester was the next to be organized. Rev. I. P. Watts, one of the pioneer workers of the Disciples church and a man to whom the general public is under an everlasting obligation for his devoted life to it, has written, "Story of a Christian Church." The church referred to is the Winchester church and with the permission of Mr. Watts we here reproduce the story.

THE STORY OF A CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

"In the summer of 1866, I was admitted to the bar of the Randolph Common Pleas court. I had been a member of the Christian (Disciple) church from the age of fifteen years. Had been reared in a very strong infidel community and from the age of eighteen to twenty-one, I held many public debates with skeptics and infidels. In 1862, I went to the war and during all that time kept up my study of the Bible and the Bible I carried through the entire war is still on my desk. When admitted to the bar, I found a very strong infidel sentiment in the court-room which was very distasteful to me. One day in June, 1866, I entered into a hot discussion with Moorman Way which attracted the attention of Judge Jerre Smith, William D. Frazee and Judge J. W. Haynes. After it was over Judge Smith came to me and patted me on the shoulder and said, 'Young man, I like your spirit. What church do you belong to?' I said the Christian or Disciple church. He said, 'Why that is the church I belong to.' William D. Frazee came up just then and said, 'Young man, you did well; what church do you belong to-' I said the Christian or Disciple church, and he said, "Why, that is the church I belong to.' And I said, 'Why haven't you a Disciple church here.' The result of the interview was that Jerre Smith agreed to try to buy the old Presbyterian church on Meridian street that was then empty and without a congregation. In a few days, he saw Samuel P. Ludy, the trustee of said church, and bought the same for $400. Smith, Frazee and myself had a new roof put on the church and a bell was bought and on the 26th day of August, 1866, the Christian church was organized by Butler K. Smith and George W. Thompson.

The charter members who entered into that organization were Jerre Smith, Isaiah P. Watts, William D. Frazee, Joshua C. Moltbie, Elizabeth Moltbie, Elias Clevenger, Martha M. Watts Clevenger, Robert R. Williams, Vashti Williams, Sarpeta C. Williams, Mary Browne (wife of Gen. Tom Browne), Beulah Leake, Malinda Patty, Sarah Ireland, Minerva Shaw, and Sarah Irvin.

At this organization Jeremiah Smith, Isaiah P. Watts and William D. Frazee were by the church elected elders. Robert R. Williams and Joshua C. Moltbie were chosen as deacons. The meeting was continued for over a week and on August 27, Edmund Engle made the good confession and was immersed by Elder George W. Thompson. The church continued to grow and many are the names that were added to the church from time to time. Of the original number at the organization, all have passed away and but one is now a member of this church.

Elder Isaiah P. Watts has been an elder ever since the organization and a trustee ever since 1874. December 28, 1874, Jerre Smith died. In 1870, William D. Frazee had moved to Indianapolis, Indiana, and I. P. Watts was the only teaching elder left.

From 1866 to 1874, we had employed able ministers of the Gospel to preach for us as often as we could pay them. Those that I remember were Butler K. Smith, George W. Thompson, Barnhill Polley, Hardin Harrison, George Campbell, Henry R. Prichard, Love Jameson, Prof. R. T. Browne, Elder James Matheros, Elder Benjamin Franklin, Elder Aaron W. Moore, Elder William D. Moore,, Elder J. O. Beardsley, Elder Hugh T. Morrison, Elder J. W. Ferrell, Elder Valentine Thompson, Elder Elijah Goodwin and Elder Thomas Munnell. June 4th, 1876, the new church was dedicated. Elder J. C. Tully, of Union City, Indiana, preached the dedicatory sermon.

The history of the new church building is as follows: In 1875, Brother Jerre Smith having taken the deed to the old church in his own name and having before his death made provision in his will that the Christian church should have the building provided they pay to his estate the sum of $400 within one year after his death, it became necessary for the church to raise that amount sometime in the spring of 1875. Elder I. P. Watts met Gen.

Tom Browne on the north side of the public square and said to him: 'Tom, we have to raise money and pay for the Jerre Smith church soon or we won't have any place to meet. What will you give to help us?' Tom studied a moment and said: 'Watts, I won't give a cent to buy that old church.' My heart went clear down, and with head down, I started home when a short distance away Gen. Browne called me back to him and said: 'Watts, while I won't give a cent to buy the old church, I'll tell you what I will do. You get two men to go down and appraise the old church and I will give all they say it is worth to build a new one.' I grabbed him by the hand and said: 'Tom, you are a man after my own heart. I will give as much as you will.' We turned into a store nearby and bought a small blank book (which I have yet) and Gen. Browne wrote on the first page thereof a subscription contract to build a new church as follows: 'Thomas M. Browne, Isaiah P. Watts and Edmund Engle, trustees of the Christian church of Winchester, Indiana, propose erecting in behalf of and for the use of said church, a church building thirty-five by sixty feet; the said building to be of brick, with stone foundation, slate roof, a spire, and a neat and approved style of architecture.

'We, the undersigned, undertake and promise to pay said trustees for the uses and purposes aforesaid the sums respectively subscribed by us and set opposite our names at the following to wit: One-half of said sum when the walls of said building are erected, and the residue thereof when said building is completed.'

SUBSCRIBERS' NAMES.

I. P. Watts, $500; Edmund Engle, $500; Thomas M. Browne, $500; Cheney & Watson, $500; James Moorman, $100; A. Stone, $300; Thomas Ward, $100; Robert B. Morrow, $100; Neff Teal & Co., $100.

Those that subscribed $50 were Silas Colgrove, Judge Felix Sims, T. W. Kizer, O. Smith, Huelson & Beeson, William D. Kizer, R. A. Leavell, W. A. W. Daly, James Houser. Lee Ault. John Richardson, Simon Ramsey, L. M. Jones, Gideon Shaw. Nearly everybody in town subscribed from twenty-five dollars to ten dollars on the new church, and on June 4, 1875, when dedicated about $1,200 was subscribed besides thirteen shares in building and loan association which was carried as follows: I. P. Watts, five shares; Edmund Engle, six shares, and Mary J. Browne, two shares.

At the dedication, T. M. Browne subscribed $200; Edmund Engle, $200; Isaac Ingle, $100; E. L. Watson, $50. Those who gave $25 each at dedication were Levina Austin, Elizabeth Reinheimer, Nathan Reed, Richard Bosworth, Elizabeth Goodrich, J. W. Polly, I. P. Watts, Alex Gullet, E. L. Anderson, J. T. Shaw, and John Engle.

Those who gave $10 each were Miss Sada Houser, Lida Watts, Thomas M. Browne, Hugh T. Morrison, George W. Thompson, Edith Leslie, Thomas Hiatt, Levina Hiatt, Edmund Thomas, William Austin, John Heaston. Those who gave $5 each were C. G. Bartholomew, Hannah M. Diggs, Ehihu Mullen, H. T. Morrison, Sophia Barker, Mary Houser, Minerva Shaw, James Brown, William Miller, Naum Houser, Richmond Thornburg, Pheobe Harvey, Sarah Ireland, Mrs. J. S. Engle, Mary J. Browne, A. C. Beeson, George Browne, William McConnochy, Hugh T. Morrison, Henry V. Polly, Sister Beary, William A. Thompson, Mrs. Jonathan Houser, Mrs. Lida Thomas, Strother Brumfield, Mrs. Bennington, Mrs. E. L. Watson, Mrs. J. W. Jarnigan, James Warren, A. W. Jenkins, Martin C. Alexander, Mrs. H. T. Semans, Mrs. W. A. Thompson, Edmund Thomas, John Helton, Mrs. Lee Ault, Harrison P. Hunt, Thomas Brown, Dr. G. W. Bruce.

A. G. Campfield, who was then building the court house, was given the contract of building. Mr. J. C. Johnson, the architect of the court house, furnished Gen. Browne with the plan and specifications without charge. Edmund Engle and I. P. Watts, trustees, superintended the work. Engle did most in superintending the building; I. P. Watts did about all the soliciting and collecting after the first day. The first day Gen. Browne and I. P. Watts got $2,500 to start with. The cost of lot and building was something over $7,000. After all had been collected that was possible, I. P. Watts deeded 120 acres of land in Missouri to Mr. Campfield and $800 was credited on the church debt to him.

Until the dedication of the new church, we had never used instrumental music in the church, as a large majority of the members were at that time opposed to instruments in church worship. I had bought a very small silver-toned organ for the Sunday school and we had used it in the Sunday school for years and the young people wanted to use it in the dedicatory service. Elder Felix Sims was the only elder that had objected and I sent the girls of the church to him. He consented they might use it on that one day. They did and it was used ever after.

The first twelve or fourteen years of the church, Elder I. P. Watts preached for the church except when the elders could afford to hire some one to come and preach over Sunday. And when the church was able to have a minister half time, Brother Watts preached the other half and paid more than any one else to the man we hired and he did this willingly without any compensation except the love of the church which he always had from the time the church was organized. It had a Sunday school and for the first two years it was held at 2:30 p. m. so as not to interfere with the other schools of the town. Brother I. P. Watts was the first superintendent and filled that office for seven years and also taught a class of twenty young girls during that time. Many of them became members of the church. At first we had no music but our voices. Jerre Smith brought his flute to pitch the tunes at Sunday school. Brother Watts saw the need of some other help and bought the little silver toned organ which we carried to the new church. Brother Elder Engle was the next superintendent and was a good one and held the place for many years after we got into the new church.

From the very first the church has been in the front rank as far as sound doctrine and ability in the pulpit was considered. When able we procured the ablest men in the state to preach for us. Universalism of the Bellou type was preached and infidelity of the Ingersol type was prevalent. While in the old church Elder George W. Thompson, of the Christian church, held a four days' debate with Guthrie, of the Universalist church. It was held in the old M. E. church on account of room. It was a victory for the true faith. Afterward Elder Butler K. Smith of the Christian church, held a debate with S. P Carlton, the champion debater for the Universalists. It continued four days and was a very strong debate, but Carlton himself admitted his defeat. And many of his followers went into other churches. This debate was held in the old M. E. church. The great Infidel Underwood came here and made his (as he thought) unanswerable lecture against Christianity. Brother I. P. Watts raised $50 in two hours and sent for Professor O. A. Burgess, of Butler college. He came and his lecture was held in the City Hall. It was crowded. For two nights he went to the M. E. church on invitation and delivered three lectures each time, nine in all. The town had never before or since heard better or more eloquent lectures on the whole subject of dispute by infidels and Winchester has had a better and clearer spiritual atmosphere ever since.

It was a number of years after the new church was dedicated before the church was able to employ a minister full time. We had half time preaching by hired ministers all the time and Brother Watts the other half. Among these I recall Elder A. H. Moore, Elder Garey, Elder Vinson, Elder John Ellis. During the time Ellis was here he and Brother Watts held a meeting for four weeks, preaching turn about each night. The result was forty-five additions, thirty out of the Sunday school. After that the church had Brother Wise, of Indianapolis, for all time, Brother Chatley was first I believe, Brother Arch Hall, of Butler, Brother Dailey, Brother A. W. Hall, Brother C. E. Wells, Brother Hough, Brother Hammond, Brother James Floyd, Brother H. C. Patterson, Brother Vernon and Brother Persinger. During its existence the church has had over a thousand members and today is one of the great moral and spiritual forces in Winchester and has commenced the building of a great new church.

But, however great it becomes in the future it will never have a more faithful membership than it had in its beginning. And the story of its pioneers will always leave a sweet halo around their names. As the last of these saints of the long ago, I have written this story that though dead they are not forgotten."

Since the above article was written the church has been served by two pastors, George W. Schroeder and James W. Wilson.

The "great new church," spoken of by Mr. Watts, is one of the most beautiful edifices to be found in eastern Indiana and is a monument to the energetic membership composing this church. It was erected in 1912 and will cost when completed, approximately $30,000.00.

The building committee having it in charge was A. L. Nichols, Albert King and H. E. McNees. They were aided by the membership in particular, the public in general in the construction of this building but it has been largely through their untiring efforts that the splendid work has been done. The trustees of the church are Anderson Lesley, A. E. Ludy and I. P. Watts; the elders, I. P Watts, Isaac Poyner, A. L. Nichols, T. W. Watts, Frank Roberts, James L. Chenoweth; deacons, Anderson Lesley, H. E. McNees, Charles Tillson, John T. Beeson, Albert King, Ray Lesley and N. R. Chenoweth.

Other churches of this denomination in the county that are now in a prosperous condition are located in South Salem, Ridgeville, Parker, and Lynn.

SOUTH SALEM.

South Salem was established about 1843 and for a while was very flourishing. The house was built about 1851. The membership was not so large as formerly but the church is in a thriving condition and maintains a splendid Sabbath school. The organization at Lynn is very prosperous and one of the most vigorous churches of the county. They have a very large membership which has made it necessary to remodel the church. This they are doing during the summer of 1914. The church is being enlarged a great deal and modernized and will, when complete, be one of the most convenient churches to be found in the county.

This organization was started many years ago and has been re-inforced from the membership of some adjacent churches which were abandoned.

Their ministers have been: George Waggner, J. M. Land, Roy L. Brown, J. A. Brown, Mr. Stibben, W. M. Cunningham, M. O. Jarvis, H. F. Rector, J. L. Sharritt. The present elders are: T. M. Nichols, E. E. Ford, A. R. Hiatt, J. B. Chenoweth and Fred Horn. The present trustees are: Norman Anderson, Charles Hiatt and Edd Lipp.

RIDGEVILLE.

The organization in Ridgeville is not very flourishing numerically but is under good leadership and no doubt will continue to survive. The church at Parker was organized under the leadership of Rev. W. D. Stone of Union City in 1886.

Mr. Stone was instrumental in the organization of other churches. He was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1826 and moved to Winchester in 1839. Having a keen desire for learning he attended the county seminary at intervals from 1839 to 1847. In 1847 he enlisted in the 4th Indiana Volunteers as a private for services in the Mexican war and served for fourteen months. He has lived at various parts of the county, Harrisville, Salem, New Lisbon, Spartanburg, Winchester, Parker and Union City.

He enlisted in Company "I" of the 17th Ohio Volunteers in the war of 1861, for three months and then re-enlisted in the 118th Regiment Ohio Volunteers and was made Captain of Company "C."

Mr. Stone was an active, wide-awake and somewhat eccentric man, but very energetic and a successful educator and preacher. He was idolized by his pupils and greatly esteemed and appreciated by the churches of which he was a member. His motto was "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do with all thy might." Mr. Stone was honored by being elected representative to the state Legislature in the year 1890 and honored the state by his service there.

On his becoming a citizen of Parker his religious zeal immediately asserted itself and he proceeded to organize a church at that place. The church prospered under his guidance and is today a memorial to his excellent services there. Mr. Stone removed to Union City, where he passed his last days among those with whom he had associated for years. He was indeed one of nature's noblemen and lived a life such that any community might be proud to own him as one of her sons.

DUTCH REFORM.

This church is located at Pittsburg and was organized about 1870. This is the only church of this denomination in the county. It is a prosperous church, maintaining a good Sunday school and is live and wide-awake to the best interests of the community.

UNITED BRETHREN.

Numerically speaking, the United Brethren of this county is represented by seven churches, located at Zion, Green township; Saratoga, Ward township; Prospect, Jackson township; White River Chapel, White River township; Lynn, Washington; Mt. Pleasant, Greensfork; and Modoc, Nettle Creek.

These churches did not affect any organization in the county until about 1850, when a church was started at Antioch, in the edge of Losantville. That house ceased to be used about 1855. For twenty years they worshiped in a small house west of Jordan Holsted.

A new society was formed in Losantville in 1875, which met for a while in a public hall but afterward built a church and is in a prosperous condition. Zion, one mile south of the consolidated school house, in Green township, was started about 1860. Rev. David Gunkle preached there a number of years in a school house. The meeting house was built in 1875. The organization started with about twenty members and is today one of the strongest of that denomination in the county. The church has recently been remodeled and is now a modern, up-to-date structure. The denomination in Jackson township has its church at Prospect, east of Pittsburg. The congregation is not large, but is full of interest.

White River chapel was formed about 1865, and their church was built in 1872. For several years they held their meetings in the old Concord church, but each society concluded it was best to have a house to itself and two houses were built.

Mt. Pleasant (Pin Hook) is located in Greensfork township. The Disciples first used the school house in this neighborhood and preached there for a while, but formed no organization. As early as 1866 the Friends started a mission school, which proved to be large and full of interest, numbering from sixty to one hundred and twenty. This was kept up for three years, when a preacher of the United Brethren church held a meeting there and formed a society of that order. At first they held their meetings in the school house, but later built a church near the school house by remodeling an old house. They are today in a fairly prosperous state.

Churches at Lynn and Modoc are not very large but are able to make themselves felt in the community where they are. One of the most, if not the most, prosperous church of this denomination is located at Saratoga.

The United Brethren church, like all other great churches, has had its internal dissensions and conditions which have resulted in division of the church. This denomination, in about 1894, divided upon the question of secret orders, the "Radicals" believing that secret orders were inimical to the best interests of the church. The "Liberals," believing that secret orders should be permissible, at least, and should be left to the discretion of the individual member. The dissension reached its climax when a suit was brought about to control the property of the church. This resulted in the courts deciding in favor of the "Liberals," and the property in most cases was given into their care. The matter seems to be amicably adjusted so far as the churches of this county are concerned, and but very little is heard concerning the old difficulty.

UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, SARATOGA, INDIANA.

The history of the United Brethren church in Saratoga dates from its organization in 1871 in the school house under the pastorate of Rev. A. Douglass and was a part of the Auglaize annual conference. The charter members were Sarah Lollar, William Fraze, Nancy Fraze, Elisha D. Lollar, Mary A. Lollar, Joseph W. Lollar and Sarepta Lollar. Two years later, in 1873, under the pastorate of S. T. Mahan, a church building thirty-six by fifty feet was erected. It was dedicated in July, 1873, Rev. Milton Wright, of Dayton, Ohio, officiating. The society enjoyed a steady growth, and in 1893, under the pastorate of Rev. J. I. Kline, the church was rebuilt and enlarged to accommodate the growing congregation. The improvements consisted of a Sunday school room, vestibule and tower, veneered with brick and covered with slate. By the Act of the General Conference in 1901 Saratoga was made a part of White River Annual Conference.

In 1908, under the pastorate of Rev. A. C. Wilmore, the church was again enlarged to meet the needs of the increasing Sunday school and church membership. This extension consisted of an addition fifteen by forty-seven feet with basement. An up-to-date steam heating plant was installed. This addition provided a large choir loft, primary room and choir vestibule.

The reopening services were conducted by Bishop H. H. Fout, Dayton, Ohio. The church membership at present is 319. J. B. Sarff is the superintendent of the Sunday school, which is the largest in the history of the church.

Following is a list of pastors and time: S. T. Mahan, 1871-1873; D. J. Schenck, 1873-1875; J. W. Nickodemus, 1875-1877; W. H. Ogle, 1877-1879; Jacob Cost, 1879-1881; J. C. Montgomery, 1881-1882; T. M. Harvey, 1882-1884; R. Moore, 1884-1886; G. H. Bonnel, 1886-1887; E. M. Counsellor, 1887-1888; W. H. Shepherd, 1888-1890; J. W. Lower, 1890-1891; R. W. Wilgus, 1891-1892; J. I. Kline, 1892-1894; W. L. Waldo, 1894-1897; Elias Counsellor, 1897-1899; A. Kissell, 1899-1901; D. W. Zartman, 1901-1904; E. H. Pontius, 1904-1907; M. R. Myer, 1907-1908; A. C. Wilmore, 1908-1910; W. A. Settle, 1910-1912; G. H. Barker, 1912, and is on his second year's pastorate. At the present time Rev. Barker and the trustees are making plans for a new parsonage, with all modern conveniences, which will be built this summer.

CONGREGATIONAL.

Winchester—About 1870 a church of this order was formed at Winchester, embracing a small number of members. Measures were taken looking for permanent occupancy of the field, and subscription was raised for a meeting house, a lot purchased, and a preacher engaged. The movement, however, seemed not to succeed, and, though the organization may never have been formally dissolved, the building never was built.

Occasionally Rev. L. P. Rose, Congregational Home Missionary agent for the state of Indiana, would conduct religious services in Winchester during his visits to that place.

Rev. J. G. Brice, clergyman and missionary, resided for many years at Winchester, preaching and lecturing and making collections for missionary purposes over portions of Indiana and Ohio. Members of this church have lived in various parts of the county, but, for the most part, have united with some other denomination. The Rev. Brice attempted to establish a church at Buena Vista in 1846, but with no success. The only church of that denomination is the Ridgeville Congregational church.

RIDGEVILLE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

This church was organized April 12, 1892, by an ecclesiastical council composed of Rev. E. D. Curtis, president, Indianapolis, Indiana; Rev. J. W. Wilson, scribe, Indianapolis, Indiana; Rev. J. S. Ainslee, Fort Wayne, Indiana; Rev. T. R. Quayle, Marion, Indiana; W. F. Brunner, Indianapolis, Indiana.

. The following named persons became members of the church at its organization: Prof. C. A. Gleason, Mrs. C. A. Gleason, Miss B. A. Zelleny, Prof. William C. Kruse, Prof. C. W. Macomber, Miss Rebecca Horn, Henry Kitselman, Mrs. Henry Kitselman, Miss Nina Kitselman, Joseph Lay, Mrs. Joseph Lay, Mrs. Gertrude Sumption, Nelson B. Hiatt, Mrs. Nelson B. Hiatt, Miss Irma Hiatt, Samuel C. Lay, Mrs. Samuel C. Lay, Miss Minnie Studabaker, John McFarland, Sr., Mrs. John McFarland, Sr.

About the time of the organization of the Ridgeville Congregational church, the Ridgeville College was taken over from the Baptist denomination by the Congregationalists. Rev. C. A. Gleason was the first pastor of the church, as well as the first president of Ridgeville College under Congregational management.

The church was legally incorporated December 10, 1900. The services of the church were held in the chapel hall of the college building until the present church building was erected in 1903. The first service in the new building was held on January 31, 1904. The present membership of the church is eighty-eight. The pastor at the present time (1914) is Clifford G. Thompson A. B., B. D. The board of trustees is composed of J. E. Rickert, president; J. E. McFarland, Ross W. Boswell; George P. Newton, treasurer, and D. G. Hiester, clerk. Congregationalism is not strong in this part of the state, the Ridgeville church being the only one of that denomination ever organized in the county.

PRESBYTERIAN.

Many of the early settlers of the county were Presbyterians, although there were enough of them in any community to justify the organization of a church. Meetings were frequently held in the residences of Presbyterians, but that was as far as the movement was ever carried up until at least 1835. The early Presbyterian settlers were to be found west and south of Winchester and west and south of Union City. The first named locality was in and around Sampletown, just east of where the Lincoln school building now stands.

The pioneer of this movement was Adam McPherson. Mr. McPherson was of Scotch extraction and was very devoted to the Presbyterian church. Mr. McPherson contemplated the building of a church; in fact, had gone so far as to dedicate a portion of the lot as a cemetery. Within a few weeks of the time of which he expected to begin the church death came to him suddenly by an accident, and the movement was dropped. Others of the same community adhering to this belief were Robison McIntyre, Maxville; Mr. Jenkins, south of Sampletown, and Henry D. Huffman, south of Sampletown. There was, however, as we stated before, no church erected in this community.

The community southeast of Union City, near Salem, had a very similar experience about 1835. A New School Presbyterian society was begun in that neighborhood. They held services in the school house and in private residences for some time, but no building was erected and but little came of the movement.

Pleasant Ridge.—Pleasant Ridge (two miles south of Buena Vista) was formed November 28, 1842, at a school house near Mr. Hogeland's, one mile north of Huntsville, Indiana. There were eighteen members, as follows: Jacob B. Kepler and wife, John Starbuck and wife, Cyrus Starbuck and wife, John Shearer and wife, James Shearer and wife, John Jenkins and wife, Isaac Hogeland and wife, Parker Jewett and wife, Joseph C. Kepler, Patience Smith. Jacob B. Kepler, John Shearer, John Jenkins were chosen ruling elders. Between 1842 and 1849, inclusive, twenty-six members were received, making a total of forty-four members. The church, however, did not continue, but about 1852 it ceased to be active, and has become wholly extinct. A log meeting house (very good for the time) was built by the church at the beginning of their existence, about 1842. A graveyard also was established, the first burial in which was in 1842. The preachers at different times were Revs. J. G. Brice, E. R. Johnson, I. N. Taylor, Thomas Spencer and Andrew Loose.

This church has long since gone down and no church organization of any kind is to be found in that community.

Buena Vista.—A meeting-house was built some years after the Pleasant Ridge church was erected, but an attempt was made to form a Congregational church from the members of the Presbyterian church. As a result of the effort, all failed, and the meeting-house at Buena Vista has been for many years occupied as a barn by Robert Starbuck, on whose land it is situated.

The only Presbyterian churches located in the county today are at Winchester and Union City.

Winchester.—A New School Presbyterian church was formed there about 1842 by Rev. J. G. Brice. Some of the chief members were Samuel Ludy, James Brown, Esq., and Mr. Morrison. They maintained services for twelve or fourteen years, and, in 1853, undertook the erection of a meeting-house, under the pastorate of Rev. R. Irwin, which, however, they could not finish. The building stood across the street from the present Methodist Episcopal church. Their preachers have been Revs. Brice, Spencer and Loose. About 1854 an Old School Presbyterian church was formed. Some of the members were Dr. Craig, Dr. Ferguson and others. There were some dozen members at first, and after a time the number had increased to forty. Several of the New School members joined also. In 1857 the new organization bought the unfinished house, and, completing the same, used it for purposes of worship. The preachers were Messrs. Holliday, McCullock, Chapman and Campbell. This organization prospered reasonably for some years. About 1865 several prominent members removed—Dr. Ferguson, to Union City; Judge Brown, to Minnesota, etc., and, in 1868, the church was dissolved by direction of Presbytery, and their meeting-house passed into the hands of the Disciples church. This building now stands on Main streeet and is known as the Alexander meat market.

The old Scotch theory, that once a Presbyterian always a Presbyterian, had been thoroughly drilled into the hearts and minds of the adherents of the above church.

It remained for Mrs. Clara Commons to organize a Union Sunday school which should gather together the adherents of various denominations not having a church, and in Winchester they met in a room over the Farmers and Merchants Bank and organized this school, with George Best as superintendent of the school. It was very prosperous and aroused a great deal of interest among the people. This movement led into a broader movement of the church. Those having no church home, led by the Rev. McCaslin, held meetings in the city hall for quite a while.

The question of a new organization began to be talked. The possibility of a new church being organized whereby the local members would have a home of their own soon crystalized into a definite movement. In October, 1881, seventeen adherents to the Presbyterian faith in and about Winchester petitioned the presbytery of Muncie, then in session at Tipton, Indiana, to organize a church in Winchester. These petitioners were Carrie M. Bruce, Harriett N. Neff, Clara R. Connors, Mary A. Ludy, Mary A. Cheney, Lizzie A. Goodrich, Jane G. Edgar, Mrs. W. S. Montgomery, Kittie Nichols, Deborah Miller, W. S. Montgomery, Mabel Montgomery, Flora Wilmore, George B. Best and Anna Best, who, with Henry Miller and Paul P. Ludy, became charter members of the church.

The presbytery granted the petition and delegated Rev. David S. McCaslin and Rev. Andrew Loose and an elder whose name is not mentioned in the minutes, to organize the church. They met in the Methodist church in Winchester in December of that year and listened to a sermon preached by the Rev. McCaslin.

It was thought by some that it would not be best to organize another church in the body of the church of a different denomination. Consequently the meeting adjourned to the residence of John Neff and organized by electing Samuel P. Ludy, formerly an elder, as ruling elder. In March, 1882, John Neff, John J. Cheney and George W. Bruce were elected as the trustees. The meetings were held in Snedeker's hall until 1885, when they moved to the Odd Fellows Hall, where they remained until they moved across the street west from the present edifice. From the first the society was very enthusiastic and enjoyed a constant growth of membership. It was soon apparent that a new church must be erected to meet the needs of the increasing congregation. To this end the splendid church which now stands was built at a cost of thirty thousand dollars in the year 1907. The church at this time is one of the leading churches of the city and enjoys the distinction of having the largest class of men in Sunday school in the county. This class is under the guidance of James P. Goodrich, who is one of the leading supporters of the church.

The ministers of this church have been Rev. McDonald, from September, 1882, to March, 1883; Rev. C. T. White, of Portland, to February, 1884; W. H. Sands, of Union City, to March, 1887; J. B. Fowler, to March of 1895; John Wilson, to March of 1900; E. E. Plannette, to February, 1902; C. I. Truby, to May, 1909; Robert Little, to March, 1913; the present minister being Gustave Papperman. The present board of trustees consist of John Thomas, John R. Engle, P. E. Goodrich, B. F. Hinshaw and Wilbur Hiatt.

Union City.—Was first organized in the house of Martin Cox, Washington township, Darke county, Ohio, by Rev. Isaac Ogden, presiding missionary, November 8, 1835, with six members. The ministers have been Revs. Gulick, Ogden, Meeks, Campbell, Drake, Lower, Eastman, Coulter, Ziegler. Mr. Drake was pastor seven years, and received into the church 167 persons. The greatest number of addition in any one year (1851) was thirty-eight. The church was changed to Union City in 1862. The first meeting-house was a log building near Martin Cox's, now used as a woodhouse at Cox's school house. The next house was what is now the German Reformed (brick) church at Hill Grove, Darke county, Ohio. The first services in Union City were held at the Methodist church. The greatest number of members at any one time before the removal to Union City was fifty-seven. Six years after the removal, there were but forty. The greatest number at one time was 127. The church built a meeting-house on Union street, south of Oak, in 1863, and occupied it till about Christmas, 1879, at which time they dedicated their new, tasteful and elegant edifice on Howard, north of Oak; cost, $1,200.

One of the characteristics of the Presbyterian church is to have a strong ministry. Union City has been no exception to this rule, and the present excellent condition of the church is due in a great measure to the strength of these pastors. Those having had charge of the church are: Messrs. Coulter, Zeigler, Adair, Hott, Gorby, McDonald, Elliott, McDonald (returned), George T. Gunter, Charles S. Pier, J. H. Miller, Mr. Zuck and Orvil J. Hutchinson.

THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH.

The Evangelical Association is one of the oldest church organizations in the United States. It was in the 183—'s when the first members of this church settled in Winchester and vicinity. As they were many years without a church edifice, they assembled in their homes with the pastor as he came from time to time. No obstacles seemed too great to surmount; no revival service or prayer meeting was too distant to attend. Mr. G. G. Keller, an old and well-known resident of Winchester, an early member of the church, to whom the writer of this sketch is much indebted for an interesting account of its work, told how great numbers traveled for miles in wagons, sleds or on horseback on any kind of roads and in all sorts of weather to attend big camp meetings at various places in Wayne, Jay and other neighboring counties.

The number of adherents to this denomination gradually increased so that they were able to construct a church home in Winchester in the year 1864. This church soon became the property of the Indiana Conference of the Evangelical Association and was recognized by being given its support and regularly appointed ministers. Although this church is not now existing, it was served, together with the Zion Evangelical church four miles west of Ridgeville and the Greenville Evangelical church, for many years by a strong Christan ministry.

It might be said that the early members of the Evangelical church were mostly German. A number of such prominent German families that settled west of Ridgeville in what was then known as Emmettsville, began the work by building a church at that place in 1879. This church, although a country charge with only an average membership, has had a prosperous career, having been instrumental in sending a number into the Christian ministry and into other useful fields of labor. By the year 1908 so many of the strong supporters of this class had moved to Ridgeville that it was deemed advisable to organize a society at that place. So the members residing at both places united their means and purchased the Baptist church at Ridgeville. Since the dedication of this edifice, in February, 1908, the society has enjoyed prosperous years. The membership increased remarkably from the outset. The Sunday school has been particularly strong and spirited.

Such is a brief review of the work of the Evangelical church of Randolph county. May her adherents, although few in comparison with those of other denominations in the county, be loyal to her in all things so that she may bear a Gospel message to the communities in which she is located.

THE CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN.

Ever since the decline of primitive Christianity in the early age of the church, God has had a people who protested against the departures from the usages of the apostolic church. The Brethren come in this line of succession, and the movement which resulted in their closer organization grew out of the great religious awakening which occurred in Germany during the closing years of the seventeenth century, when large numbers, becoming dissatisfied with the lack of spirituality in the State church, withdrew from its communion and met together for the worship of God. They were called Separatists, and among them were to be found such men as Jacob Philip Spenner, Herman Francke, Earnest Christian Hochman, Alexander Mack, and many other earnest, pious men whose names have become historical. The Separatists were bitterly persecuted by the Reformed and Catholic churches and were driven from place to place until finally Count Cassimir, of Witgenstein, opened a place of refuge for the persecuted brethren in his province. Here, in the village of Schwartzau, Alexander Mack and others, similarly minded, met together to read and study God's word, and as a result of their study, the church was organized, taking the name of "Dunkers," with Alexander Mack as its first minister. This was in 1708. The name was given them by their enemies, who called them "Dunkers" because of their mode of baptism. The infant church increased in numbers rapidly, but even in Witgenstein their peace was soon disturbed, and the hand of persecution was laid heavily upon them. In 1718 Alexander Mack formed the acquaintance of William Penn, who was at that time very much interested in his colony in the new world, and invited him and his brethren to settle in Pennsylvania, and the invitation was gladly accepted.

In 1719 they commenced to emigrate to America, and in less than ten years the entire church found itself quietly settled in the vicinity of Germantown and Philadelphia. After arriving in the New World they went by the name of "The German Baptist Brethren" until the year 1906, when they were incorporated under the name of "The Church of the Brethren."

They, today, have flourishing congregations in most of the states of the Union. At the general conference held at Winona, Indiana, in 1913, forty states were represented by delegates, or letter and six foreign countries.

The local organization of the Church of the Brethren, known as the Union City congregation, was organized in 1851 with seventy-two members. The territory covered by the organization at that time consisted of the northwestern part of Darke county, Ohio, the southwestern part of Mercer county, Ohio, the southeastern part of Jay county, Indiana, and the northeastern part of Randolph county, Indiana.

The first meetings of this organization were held in the homes of its members until in 1870, when the first church house was built, one and one-half miles north of Union City, Indiana, on the State line, on the Joel Noffsinger farm.

In 1875 the church territory was divided and the "Bear Creek" congregation was organized on the northwest and a church house was built near Portland, Indiana. In 1891 the territory of the Union City congregation was again divided and the "Pleasant Valley" congregation was organized in the northeastern part of the territory and another church house was built near Lightsville, Ohio. Again, in 1893, a third division was made and the "Poplar Grove" congregation was organized on the south and a church house erected near Hill Grove, Ohio.

The first residing elder of the congregation was Thomas B. Wenrick, who was elected to fill this position in 1865. He continued in this office until his death, in 1884. W. K. Simmons was soon after chosen elder and served in this capacity until 1912, when B. F. Sharp was selected as the elder and continues as such at the present time. Michael Deeter, David Flory and Aaron Simmons were the first trustees of the church, elected in 1868. The present trustees are George Netzley, E. M. Scholl and John D. Hay.

The present ministers are W. K. Simmons, Ezra Noffsinger, W. P. Noffsinger and Oliver Royer. The latter has charge of the church in Union City, Ohio.

The position of the Church of the Brethren on church doctrine is set out very briefly as follows:

1. They believe the present collection of the books and epistles, composing the New Testament volume, to be the last and perfect will of God, and as such, they believe the whole of the New Testament to be essential to salvation.

2. They hold that all the authors of the New Testament books and epistles were inspired, and that it is exceedingly dangerous to reject any one of them as spurious or untrue (Matt. 7:26, 27).

3. They regard repentance as a complete turning away from everything sinful,—including everything vain and worldly,—and turning toward God, setting their affections on things above (Col. 3:2).

4. They baptize by trine immersion (28:19), while the candidate is kneeling, employing the forward posture in imitation of the baptism of suffering. They regard this baptism as for the remission of sins and as a condition of the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38; Matt. 3:16).

5. They wash one another's feet, as a religious rite, regarding Christ's example and teaching as being too plain to admit of their doing anything less (John 13:4-15).

6. They regard the Lord's Supper as a sacred meal, to be eaten in the evening of the day, in imitation of the Savior's example the evening before the Jews' Passover feast began (John 13-1).

7. They take the communion of the bread and wine in connection with the Lord's Supper, as they believe Jesus instituted it.

8. They anoint their sick with oil, upon their request, as a condition upon which the Lord will bless the sick (James 5:14-16).

9. They teach a complete separation from the world.

10. They are opposed to going to war, and hold that to take human life is wrong and adhere strictly to the principles of non-resistance (5:21-22).

11. They are opposed to going to law with one another, but settle their differences in the assembly of the church by arbitration.

These are a few of the most important principles as advocated by the Church of the Brethren. They are gradually getting away from a number of customs practiced by the early fathers of the church, and are getting closer to the real meaning of Christ's teaching while here upon earth.

Another church of this denomination was established two miles north of Saratoga but has now ceased to exist. They also have had a branch two miles west of Winchester, but no church organization has been perfected at this place.

BAPTIST.

The baptists have not been very numerous in Randolph county although there have been some from the very earliest days of the settlement of the county. Curtis Clenney, of Lynn; W. C. Wilmore and John James, of Greensfork; Thomas Maulsby, of Nettle creek; Mr. Cartwright, of Spartanburg; Bela Cropper, West River; Ezra Stone, Winchester. James Spray, Edward Scott and others have been prominent Baptists and some religious work has been done in this county by that worthy body of Christians.

Messrs. Wilmore and Cropper were enthusiastic ministers and labored earnestly for the promotiton of that doctrine, but were unable to receive any very great degree of success. There have been churches at Little Creek and Losantville, Nettle Creek township; Winchester, and Middletown, in Jackson township. The churches at Losantville and Little Creek have been greatly disturbed by questions of "Means and Anti-Means."

Huntsville.—The Baptists used to have meetings at Bela W. Cropper's and Samuel Spray's, not far from Huntsville. They never had a church or any society in that neighborhood. B. W. Cropper was a preacher and did religious work in that region; but no church was ever founded there, so far as we have been able to learn.

Losantville.—This society was organized many years ago, and had a more or less vigorous and successful existence, but was eventually abandoned for lack of membership.

Providence.—(Regular) Rose Hill, Ohio and Middletown, east of Saratoga.

This society was formed in Ohio about 1840, and began to hold services near Middletown in 1860. They never had a meeting-house. Their gatherings have been held chiefly at dwelling-houses. Their meetings take place once a month, at Middletown and Rose Hill—every third meeting at the former place, at Mr. Hinkle's on Saturday, and at the Christian church, at Middletown, on Sunday. The first members at Middletown were Richard and Eliza Straight, Henry and Eliza Ann Hinkle, Mahlon and Rachel Peters, Silas and Mary Byrom, John Peters, David and Eliza Byrom, Rachel (wife of George) Debolt.

The preachers have been Revs. Mahlon Peters, John McDaniels, Seymour Craig, John Peters, George Cottrell and others. Mr. Cottrell ministered to the church for more than fifteen years past.

Winchester.—About 1840, a Baptist church was organized for Winchester and the region. The meetings were held, at first, at John Lykins', five miles south of Winchester; afterward, at Winchester, and still later, at Willis Wilmore's, south of Winchester. The society continued for a considerable time, but the members died or moved away, and the church finally ceased. The first members were Bela Cropper and wife, James Spray, Edwin Poor and wife, George Vandeburg and wife, Ezra Stone, Willis C. Wilmore and wife, Edward Scott and wife. Afterward, Thomas Loring and wife joined the society and probably others may have done so. The church never had a meeting-house. At Winchester the services were held at the court-house; elsewhere, at private dwellings. The society never grew very much. The deacons were brethren Stone and Cropper. The church was a friendly band, no difficulty ever arising to mar its peace. Prayer-meetings were held, from house to house, with sweet seasons of Christian love and high hope and foretaste of endless bliss in the mansions above. In Winchester, they assisted in maintaining a union Sunday school for several years.

Some of the preachers were Revs. Nathaniel Case and James Harvey. Willis C. Wilmore was for nearly, or quite, fifty years (1882) a preacher among the Baptists, and an active and zealous Christian withal. Ezra Stone was a fine Christian gentleman who was much esteemed and greatly beloved. Edward Scott lived east of Winchester; his wife dying November, 1880; eighty-four years old. He had died years before that time.

Spartanburg.—Hezekiah Cartwright was a Baptist residing near that town, and preaching by the ministers of that order, took place at his house. We have heard of no other Baptists in that region, though there may have been such. No church of the kind, so far as known, was ever formed in that vicinity.

West River.—William Smith and his wife, father and mother, of Hon. Jere Smith, were Baptists and were members and regular attendants of the Friends church, south of them, in Wayne county.

Little Creek.—The only church of this denomination, active at this time, is the one at Little Creek. This society was established some time before, 1843, near the residence of one of its chief members, Thomas Maulsby. This church was divided upon the question of "Means and Anti-Means" which as we understood it virtually meant Sunday school or not Sunday school. The church remained "Anti-Means" and does not support a Sunday school at this time. The membership had decreased to about twenty-six, in 1913, when another division occurred in the church over the question of whether musical instruments should be used in the church. The membership divided equally, thirteen leaving and thirteen remaining. Meetings are conducted each month upon the fourth Saturday and Sunday. Rev. Vergal Eagen is the minister. The trustees being Harvey Crouse and M. V. Maulsby.

Free-Will Baptist Church—Ridgeville and vicinity.—There was a society at Father Mendenhall's, on the river, as long ago as 1860, or earlier. They began to hold worship at Ridgeville about 1868. The society has no meeting-houses in the town, the college chapel being occupied for meeting purposes. At Father Mendenhall's was a hewed log church, which, however, has not been used since the society began at Ridgeville. Some of the members have been Robert Sumption, Pennel Mendenhall, John Collier (Rev.), Mahlon Sumption, William Hollowell, Egbert Payne (Rev), Cunningham, John Thurber, Allen Baker, Dr. Farquhar, William Reed (Prof.), Asa Pierce (Rev), and their wives. The church, at Ridgeville, numbered at first thirty to eighty members.

This church was conducted in connection with the college, which denomination had established in Ridgeville in 1867. They were unable to make a success of the school and after having disposed of it to the Congregationalists, in 1892, found it necessary to abandon their church, also, and the church building was sold to the German Evangelical church. Some of their preachers were Messers. Collier, Atkinson, Bates, Davis, Pierce, Vaughn and Harrison. During the winter of 1880-81 meetings of this denomination were held at Stone Station and about forty were converted and a church was formed, embracing twenty-five members, i. e.; Thomas Clark and wife, George Spera and wife, David Reitenour and wife, Mrs. Ross and daughter, and two sons, Mrs. Owens and family, Samuel Ross and wife and James Jefferson and wife. They met in the Clark school house with Rev. Asa Pierce as their minister. The enterprise was abandoned before a church was built.

The Protestant Methodists have never had any very large societies in the county. About 1837 they established a preaching place, near Deerfield, but were never able to affect a permanent organization. The only one in the county at this time is at Hopewell, north of Farmland.

The society was organized some time before 1845 by Rev. Jonathan Flood, a pioneer of his denomination. They built their first church in 1853, which stood as it was built until a few years ago, when it was remodeled and made modern in every respect. This church has a splendid Sunday school, in connection with it, and while it is the only one of this denomination in the county is strong enough to make its influence felt.

The Wesleyans formerly had a church at Sparrow Creek, northeast of Buena Vista, but this denomination was never able to survive.

CHURCH OF GOD.

This organization first sprung up in recent years under various titles of Holiness Band and other various names. There are two churches in the county, one in Jackson township and the other the center of Ward township, east of Deerfield.

SPIRITUALISTS.

Unionsport.—These people have held meetings at times at Mr. Lamb's and at Josiah Mendenhall's. Some years ago they held two or three grove meetings on the lands of John Lewis, near Unionsport. They have no settled organization, at the place, but several persons in the vicinity are inclined to that faith and think they have evidence that their friends, who died years ago, have appeared to them in material form, have spoken and in other ways have proven their actual bodily existence. Spiritualism has found some adherents in past years, in Winchester, but at present the number is quite small and there is no organization.

HOLINESS BAND.

At different times, in the history of the county, sects have arisen, having as a special doctrine, "Holiness" For the most part these bands have consisted of people of other denominations believing in two states of Christian experiences—the lower and the higher estate. The first is commonly attained at conversion and the second is an advanced state brought about by special blessing.

The principal center of organized bands has been in and around Farmland. An organization of this character has been in existence for a number of years, with Hamilton Pursley as its leader. The membership has never been large. Their meetings consist, for the most part, of open air meetings, held upon the streets of surrounding towns.

METHODISTS.

The first churches to be held in the limits of Randolph county were held by Methodists, in the cabin of Ephraim Bowen, by the Rev. Mr. Holman, of Louisville, Kentucky. This was probably as early as 1814-15.

The first meeting held was in 1815, in the same cabin, and was addressed by Stephen Williams, a local preacher.

The first marriage ceremony performed in the county was performed February 2, 1819, by Rev. John Gibson, a Methodist preacher.

It was characteristic of the Methodist church to send out traveling ministers, or missionaries, to the farthest frontier.

They had a plan of holding meetings peculiar to themselves, for the lack of room or proper house in which to hold meetings, they resorted to camp meetings, or grove meetings, as they were sometimes called. These camp meetings were held in various parts of the county, some of which grew to gigantic proportions. People would take their families and attend these meetings for a week or two, or sometimes a month, at a time. They were a source of great spiritual awakening and reached the pioneer in a way that no other kind of meeting could have done. People met for spiritual up-lift, sincere in their purposes and enthusiastic in their desires to better humanity. Thousands of people, at times, would be called together with this purpose in view.

Some of the principal places of these meetings have been Spartanburg, Greensfork township; west of Fairview, in the edge of Delaware county; Mt. Zion, White River township; Union Chapel, West River township; Ritenour's, Ward township; Union City fair grounds; Winchester fair grounds; Arba, Greensfork township; Windsor, Stoney Creek township; Ridgeville; Shiloh, north of Farmland, and Chenoweth's Grove, near Bartonia.

People would go for miles and miles to attend these meetings; many no doubt for curiosity, but the spirit of the Lord was there in power and brought many a haughty blasphemer to the foot of the cross.

Of our devoted minister and his camp meeting we well might say:

> "Truth from his lips prevail'd with double sway,
> And fools who came to scoff remain'd to pray."

But as the country became more thickly settled and churches dotted the country here and there the needs of the camp meeting became less and less, degenerated into but feeble echoes of the old time gatherings of the leafy woods.

"Mischief is there in abundance, but the off-setting, wrestling, conquering, converting, new creating Holy Ghost power is all too seldom seen in modern days."

The old Methodist church, like that of other denominations, has given way to that of the new. The old-fashioned "shouting Methodists" is seen and heard but seldom, in this day. The minister no longer "lines his hymns" with the command of "Sing brother, sing." No longer does the leader "pitch the tune", with his pitch pipe. The music of today may have more harmony and balance, but under no condition can it exceed the old-time song, with its fervor and spirit of devotion, to the cause of establishing the kingdom of the Master.

The policy of the Methodist church, in sending out its ministers to "hold meetings" and travel from place to place, preaching as they went, to those who care to hear, was the means of establishing many churches throughout the land. "Wherever civilization was found, there was a Methodist preacher, also, proclaiming the word of God.

Many of the country churches have been abandoned, owing to the lack of membership. With better roads and transportatiton, the centers became larger and larger and have in many instances been established in towns. Among the places in the county so abandoned are: Huntsville school house, where a class existed for twenty years or more; at Lebanon, between Huntsville and Winchester, on the Huntsville pike; Beech Grove school house, just west of Wood's Station; Mt. Pleasant, in West River township, on the boundary one mile north of the Wayne county line. A log church was built there in 1838 and a new building erected in 1865; the church has since been abandoned. This is the church home of Rev. John Grubb, one of the most forceful pioneer ministers of the county.

Pittsburg.—Meetings were held here at the home of James Porter for a great many years. A log church was built south of Pittsburg, at Walnut Corner, and a frame church built in 1860, but was soon abandoned.

Pleasant Grove.—(Two miles north of Spartanburg.) This church was built in 1847 and abandoned about 1860.

Pleasant Hill.—(One and three-fourth miles north of Farmland.) The class was formed in 1858; the building built in 1860 and was abandoned about 1875.

Prospect.—(East of Deerfield, Ward township.) There was an early preaching place near this house. The circuit-rider used to make Riley Marshall's, who was the grandfather of Gov. Marshall, one of his points away back at the beginning of things. Mr. Marshall came about 1821, and the time of the commencement of preaching dates back nearly to that day. The meeting-house was built about 1845. It has been used until within a few years, and this neighborhood has been, since the first settlement, an important point to the Methodists. But the house had become so out of repair that it was scarcely fit for use, and, Saratoga, having grown up as an active center of business, the new church was built there; and "Prospect meeting-house" stands, neglected and forsaken, besides the ancient cemetery, one of the oldest in the county, "where the rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep," a sad memorial of the melancholy changes that come over the face of human affairs as the ages roll. The cemetery is still in use, and will probably continue so.

Ritenour's.—(One mile west of Deerfield.) A class was formed at this joint, probably about 1820. It was organized by Mr. George Ritenour, who had joined the Methodist church when a boy, in Virginia, and who settled on the Mississinewa before 1820. Class was held in his house and other houses of the neighborhood for about fifteen years. A log house was built in 1836; this house was abandoned about 1838 and remained standing for almost fifty years afterwards. Ritenour's class, cemetery and church were the first of the Methodist denomination on the Mississinewa river. This was at one time a great place for camp meetings. This was one of the most famous churches of its time, and hundreds met here "To hear the sermon delivered in the power of the Spirit, to the eager, spell-bound assemblers, thronged within and around that once sacred shrine. Scores and hundreds of fervent worshippers flocked, for miles and miles, through the grand old woods, along the dim blind trails, or with no track at all, on horseback or on foot, to reach the sanctuary and join in the shouts of praise and the sacred hallelujahs that made the echoes ring."

Salem.—(One mile east of Modoc.) This church was built in 1838 and went down about 1855. This church was organized by John Grubb, of whom we have spoken elsewhere. The class of this church moved their membership to Concord meeting-house, which was built about that time, and which is now abandoned.

Stuebenville.—(In the center of Green township.) The Methodists built a church at this place about 1845 but it was not finished and was never dedicated to religious purposes.

Vinegar Hill or Mt. Pleasant.—(Both west of old Snow Hill.) These were at one time missions but did not survive.

Unionsport.—This church was built about 1868 but has been abandoned in recent years.

There have been no doubt other places where Methodists have had classes, as they were to be found in every nook and corner.

Spartanburg.—Methodist preaching began in Greensfork township the earliest in the county. The first preaching was by Rev. William Holman, of Louisville, Ky., at the house of Ephraim Bowen, probably in 1815, and a meeting for worship and exhortation was held at the same place by Stephen Williams, local preacher, not very far from the same time. A class was formed soon after, and preaching was held and class conducted at Ephraim Bowen's and at Squire Bowen's and James C. Bowen's for thirty years or more. About 1830 William McKim settled at Spartanburg, and preachers from the Ohio Conference established meetings at Mr. McKim's. Some years later, about 1837, a meeting-house was built at Spartanburg, on a lot given for the purpose by Mr. McKim, who laid out the town. This house stood until 1857, when a new church was erected by the Methodists, which, having been remodeled, is occupied by them at the present time.

Some of the early preachers were Revs. Holman, Williams, Lawrence, Beck, Hull, Bruce, John L. Smith, Richmond, Bradbury, Burns, Swazy, Hollingsworth, Cooper, Wright, Sublett. Some of the later preachers have been Newton, Thomas, Curtiss, Bicknell, Cain. Spartanburg and the region used to be famous for religious activity. At one time the class was so large that the house would be filled and two leaders would conduct class at the same time on opposite sides of the room. Camp meetings were held, and extensive revivals took place, bringing great numbers to a profession of Christ.

Mt. Zion.—(Southeast of Winchester, near William Kennedy's.) Preaching began in this vicinity very early, when only paths and trails traced their winding way among the forest trees. Mr. Kennedy was an ardent Methodist, and the preachers soon found him out, and his cabin was the circuit-rider's home for many years. His wife and himself used to go on horseback through the woods, to near Richmond, and to Ritenour's church, between Ridgeville and Deerfield, in those ancient days. Probably a pole cabin answered the purposes of worship, after having met in the dwellings of brethren Kennedy, Lucus, etc.

A log church was built in about 1836, which answered the desired end till 1868, at which time a new building was erected. This building was remodeled into a neat and tasteful edifice in 1912.

Some of the pioneer members of the Methodist class, in those times, when the men and women gathered among the forests for worship, and not for show, were as follows: William Kennedy and wife, John M. Lucas and wife, David North and wife, Tyndall and wife, Pierce Hollingsworth and wife (local preacher), William Hollingsworth and wife (local preacher), Stephen Williams and wife (local preacher), Nathan Butts, John R. Philips, Henry Tisor. The early preachers cannot now be given. Some of the later ones have been Revs. Stout, Cooper, Jenkins, Newman, Newton, Thomas, Butts, Cain.

Mt. Zion has been an important station from the beginning. Much of the time a Sunday school has been in operation.

Maxville.—One of the oldest churches in the county at this time is at Maxville, six miles west of Winchester. Meetings were held at John Sumwalt's, and a class was organized about 1821 or 1822. Several other preaching points were established not far from the same time—George Ritenour's, on the Mississinewa; William Kennedy's (Mt. Zion, southeast of Winchester) etc. Mr. Kennedy belonged first to the class at Ritenour's and attended class there, he and his wife going on horseback through the woods eight miles though preaching was held also at Kennedy's cabin.

Another nucleus of Methodism was among the Hunts, in West River, "Old Billy Hunt" being a preacher for fifty years or more. Some of the early preachers were Messrs. Richard Brandreth, Wood, John S. Smith, John H. Hull, 1837; Ansel Beach, 1838; Francis Carey, William Dickerson, Colbreth Hall (married "Old Billy Hunt's" daughter), William Hunt, etc., etc. Membership—There were but few members of the class at Sumwalt's for ten or fifteen years—John Sumwalt, one and a half miles south of Maxville; Godfrey Sumwalt, at Sampletown Cross Roads; Jacob Sumwalt, who lived in the vicinity; Walter Ruble and his wife; Caleb Odle, Mrs. Tarlton Moorman and others.

The church at Maxville was first built in 1838, near the mill, a frame. The house was burned, supposed to have been done by an incendiary in 1847. The house, just now, 1914, being abandoned was built about 1856. Early members at Maxville, besides the ones named: Robinson McIntyre, who had been a Presbyterian, but who became an active Methodist; Henry D. Huffman, also a Presbyterian, but an efficient worker; Alexander McIntyre, John McIntyre, Mrs. McIntyre (widow of John McIntyre), Charles Schultz (local preacher), Stephen Moorman, Rudolph Good, David Addington, Simeon Brickley, etc.

A beautiful new church is now being built just east of the cemetery. Maxville is on the Farmland circuit.

Windsor.—About 1830 Rev. Robert Burns, from Wayne county, came to the region, preaching the gospel. He established a class at Abram Clevenger's. Members have been (in early times), besides others, Randolph Smullen and wife, William Moore and wife, Bezaleel Hunt and wife, Jonathan Fryer and wife.

Preaching was held at times at Fryer's, and at Hunt's also. A hewed-log church was built at Windsor, in 1839, and in 1859 a frame, which stands yet, but has been remodeled. Windsor is on the Parker circuit.

New Dayton.—There was preaching as early as 1837, at the very first settlement of the region. The first Sunday school in the region was organized by Rev. J. G. Brice.

The meetings were held at a school house, near Isaiah Milner's, on the present pike from Olive Branch to Stone Station. A class was organized at an early day and the services were held at various places—at Mrs. Helms' and elsewhere. It has been, on the whole, a good, substantial class, dwindling sometimes, and given up two or three times, by the conference; but it would not stay "dropped", and still struggled on, determined to live. In 1877, a tasteful and convenient church was erected near the cemetery, and the class feel well repaid for the conflict they have endured for nearly eighty years.

Some of the members have been James Addington (exhorter) and wife, Isaiah Milner and wife, Simon Lighty (exhorter) and wife, Eli Hiatt and wife, Jesse Addington and wife, L. W. Sherman and wife, Mrs. Pardon Sherman, Hannah Rose, etc.

Some of the former preachers are Messrs. Barrett, Lank, Heustis, Harbour, Bradshaw; Brice (Congregational), Pierce, Newton, Spellman, Ockerman, Elijah Harbour, etc. New Dayton is on the Deerfield circuit.

Deerfield.—The class was formed about 1837. The meetings were held at first in a log school house, east of town, then at Perry Field's, for some years, then in a log school house, half a mile south of Perry Field's, and in other places also. The church at Deerfield has been built about sixty-two years. Some of the early members were Anthony Ritenour, Perry Fields, Caleb Odle, William Odle, Ephraim Collins (exhorter), William B. Fields (exhorter).

Some of the former preachers for Ritenour's, Prospect and Deerfield have been Revs. Burns, Bartlett, Hall, Bradshaw, Bradbury, Kent, Campbell, Newton, Herrick, Ramsey, Blake, Kerwood, Madden, Harrison. Some of the older members were Fletcher Barrett, David Harker, John Garwin, Perry Fields, Willis Whipple, Isaac Thomson.

Union (Chapel).—(West of Carlos.) Preaching began in this neighborhood nearly ninety-two years ago, being held at Christian Edmonds' and Thomas Phillips', who came in 1821. Rev. John Strange, famous in the history of pioneer Methodism, was among the first preachers. Rev. William Hunt also labored in this region.

There was first a log church, built as early as 1830, or sooner. A frame church was erected in 1862, and the present meeting-house was built in 1881.

The circuit in early times used to be Huntsville, Economy, Union Chapel, Bloomingsport, Hopewell, Spartanburg, Mt. Zion and Mt. Pleasant (old Snow Hill), which shows the enormous task the pioneer minister had to perform. Christian Edmonds donated the lot for the church.

The members, some of them, were Christian Edmonds, Isaiah Rogers, Hugh Botkins, Peter Botkins, Jesse Cox, Joseph Rogers, Daniel Worth and others. Some of the preachers have been Messrs. Strange, Beck, Fairchild, Swank, Ansel Beach, Moses Hall, Bruce, Hull, Smith, Caney, Burns, Hunt, Lank (senior and junior), Farnsworth, Kelso, Medsker, Morrison, Meck, Mark, Smith, Barnes, Spellman, Strite, Phillips, Roberts, Bowen, Canann, Pierce, Newton, James, Johnson, Rammel, Smith, Anderson, Kerwood, Cain, Harbor, Huestis. Union is on the Modoc circuit.

Fairview.—The Methodists began to hold services at the first settlement of the region. Rev. Elijah Harbour moved in very early, and he was a local preacher, and did much toward planting religion in that part of the county. Preaching was held at Nathan Godwin's, near Fairview; at Mr. Pendry's, in Delaware county; and at John Booth's, in Jay county. A log church was built in Fairview about 1839, and a frame house in 1849, which is standing yet, having been remodeled in 1874.

Some of the early members were Nathan Godwin, Bennet King, John King, James McProud, John Life, Elijah Harbour, (Rev.) Caleb Manor (Jay county), John Booth (Jay county), William Richardson, with their wives. Some of the preachers were: Messrs. Harbour, Ackerman, Bradbury, Brandshaw, Bowers, Leech, Sales, Smith, Hall, Bruce, Barrett.

Lynn.—The Methodists began at Hopewell, in Wayne county, very early one mile south of Mr. Curtis Clenney's. Mrs. Shoemaker (daughter of Curtis Clenney, who came to near Lynn about 1815) joined the Hopewell class in 1831.

In 1844 preaching was established at Mr. John Moody's, southeast of Lynn, and a class was formed, and the meetings were held in dwellings for many years. About 1850, or possibly sooner, the Methodists had preaching in a log-house on the Freestone farm. The Methodist church at Lynn was built about 1855, but has since been remodeled.

Some of the members of the class at Mr. Moody's were John Peele and wife, John Moody and wife, Elijah Benson and wife, Elizabeth Shoemaker, Mrs. Elizabeth Benson. Some of the members at Lynn were Pierce Hollingsworth (local preacher), John Peele and wife, John Clenny and wife.

Some of the oldest preachers: Messrs. Burns, Cooper, Stout, Smith, Bradford, Wright and many others. There have been great revivals in connection with the Lynn work. At one meeting 150 members joined. In 1861 a powerful awakening occurred, the meeting lasting a month.

It was not very long, however, until the work of the church declined very rapidly and was eventually abandoned as a preaching point. It was afterward put into a mission circuit. The work finally became self-supporting. It was not very long after this until again the interests in the church became so weak that no regular meetings were held, but the spirit of Methodism in Lynn was not dead. The class in recent years has been prosperous and now enjoys a very progressive career.

Bartonia.—A class was established there (at Mr. Bailey's) about 1848, and a meeting-house was built about 1850. Edward Barton was class leader. Some of the members have been Edward Barton, James Bailey, William Shockney, James Jackson, William A. Macy, Ephraim L. Bowen, Chenoweth; William Locke, Manning, Manning, Spencer and their wives.

Some of the early preachers have been Messrs. Stout, Hollingsworth, Wright, Hull, Black and others. Mr. Chenoweth, during his lifetime, prepared a grove upon his land for the holding of meetings, and in the summer time religious services were often held there. The Bartonia class is in a prosperous condition, being one of the strongest country churches in the county.

Huntsville.—(Modoc Circuit). The first settler of Huntsville was Mr. William Hunt, who came there some time previous to 1825. Mr. Hunt donated land for a church and cemetery. The church was built in the center of what is now known as the "old cemetery." It was used for church and school purposes.

Locust Grove.—(Formerly called Thornburg Chapel, Stoney Creek township, north of Neff.) Preaching began in the neighborhood in 1840, by Rev. William Bradbury. Meetings were held at Abram Clevenger's and elsewhere—sometimes in the woods, again in an old store building put up by Jonathan Clevenger, then in an old log house on the western part of William Hewitt's farm, etc. The church was built in 1857, and it is standing yet.

About 1850 and onward camp-meetings were held yearly for several years, and great power was manifested, and also great results achieved through the divine mercy. Rev. Morrison was one of those on the work in those days. The meetings were orderly and impressive and convincing. They were continued many days. People moved to the grounds and dwelt in the tents erected for the purpose during the continuance of the meeting, and gave up their souls to the power of truth and to the enjoyment of religion. Some of the early preachers were Messrs. Bradbury, Leech, Smith, Stout, Morrison, etc. Among the first members were Joseph Hewitt and wife, Randolph Smullen and wife, George A. Carmian and wife, etc.

John A. Grubbs, Isaiah Rogers, Kerwood and William Howell often came and exercised their gifts of exhortation among the people. The church used to have grand and gracious seasons in former days.

Another church was built about 1850, this being succeeded by another structure about 1879. This has been very much improved and modified in recent years until it is now a thoroughly modern structure.

The class at Huntsville was not very large because of the nearness of other churches, one of which was Pleasant View, one and one-half miles north and the other Lebanon, about two miles northeast. This class finally gave way, strengthening the class at Huntsville. Some of the leading members have been John A. Hunt, George Howell, Elizabeth Hunt and sons, Edward Butler and wife, William Butler and wife, Ackerell Lamb and wife, Joshua Campbell and wife, John T. Harris and wife. Some of the early preachers were Rhodes, Wones, Harvey, Wolverton, Bowen and Peck.

The class is a very prosperous one, being the largest on the circuit.

Rehobeth.—(Farmland Circuit). (Four miles northwest of Farmland.) The church was built about 1853, but was removed and the present one erected in 1881. Some of the older members were Abram Hammer, John Craig, Alfred McCamy, Jacob Windermaker, John Windermaker, Joseph Hammer, Jacob Simmons, George Morris, Stephen Wiley, Cooper Morris, Richard Horner, George Keever, Adam Keever, John Adams, David Morris and others.

Ridgeville.—The Methodists began to hold services about 1856, first at Mr. Renbarger's, then at a school house in Ridgeville, as also on the Dilly farm, two miles northwest of Ridgeville, and at Robert Collier's, northeast of the town. Class was held and services were established eighty-five or ninety years ago at Ritenour's, as elsewhere related.

Members in the region have been: George E. Thomson and wife, Benjamin Lewallyn and wife, Abram Renbarger and wife, George Ritenour and wife, William Munden and wife, Obadiah Hall and wife, James Odle and wife, Caleb Odle and wife, Robert Starbuck and wife, William J. Shoemaker and wife, Mr. Wysong and wife, Arthur McKew and wife, Hannah Ward, Mrs. Ann Addington, George Gagner and wife.

Some of the early preachers have been: Messrs. Sell, Pierce, Herrick, McDaniel, Wayman, Metz, Harrison, etc. The church at this time is one of the most active and vigorous churches in the county.

Farmland.—A class was formed some time before 1866. The Christians were more numerous. Both meetings were held in the school house at first, but, in 1868 or 1869, the Methodists built a church, and gradually increased in numbers and influence until gaining a prominent standing. Among the members in 1866 were John S. McIntyre, Samuel McIntyre, William R. Oliver, Charles Wall, Mr. Kelley (preacher returned to Virginia). Some of the members since that time have been John A. Moorman, (Rev.) Elias Holliday, John H. Denton, Lewis A. Gable, James S. Davis, M. W. Diggs, S. C. Grimes, K. L. Mull, etc.

Some of the older preachers have been Moses Marks, W. R. Jordan, McMahan, J. H. Peyton, Roberts, McKegg, J. W. Lowry, Jackson, Spellman, A. J. Lewellen, Charles Bacon. The present church was built about 1897 and is indicative of the prosperous condition of the class.

Parker.—The first Methodist church established in Parker was early in the fifties, perhaps in 1852. Church was held in various residences of the members, and ministers held meetings occasionally but no permanent organization was affected until about 1870. In 1872 they built a church and were at that time a part of the Windsor conference. The building has been remodeled twice; the latter time being almost completely rebuilt, and the church is now in a very prosperous condition. Some of the early members of the church were James Cecil, Ezra Cecil, Ephraim Cecil, Peter Deal, John Morris, J. L. Miller, Henry Knapp, Messrs. Daugherty and Friddle.

Saratoga.—This class was started about 1881 and was made up of members from the old Prospect and some off the east part of the Deerfield circuit. The church was built that year and was one of the most up-to-date churches of the entire country. It has been very prosperous and now enjoys an excellent membership.

Modoc.—With the organization of the town of Modoc naturally came the organization of the church. The Methodists were very strong in that community and proceeded to organize the church about 1885. The membership came from the nearby churches, principally Salem, one mile east; a few, however, came from a church at Losantville.

Losantville.—(Hagerstown Circuit.) This church was organized in the old town of Losantville, but moved to the new town upon the organization of New Losantville. The class has prospered since its organization and has, from the start, been one of the leading classes of the Hagerstown circuit.

Grace Chapel.—(Barrax Corner, Nettle Creek township.) The last class to be organized in the county was Grace chapel, in 1895. After a big revival had been held in the community many of the Methodists decided to organize a class, which they did by a special dispensation from the conference and procured land from John Lamb and built a very neat church. This class is small, but what is lacks in numbers is made up in interest.

Winchester.—It is almost impossible to state with any degree of accuracy when Methodism began in Winchester, but it is safe to presume that their meetings were held here very soon after the organization of the town, 1818. Their first house was built some time before 1839, as we have record of a temperance meeting having been held January 1, 1839, "at the Methodist meeting-house in the town of Winchester, Randolph county, Indiana." This house stood on Main street, almost directly east of where the Methodist church now stands. They received deed to a lot on Meridian street in 1853. The trustees at that time were W. H. Fitzgerald, Jehiel Hull, John H. Cottom, William Allen and William Gorsuch. A small brick church was built at that time. It was dedicated with appropriate services October 2, 1859. Winchester was at that time a station attached to the Muncie district, later on it was attached to the Richmond district and remains there until this time.

For many years Methodist meetings were held in the court-house. The itinerant preacher would come once a month and hold a two-days' meeting. Revival services were also held in the court-house. The first quarterly meeting connected with Winchester as a station was held June 4, 1859. At that time S. Lamb was the presiding elder and John S. Peyton, pastor of the church. This small church became inadequate for the accommodation of the rapidly growing class, and it became necessary to build a new one. This was done ——, when a very large and commodious church was erected. This church was destroyed by fire in 1899, at which time the church now standing was built.

The Winchester station is considered one of the most desirable stations in the conference, and has been fortunate in the high efficiency of the pastors sent to it. The pastors have been Messrs. Peyton, Mack, Stout, Rhodes, C.

P. Wright, Walker, Smith, Mendenhall, Miller, Teague, Kisler, Tobey, Pierce, Kemp, Spellman, Carlin, Herrick, Lewellan, Walsh, King, Powell, Norris, Preston and Morris.

Union City.—This class was organized by Rev. Colclazer, of the Deerfield circuit, in 1852, the first year of the existence of the town. The first class was composed of Henry Debolt, wife and sister, R. T. Wheatley and wife and Mrs. Elizabeth Livengood. They were soon joined by J. T. Farson, local preacher, and wife, and S. L. Carter and wife. Services were first held at the home of Henry Debolt. This was at that time called the "Bee Line Boarding Car." It afterward became Hawkins warehouse, then Scanlin's hall, then White's warehouse, which afterward was destroyed by fire. This class was small and was on the Deerfield circuit from 1852 to 1859.

At times it seemed that the organization would be compelled to disband, but by persistent effort it was made a missionary station in 1859, and remained as such about six years. They built their first church of brick on Columbia street, north of Oak, in 1858 and 1859. They remained in this house ten years, when a new church was erected on the southwest corner of Oak and Plum streets. It was only partially completed at the time, the congregation not being financially able to continue with the work. The class grew in strength and interest, until 1880 the house was completed at a cost of $18,000.00.

The occasion of the dedication upon the completion of the church was one of great interest. The auditorium was crowded to its limit. One person, in speaking of the exercises that day, said: "The raising of the funds needed to complete the payment for the house was interesting and almost dramatic."

That year, 1880, was an important one in the history of the church, as the Indiana annual conference was held in it that year. This conference was comprised of some four hundred members, lay and clerical, and was unusually well attended. The spirit of the entire church membership of all churches of Union City was shown in the excellent manner by which this great throng of people were cared for during the session, which lasted more than one week. During this same year a revival of unusual interest was held. It lasted for several weeks, and scores of new members were added to the class. The church was at that time one of the finest in this part of the state and seemingly was commodious and modern enough to accommodate the class for years and years to come. "The old must give way to the new," in Methodist churches as well as all other institutions. The Union City church was no exception, and in 1912 the present massive stone structure was erected.

The first board of trustees were: S. L. Carter, R. T. Wheatley, Henry Debolt, C. Saxton and J. T. Farson. The ministers have been: Colclazer, Newton, Stout, Blake, Mendenhall, Templin, Rhodes, Sparkes, Greenman, Simpson, Lynch, Barnes Vigus, Mack, Greenman (returned).

WINCHESTER MISSION CHURCH.

Feeling the need of a church in the northeast part of Winchester, a number of devoted citizens of the community organized a Mission church. The prime mover of this organization was George W. Veal, and to him great credit is due for the erection of a neat little church located in Beech Grove.

Ministers of various denominations preach in it, and a very successful Sunday school is also conducted there.

It is a church that meets the needs of the community and does a great deal of good.

The Sunday school was organized in 1853, with Rev. J. T. Farson superintendent. There were twenty-five pupils at that time and the sessions were held in the "Bee Line Boarding Car."

TRUE WESLEYANS.

This denomination arose in the United States, chiefly by a secession from the Methodist Episcopal church, about 1842. The movement sprang from several causes—opposition to slavery, secret societies and Episcopal power. And these three principles were declared in the new society, Anti-Slavery, Anti-Secretism, Anti-Episcopacy. The movement sprang rapidly through the country and became for a time strong and vigorous. The denomination began in this region at Newport (Fountain City), Wayne county, Indiana, in 1843, in the form of a quarterly meeting held there by ministers and lay members who were ready for the movement. As a result of that conference, the denomination took its rise in Randolph and Wayne counties, and several classes were formed. In Randolph county, at Sparrow Creek, at White Chapel, in West River township, and at Clayton's, five miles west of Winchester. In fact, most of the veterans of that anti-slavery conflict are no longer among the living. Some of the younger soldiers in that struggle still answer the "roll call" of duty, but, as to the elder heroes in that fierce contest, their arms were long since laid aside; their mortal frames rest sweetly in the friendly dust, and their souls have gone to the mansions above. Their work is done; victory is gained, slavery is fallen—"is fallen," amid the happy shouts of an emancipated and enfranchised race.

ST. MARY'S CHURCH.

The Catholic church, at Union City, was begun in 1854; Rev. Sheon, of Sidney, was pastor one year. Rev. Hemsteger, from Piqua, came in 1855. Rev. Clane came next and established a chapel on the farm of Mr. Weis, two miles from town. Rev. Hemsteger came again and stayed four years. Rev. Shelhammer, from Greenville, then came, remaining until 1862. Rev. McMahon was next, until 1865. During his pastorship a church was built, on Plum street, north of Oak street, frame, and about 1870 a large bell was added. Rev. Lamour was pastor from 1867 to 1870. Rev. Von Schwedler, 1870 to 1871. Rev. Noll, 1871 to 1875. Rev. Jeremiah Quinlan succeeded, who was pastor until 1890, when he was succeeded by Rev. F. A. King. The congregation was thriving and prosperous, with a property of four lots, a church, a parsonage, nunnery and a schoolhouse; as also a cemetery, out of town, two miles north of the Salem pike. St. Mary's school was taught by sisters of the Holy Cross and was attended by 100 pupils. A flourishing day school has been maintained for many years, by the Catholics which has been, for a considerable time, free to all comers, through the munificence of Peter Kuntz, lumber dealer in Union City, and a member of the Catholic congregation.

The congregation, in 1890, was worshiping in a substantial, but unpretentious and wholly inadequate edifice, and Father King's first thought was to provide a fairer and properly commodious house of worship for his people. There was only about $1,200 in the church treasury, but this apparent lack of material funds did not deter the earnest pastor, and it was not long until his efforts towards the enlargement of his parish were rewarded by the assurance of a fund sufficient to guarantee the completion of the work he had in mind. In 1891 the corner-stone, of the new church, was laid, with imposing ceremonies, the Rt. Rev. Joseph Brammer officiating. On February 12, 1895—proud day for St. Mary's parish—the new church, splendid and complete, was dedicated to the service of God, the dedicatory services being presided over by Bishop Chatard. This new church cost nearly $25,000 and so well had its finances been managed that the congregation was practically out of debt. The church is well-finished and stands a substantial local monument to the zeal of good Father King and the earnestness of his parishioners.

With its passing, as a place of worship, the old church did not lose its usefulness, however, as it is now constantly occupied as a place of meeting of the several auxiliary societies of St. Mary's. In this old structure are held the meetings of the Catholic benevolent society, of the Catholic benevolent legion and of the Catholic knights of St. John. Father King was succeeded by Fathers Berne, Durham and Baker.

St. Mary's cemetery is a beautiful spot of consecrated ground, containing five acres and the pride of the parish is mainfested in keeping it in faultless order.

In addition to the duties as pastor of St. Mary's, Rev. Baker is charged with the spiritual directions of the adjacent mission, at Winchester. This is an interesting and growing mission, full of promise. The church building is a frame, was built in 1882 by Rev. J. H. Quinlan and cost $600.

COLORED CHURCHES.

The county has had five colored churches within its borders; two of which are now active. One at Union City and one north of Modoc.

Of the three that have been abandoned, one was located in the colored settlement near the Union Literary Institute; the second at Snow Hill, and the third north of Modoc. The colored churches have never had very large congregations because the county has never had very many colored people within its borders.

There are no doubt some churches in the county not mentioned in the foregoing article.

Randolph county has been a county of churches; one of the greatest branches of which has been and is the Sunday school. More people have been brought into the church through the door of the Sunday school than by any other means. This recognized truth has led practically all churches to pay especial attention to the Sunday school, and to make it as efficient as possible.

The county has many Sunday schools, as follows:

CHAPTER XI.

CIVIC AND BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

The essential basis of most secret orders is to bring together men of every sect and opinion and to establish friendship among those who might otherwise remain at perpetual distance. These organizations give their membership a broader idea of, and a greater field for, practicing the principles of charity, benevolence, love, truth, hope, fidelity, patriotism, friendship, etc.

Many of them have also incorporated in their tenets the dispersal of benefits to the sick and distressed and to the relief of the widow and orphan. These institutions have thousands of members, each obligated to work for the betterment of society and the elevation of their fellowmen. We have sought information from the various lodges of the county, but in many cases have received no response. It shall be our endeavor to give the lodges of each society in the order of their institution, and should any lodge not be mentioned it will be because no data has been received from it.

UNDERGROUND RAILROAD.

[The following is taken from Tucker's History.]

The Underground Railroad, so-called, was put into operation and found many helpers and sympathizers throughout the county. The case of the Wilkerson slave girls, in the year 1839, was a most remarkable one, arousing great excitement and eliciting much sympathy from Anti-slavery men, and much condemnation by pro-slavery adherents and opponents of abolition. We give below a copy of the complaint filed in the case. Mr. Springfield doubtless thought he was greatly robbed and terribly wronged by the escape and loss of those two girls, valued by him at $1,200. The other party, on the other hand, reckoned themselves to be doing service to God and humanity by aiding these poor fugitives in their attempt to escape from bondage.

We give the complaint in full as a memento of the condition of our common country years ago.

Randolph County, Circuit Court, April Term, 1839—Trespass—Damages Laid, $1,200.

State of Indiana, Randolph County, ss.

Thomas Springfield, Plaintiff, vs. Alexander Williams, Robert Scott, Milly Wilkerson, Martin Scott, William Wood, Samuel Green, Willborn Wilkerson, Matthew Chavis, Benjamin Outland, Defendants.

Thomas Springfield, a resident citizen of the State of Tennessee, in the United States of America, complains of the defendants named aforesaid, being in custody, etc., on a plea of trespass, to-wit:

That the plaintiff was heretofore, to-wit, on the 26th day of January, 1839, and for a long time before and still is, the true and lawful owner of two negro women—Susan and Margaret—of great value, to-wit, of the value of $1,200, and duly entitled to claim property and service in the said negro women, by and under the laws of the State of Tennessee. And, whereas, the said negro women had, before the day last aforesaid, escaped from the plaintiff to whom they owed service as aforesaid, and had come into the county of Randolph aforesaid, without the consent of the plaintiff. And, whereas, the plaintiff had sent to the county of Randolph a duly qualified agent, with authority to arrest said negro women, and take them back to the State of Tennessee aforesaid, yet the defendants, well knowing the premises, and that the said negro women were the property of the said plaintiff, and owed to him labor and service under the law of Tennessee, afterward, to-wit, on the 26th day of January, 1839, with force and arms, at the county of Randolph aforesaid, did unlawfully, knowingly, forcibly and wilfully conceal and harbor and entice away said negro women, and did then and there forcibly, unlawfully, knowingly and wilfully, after due notice as aforesaid, that they were the plaintiff's property, conceal, command and assist the said negro women to make their escape, and to elude the lawful pursuit of the plaintiff for the said negro women. By means whereof, the said negro women, the property of the said plaintiff, escaped from him, the said plaintiff, and went to parts unknown, and have become wholly lost to the plaintiff; and other wrongs then and there did to the plaintiff serious harm and damage, contrary to the statute and against the peace of the State, and to the damage of the plaintiff of $1,200, and therefore he asks, etc.

ELKINS & PERRY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

The case was contested for a time, Moorman Way and Samuel W. Parker being the attorneys for the defendants. The case was never brought to final trial, however. It was abandoned at last by the plaintiff, enraged, no doubt, by the determined opposition he encountered from the Abolitionists, and convinced of the uselessness of further contest, and the hopelessness of any attempt either to recover his slaves or to get redress for loss of their persons and their services. Such occurrences, of course, greatly provoked slaveholders and those who were not Abolitionists, but those who belonged to that despised but determined band felt a necessity laid upon them to fight slavery in every possible manner to the bitter end. They felt in their inmost souls that "man is worth more than laws," and that the liberty of an oppressed but innocent race was an object worthy of the utmost activity and determination.

The citizens of this county may well be thankful that the institution of human slavery, which made such occurrences possible, is forever numbered among the things that have been but are not.

There were various routes, more or less frequented, extending across the county. Knots of Anti-slavery men would be found here and there, even among a general pro-slavery population. One remarkable group was to be found in Jackson township. Rev. Thomas Wiley, of New Lisbon, Milton Beach and Mr. Chandler, near Allensville, and perhaps others there, were active Abolitionists in the midst of a hostile community. Mr. Wiley, as a bold and fearless reformer, denounced slavery and the black laws, and declared he would never obey them. The Democrats, to test his sincerity, elected him to office, but he was true to his declarations and his convictions, and refused to qualify, paying the penalty instead required by the law. Mr. Chandler was elected to some other office by the Democrats for the same reason, but he, too, refused.

The separation among the Friends, caused for a time much sorrow of heart, and much alienation; but time and the abolition of slavery have brought about a reconciliation, and most of those who had belonged to Anti-slavery Friends went back to the body. Some of them were Jehu Hiatt, Dr. Beverly, Job and Joab Thornburg, Daniel Hill, William Peacock, John A. Moorman, Solomon Wright, Ebenezer Tucker, Martin A. Reeder and doubtless several others. As a result, the great body of the people of Randolph county became imbued with Anti-slavery sentiments. Prominent among the movement, in Anti-slavery in Randolph county may be reckoned the establishment, in 1846, of the Union Literary Institute, in Greensfork township, northeast of Spartanburg, near the Ohio line, in the Greenville colored settlement. An account of the school may be found in the chapter on Education. The influence of the institution was good in several ways in the elevation as to intelligence and morality of the people of color, in softening down the prejudice against color (since the school was always attended by some, and often by many whites), in standing as a steady and faithful protest against the foolish and cruel policy of ostracising any class of citizens, especially on account of color or race.

It is an interesting fact that Hiram Mendenhall, the gentleman who presented the famous petition to Henry Clay at Richmond, Indiana, on the occasion of his visit to that place, was a resident of Unionsport, Randolph county.

Another movement against slavery carried on in this region was the Free Labor Movement. Most Anti-slavery Friends held it wrong to use the products of slave labor; and they set on foot an enterprise to encourage free labor cotton and sugar to establish free labor gins and sugar houses, and agencies to buy and sell free labor products.

Several stores were established in the region, and it is an interesting reminiscence that at the sale of the personal estate of Moorman Way, Esq., in October, 1881, a considerable quantity of goods left on hand from his old free labor store was offered.

William Steele is thought by some to have been the founder of what is called the Underground Railroad. He was a Scotchman, and second cousin to W. E. Gladstone, prime minister of England. He was born at Biggar, on the Clyde, in Scotland, in 1809, and came to America in 1818. He resided first at Winchester, Virginia, then at Barnesville, Belmont county, Ohio, ten years, and then at Woodfield, Monroe county, Ohio, thirty years. He moved afterward to Kansas, and still again to Oregon in 1872. Mr. Steele died in 1880, in Oregon. He was a pioneer in Anti-slavery with Benjamin Lundy. Lundy was a saddler at St. Clairsville, Ohio, and had accumulated several thousand dollars at his trade. He called a meeting at his house in St. Clairsville in 1815, and five or six persons attended, forming at that time what they called the Union Humane Society, declaring war upon slavery.

It is a wonderful thing, and yet supposed to be a fact, that no slave was ever taken from the hands of the agents of the Underground Railroad. Mr. Steele lived to see the work of the Underground Railroad accomplished, and the business of the company quietly and honorably brought to an end by the war of the rebellion and the emancipation proclamation, through which, according to the word of Scripture, a nation was born in a day.

RUNAWAYS.

For unknown ages slaves have run away. David had a runaway slave in his camp before he was made King of Israel. Onesimus ran away from Philemon in Paul's time—i. e., some say so, while others will have it that Onesimus was Philemon's brother "according to the flesh." The Seminoles in Florida were mingled with runaways from Georgia.

"Oppression maketh a wise man mad;" what, then, will it not do upon a poor woe-begone slave? Some fifty or sixty years ago people in the Northern states began to help fugitive slaves to escape from servitude. Gradually the work grew into a system, as shown in the biography of William Steele, above written. Stations were agreed on, routes arranged, signals adopted, conductors appointed and the operation of the affair became quite regular and business-like. The secrecy with which the work was carried on made people call it the Underground Railroad. On some routes great numbers passed. Abolitionists, of course, were the chief actors, though others and even pro-slavery men and slaveholders themselves sometimes assisted more or less. Few runaways were captured and very few Abolitionists were ever convicted for helping slaves off.

We give a few incidents below, showing somewhat the nature of the work. A colored fugitive was staying at Daniel Worth's, in West River township. One day, as the colored man was in the house fondling the baby, pursuers came after him. Daniel was near the door outside, and talked loud. Mrs. Worth, hearing them, said, "Who are they?" The negro, looking out, knew his master, and, dropping the child, "lit out" through the back window for the "fallen timber," a half mile away. They saw him and gave chase, but he got to the timber, and to find him there was worse than to find a needle in a hay mow. He was safe. They were greatly enraged, and offered Daniel Worth $100 if he would bring the slave in, but he would not. They threatened to go and bring men and clear out the whole fallen timber, and asked Daniel how far it extended. "So many miles west, and I never heard how far into Ohio," was his reply. They came back several times, but never got their man.

Alexander Davis, a large, stout man, came from Tennessee on horseback. He could write, and wrote passes for himself. Pursuers tracked him to Economy. A lad overheard their plans and gave the alarm. He was taken to Daniels Charles', Greensfork, then to Joseph Thornburg's, Cherry Grove, then to Newport, and so to Canada. On the way from Cherry Grove to Newport he met the pursuers. It was rather dark. He knew them, but they did not recognize him. After awhile he left Canada for New York City, and sent a letter saying that he was doing well.

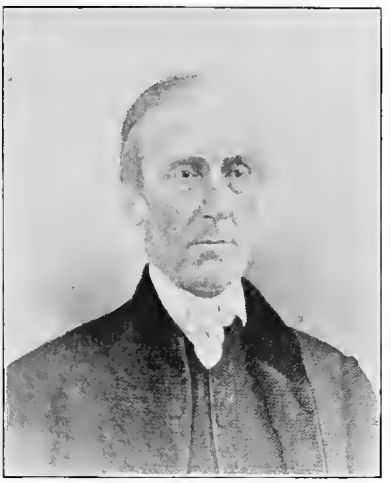
An interesting young man from Georgia once came to Economy. He was skillful, being a repairer of engines. Aaron Worth was attending school at the Union Literary Institute, and took him there, and he was forwarded to Canada. They never heard from him again.

Two brothers, Dawes, traveling, stopped at Winchester, having two slaves. They were tanners, and decided to locate there. They contracted for tanbark, etc., but were advised to go back to Kentucky and sell their slaves. They concluded to do so, and to buy hides in Cincinnati as they returned. They set out at noon, and got to Newport about dark, in a double wagon. Dr. H. followed them, got a warrant at Newport, twelve men pursued and arrested them as kidnappers, and brought them back to Newport in the night. They found the law and the temper of the people were such that conviction for kidnapping would certainly ensue, and they were persuaded to emancipate the slaves. The point was this: Owners were allowed to hold their slaves while simply passing through, but their contracting in view of settling was interpreted to be in law a location; location made the slaves free, and attempting to take them away was kidnapping. They tried to prosecute Levi Coffin for his part in the transaction, but they did not succeed.

Lewis Talbert ran away from a plantation a few miles from the Ohio river, in Kentucky, and came to the Union Literary Institute. After attending school for some months, he grew so uneasy thinking of his sisters in slavery, that he could not rest, and resolved to go and get them off to the free states. He went, stayed one day and two nights on the farm; did not see his sisters, but left them word that he had been there, and that he would come again. In three weeks he was back at the school. After awhile he went again, got his sisters, brought them to the Ohio, but for some reason one sister was afraid to cross, and the other would not come without her; so they went back, and he crossed into Ohio and came on to Newport and to the institute again. Meanwhile, he had told others how to run away, and several had left, and pursuit was made. The hunters came to Richmond, got assistance, and sixteen men came in the night on horseback to Newport. Lewis had been there, but had left. They found no fugitives. Three men started at midnight on foot to come to the institute to tell Lewis to get out of the way. They came just at daylight, and asked, "Is Lewis Talbert here?" "No; why?" "Because if he is he must make himself scarce; they are after him; sixteen men came into Newport last night and will be right up here."



LEVI COFFIN. "President" of the Underground Railroad.

"AUNT KATIE" COFFIN.

Underground Depot—(Home of Levi Coffin, Newport, Fountain City, Indiana).

Lewis had "vamoosed" already. They did not come after him, nor did they find him anywhere else. Afterward he laid his plans to visit Kentucky again. A confidant unwittingly revealed them, and his master's son came to Indianapolis, seized him, had him adjudged a slave, and took him bound to Kentucky. He said afterward, "That was just where I wished and had started to go; but I did not fancy that style." His friends supposed him done for; but in six weeks from that day he was put upon the train at Indianapolis, his black face popped in at the door of the institute. "Why, Lewis, we thought you down in New Orleans by this time." "Oh, no; I was never born to be sold down the river." He had been twice sold, and the trader had started his gang on the steamboat down the river. They let him be loose on the boat. He managed to get a chambermaid to cut the ropes of a boat behind and let him down into the river. He paddled for shore, and found himself in southern Indiana, with only shirt and pants. He was taken up by some amateur hunters, but he put a bold face on it and said he was a free negro from about Richmond, and showed a genuine note of hand, signed by Elijah Coffin, president of the State Bank, Richmond. They let him go. He afterward went to Canada and became a preacher.

SLAVE GIRLS—CABIN CREEK.

Two slave girls were brought into the Cabin creek colored settlement. They were closely tracked to the house where they were. A parley was held; a crowd had gathered; the girls were disguised with men's clothes and smuggled through the crowd, taken to John Bond's, then to Dunkirk, Cherry Grove, and to Newport, at Levi Coffin's. There they were concealed between two feather beds. The pursuers traced them there, too, but they were never taken. The girls were sent to Canada. (See fuller account elsewhere.)

A gentleman in Richmond had his house so fixed that slaves could be concealed so that, though his dwelling was searched over and over, time and again, while the hunted ones were there, still none were ever found. Even his children never knew until years afterward of that place of concealment. Once a company of fugitives were traced directly to his house; the house was watched outside while it was searched inside, and was watched for days and nights, but no discovery was made, the slaves were never found, and got safe off at last.

EMSLEY JONES' ADVENTURE.

One dark night a colored man came to Emsley Jones', an Abolitionist near Dunkirk, and told him that a runaway wished to see him. He went out, and the negro led him directly to a couple of slaveholders. "Where are those slaves?" "I cannot tell," said he. One of them struck him with a sharp knife to cut his throat, but only hit his chin. He stepped aside, and in the dark got out of their way; but they never found the slaves.

INCIDENTS TOLD BY JOHN H. BOND.

"I have known of twenty-five in one company. They came partly in a wagon, and some on foot from Newport, and were sent to Jonesboro or to Camden. I took one company of ten to Jonesboro; we had to camp out one night.

"Seventeen lodged at my house at once. The man who took them on went through to Jonesboro in one day and night. Pursuit was made. Three of us rode all night, and got to them at Jonesboro about daylight. The gang was dispersed into the woods, and were kept there three weeks before they could be got away. The pursuers got there before noon. Three men, Jack Page and two others, were the hunters. They hunted round for several days, but went off without their prey."

Gangs of fugitives used to come to the institute. At one time fifteen came in one company. It was a woman and her ten children, a son-in-law and a grandchild, and two others. The woman and children belonged to one man, and they were all he had. She was asked, "Were you not used well?" "Yes." "Why did you run away?" "My children were my master's, and the mistress and the white children wanted us to be sold, and we thought it time to quit."

Fugitives would often stop and attend school for awhile at the institute. At one time there were ten at school together.

The whole subject of the Underground Railroad is a remarkable episode in the history of this county. Many exciting occurrences, and some amusing ones as well, took place in the progress of events. At Oberlin, Ohio, at one time, some slaves were conveyed out of town toward the lake in open daylight, under a load of hay. One black man was once painted white, and rode off to a place of security in that disguise. On one occasion, a decoy wagon was sent out in advance toward Elyria from Oberlin containing some free negroes, residents of the town, some of them dressed as if they were women, knowing they would be watched and followed, as they were. At Elyria, eight miles away, the whole group was arrested. As much delay as possible was made, but in the course of two or three hours after the arrest, the fact was learned that this party was a "sell." But meanwhile the real fugitives had been taken away by another road entirely unknown to the would-be slave catchers, and got safely off to Canada.

At one time a slave woman at one of the lake ports, who had been closely pursued, was conveyed across the lake in a coffin as a corpse, being accompanied by several friends in deep mourning.

The pursuers went over to Canada on the same boat, but they never learned the ruse that had been practiced upon them. The great mass of events in connection with this movement will, of course, be lost in oblivion. A few have been rescued from the general fate, and we have made a small addition to the number for the perusal of future generations.

In addition to the excitement and separation among the Friends on account of slavery, the Methodist denomination also suffered to some extent by the "True Wesleyan" movement. For a considerable time, that body found many adherents in this region of the state, including a considerable number in Randolph county. Some account of the Wesleyans may be found in the chapter devoted to the churches, as also a statement concerning the Anti-slavery Friends in the same chapter.

Some other incidents also may be found elsewhere in these pages among the "reminiscences" contained in this volume.

It is an amusing fact that many persons really supposed that the Underground Railroad was underground. A young lady from New Hampshire once asked the writer of these sketches how the thing was managed "under the ground." "What do you mean?" rejoined he. "Why, the Underground Railroad—how did they get to it and from it?" said she. "Did you understand that it was really underground?" "Yes, of course; I never heard it called anything else." And then we had to explain to that young lady, who was really an intelligent girl, why the Underground Railroad had received that curious and expressive appellation, at which explanation the lady was greatly surprised in her turn.

WILKERSON GIRLS—SLAVE CASE.

In 1839 a peculiar case was entered in the Randolph circuit court, being a charge against several persons, colored and others, by Thomas Springfield, of Tennessee, for concealing his two female slaves, Susan and Margaret Wilkerson, and assisting them to escape.

The affair was a famous one, and made great stir at the time. Two girls by the name of Wilkerson had managed to escape from Tennessee, and had made their way to the house of their grandfather Wilkerson, residing in the colored settlement on Cabin creek, in Randolph county. They were pursued and overtaken at that place. A gang of some seventeen armed men on horseback, raised in the vicinity of Huntsville, had gathered and gone to the house where the girls were. Meanwhile, the old lady Wilkerson had armed herself with a corn knife, and, with fierce and deadly earnestness, guarded the door, threatening to cut down whoever attempted to enter. She also put her little grandson upon a horse, with a horn, with orders to ride for life, and blow the alarm as he went, which he did with a will, and the neighbors came together as if running to a house on fire. In the confusion the girls were gotten out of the back window into the woods, and so they escaped. It serves to show how blunted were the moral perceptions of men on this subject of human liberty at that time, that the slave claimant was a Methodist clergyman, and the leader of the troop of pursuing horsemen was a Baptist preacher. They doubtless, like Paul of old in his Pharisaic blindness, thought they were doing good service to God as well as to man; but thank heaven, those days of darkness are past.

The indignant declaration of brave old Massachusetts, by the prophetic lips of the gifted Whittier, has become sober fact throughout the entire national jurisdiction:

"No slave hunt in our borders,
No bloodhound on our strand;
No fetters in the Bay State,
No slave upon our land!"

ANTI-SLAVERY INCIDENTS—JOHN H. BOND.

"The Underground Railroad through Cabin Creek began about 1831. The first fugitive was brought by Thomas Frazier. Thomas rode on horseback and the slave walked. Great numbers have passed here first and last, probably hundreds of them, on foot, on horseback, and in wagons. Seventeen is the largest number that ever lodged at our house at one time. They would be brought from Newport, and be taken from here to Jonesboro, or elsewhere. I took one company of ten to Jonesboro. The trip consumed three days, and we had to camp out one night. We knew that they were coming. Word was sent from farther south to William Beard, in Union county, and by him to Levi Coffin, and from there to Cabin Creek. At one time a company that had been sent on to Michigan were pursued, and a man went all the way from Cabin Creek to Michigan on horseback to give warning. A man was once caught and taken back to Newport, but his friends there managed to rescue him.'"

"One day H. H. Way (Uncle Henry), came to me and said, 'Jesse, is thy horse in thy stable?' 'Yes.' 'Has thee a saddle and bridle, and are all in good condition? Does thee need them for a few days?' 'No, not especially.' 'Well, feed him properly, and if thee don't find him in the stable in the morning, thee need not be uneasy.' "

The horse disappeared that night, but several days afterward he was there again. H. H. Way had been up into Michigan, or somewhere, and a troop of negroes on horseback had passed through the town.

One morning, on passing by Levi Coffin's, many people were standing in the street around his door. "What is the matter? Is somebody dead?" Henry Way came out of the house and said, "Only a fresh lot of negroes come to town."

Henry H. Way was a young physician, and brought a lot of medicines along to Daniel Dawson's, whom they moved to Blue river, in the south part of the state.

Old Newport (and Levi Coffin in that town) was the head center for Underground Railroad work for this whole region. He removed to Cincinnati, and until the end of slavery was prominent in Anti-slavery labors, assisting in the escape of thousands of fleeing fugitives from bondage toward the North Star. Levi and his worthy wife died a few years ago.

GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

The Grand Army of the Republic posts are found in Union City, Lynn, Huntsville, Farmland and Ridgeville.

The Grand Army of the Republic is a patriotic organization in the United States composed of the national veterans of the Civil war. It was organized in Decatur, Illinois, April 6, 1866, by Dr. B. F. Stevenson, of Springfield, formerly surgeon of the Fourteenth Illinois Infantry. The organization grew very rapidly, and in a short time posts were established all through Indiana. It will be noticed they are named after soldiers that stood in high rank with their comrades. The main purposes of the Grand Army of the Republic and qualifications of its members are given in the sixth rule of the organization, which is as follows:

"To maintain true allegiance to the United States of America, based on a paramount respect for, and fidelity to, its constitution and laws, to discountenance whatever tends to weaken loyalty, incite to insurrection, treason, all rebellion, or in any manner impairs the efficiency and permanency of our free Constitution; and to encourage the spread of universal liberty, equal rights and justice to all men. Soldiers and sailors of the United States army, navy, or the relief corps, who served between April 12, 1861, and April 9, 1865, in the war for the suppression of the Rebellion, and those having been honorably discharged therefrom after such service, and of such state regiments as were called in to active service and subject to the orders of the United States general officers between the dates mentioned, shall be eligible to membership in the Grand Army of the Republic. No person shall be eligible to membership who has at any time bore arms against the United States."

Randolph county was a fruitful field for such an organization, as it has so many thousands of men who have been in the Civil war. For a great many years this organization took charge of the Memorial services, and in that manner paid tribute to their fallen comrades. That duty and respect, however, has been left to their sons and daughters, who have an organization of their own which will be spoken of later.

The posts, as found in Randolph county at this time, are as follows:

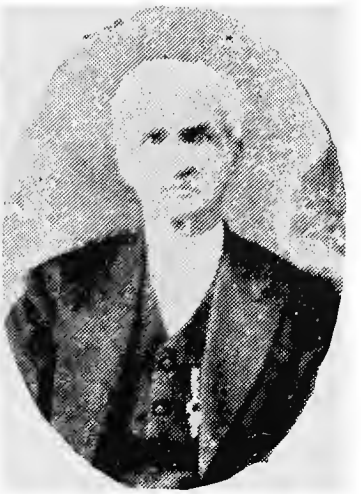
SONS OF VETERANS.

Early in 1886 Elmer G. Walker, then provisional commander for the Sons of Veterans of Indiana, the order not having yet been established in this state, wrote to the Grand Army of the Republic posts of the city of Winchester, asking them to organize a camp of Sons of Veterans here. A committee was appointed and in a short time had a charter application filled and sent in. The application was approved and returned, and on July 7, 1886, Andrew J. Stakebake, the commander of the Grand Army of the Republic post, instituted the camp and sent in his report. On the 21st of July the camp was chartered under the name of Sherman Camp No. 44, Indiana Division Sons of Veterans, United States of America. In 1891 the name was changed to William T. Sherman Camp, the name originally intended. R. J. Bosworth and Oscar G. Puckett are the only charter members left.

Stairway in Old Coffin House, Newport, Indiana.



JOHN BOND,

The membership of this camp is about one hundred fifty, and it will not be long until this camp will boast a membership of three or four hundred and every descendant of a Union soldier, Randolph county will consider it an honor to be a member of it. The high principles of this organization, the motive which it has for its work, the reason it has for its existence, makes it an organization that will and should live as long as the son of a veteran respects his father as he should.

"Old 44" ranks as one of the best camps in the state. It is considered perhaps the best, and is sent for far and near to exemplify the work in all the degrees. They have even been invited to other states upon similar missions, and have always reflected credit not only upon themselves but upon the entire body of the state. "Old 44" is the only Sons of Veterans camp in the county today, and its membership is found in all parts of the county. It has been a factor in unifying public opinion and public sentiment and has done a wonderful work in the perpetuating the memory of those who fought for their country.

Members of "Old 44" are recognized high in the councils of the state, Sons of Veterans, and some of its members have been distinguished as great officers.

John D. Miller, Division Commander of 1909-1910. R. J. Bosworth, Division Adjutant 1890-1891 and Division Secretary 1907-11. J. M. Brown, Division Adjutant from 1891-1892, and William Bishop, Division Quartermaster 1890-1892. The Sons of Veterans together with the Grand Army of the Republic and Woman's Relief Corps occupy the third story and west half of the second story of the Old Central Building. These rooms have been elegantly furnished and meet the needs of the occupants nicely. All honor to an organization whose membership honor the work of their father.

WOMAN'S RELIEF CORPS.

One of the greatest and most worthy of all institutions which have been organized for the betterment of society is the Woman's Relief Corps. Formerly the membership was limited to the mothers, wives, sisters or daughters or Union soldiers, but at this time, any desirable woman may become a member. This organization has done a wonderful work and has been a source of inspiration to all other organizations. No society labors more for the amelioration of mankind than this devoted patriotic band of women.

Gordon, musician; Ida Gordon, secretary.

SONS OF LIBERTY.

The Sons of Liberty, or otherwise known as the Knights of the Golden Circle had more of a footing and a larger membership in Randolph county than would seem possible. There were no less than five circles to be found within our borders. The object of this lodge seems to have been to arouse sympathy for the southern cause and if possible to overthrow the State government, at that time, under the leadership of Governor Oliver P. Morton. Military drill was a part of the business of their regular meetings. As the war progressed they became bolder and bolder in their attitude against the government and finally planned to capture the State arsenal, and release the southern prisoners held in Camp Morton, at Indianapolis.

Governor Morton found the problem a very difficult one to handle and appreciated thoroughly all information and help that could be had from various parts of the state. It remained for a citizen of Randolph county to assist very materially in this way. It was largely through the work of a resident of this county that the treasonable doings of these circles were discovered. This gentleman made what he called a "confession," which was sworn to before a Justice of the Peace. This information was conveyed to General Carrington, at Indianapolis, and was in turn taken to Governor Morton who appreciated the services beyond measure. In this confession he says: "I, the undersigned, believing it to be my duty as a good citizen to make known the acts and designs of a secret organization now in existence throughout the country, known as the K. G. C.'s or Knights of the Golden Circle, make the following statement:

For some time past I have been an active member of said order and have participated with them in all or most of their meetings in this township and in other lodges. I have taken three degrees and have considered myself fully a member of standing in said organization and know the intentions and motives of said order. I also am acquainted with the members that meet from time to time at the secret meetings and give only the names of those I have seen in the lodge taking part as active members of said lodge and known to me as good and true K. G. C.'s.

I will also give the names of others I have never seen in the lodge but know them to be K. G. C.'s of good standing, they answering all the signs of the order. When first received as members the oath is administered to them separately before the applicant is allowed to know anything about the order the substance of which is opposition to the administration, abolishionism, emancipation, confiscation, arbitrary arrest, conscription, etc., in fact, opposition to the government in all things.

There is a military organization in each township in each county in the state all the members are to be secretly armed and stand ready for all orders from their officers. There is in the center of the State of Indiana a grand lodge called the grand star which is made up by delegates from each state in the Union; all subordinate lodges report through their representative to the Grand Star Lodge. My understanding is that the K. G. C.'s are the same thing North and South; the management of the organization and the signs are identically the same. I believe I could pass through the southern confederacy by using the signs of our Northern lodges.

The members of the township lodges are subject to the order of the captain who is the highest officer in the township. Their arms are contracted for and ordered from Indianapolis and sent secretly to each lodge by I. Beck & Brother. Each member has to contribute for said purpose. To give warning of danger a gun is fired four times counting fifty between each firing. For the purpose of knowing the friends of the K. G. C.'s—If a circle is drawn on a house with chalk and a line drawn straight through the center it is evidence that the occupant is a K. G. C.

The military signs are the same as they have in the Southern army. Their meetings are held in secret places and well guarded to prevent any approach while drilling or doing any business in the lodge. Their object is to oppose everything the administration may do towards putting down the rebellion; oppose all war measures whatever, such as preventing enlistments, encouraging descriptions, etc. Delegates are sent from the Grand Star to the army for the purpose of introducing the order of the K. G. C.'s among the soldiers. I know several women in Randolph county who are members of the order, the wives of officers of different lodges. The promulgations of treason against the government is the business of every member.

I have heard leading men say at their meetings that Jeff Davis had violated no rights that they claim in this government; that Jeff Davis was a better man than Lincoln and that John Morgan was a good man. None but the leading members of the order understand the true meaning and intentions of the K. G. C.'s. The penalty for violating the oath is having the body cut into four quarters and cast out at the north, east, south and west gates. I have been expelled from the order, the only charges against me being the crime of volunteering as a soldier in the army which is expressly forbidden by the order. I have been threatened with death by members of the order for breaking the laws and refusing any longer to act as a member of said order.

The members generally understand that there are officers in the army that are members of the order but I don't know any myself. Our captain told me that some of the militia, or guards, in Ohio were K. G. C.'s, who are there for the purpose of aiding the order in their designs. The members generally declare that if they are drafted and have to go into the army if they should be in a battle they would use their guns against the Federal soldiers, or in any way to aid the rebels.

I have been offered the command of one hundred men to aid in bringing Vanlandingham back in case he was elected governor of Ohio. I was called on to act as drill master for the company of this township on Sunday which met in an out of the way woods in said township but did not go which I suppose is charged against me in the lodge.

The last election was secretly managed by the K. G. C.'s. They all denied having any candidates. But a convention was held and the nomination made and the ticket distributed with orders how to vote; this was done at the lodge meetings previous to the election. Each one was to hold back until the afternoon, as it was supposed the Union party would have two or more candidates—by this means they were to carry the election. The State is divided into four military districts, each district has a general commander. I understand from the officers that ———— Milligan commands this district. The members of each township compose a company, each company is divided into squads; a chief is appointed by the captain to head each squad. If a general war takes place the squads act separately—the guerrilla mode of warfare will be adopted. * * *

I am satisfied that many of the above named men are ignorant of the true meaning and intentions of the K. G. C.'s and believe they would leave the order if they were not deceived by the officers and leading men. I have had many opportunities, perhaps more than others, to ascertain these facts. I have paid strict attention to the matter and I am now fully satisfied the whole order was and is now kept up as a treasonable organization and their aim is to rule this government or destroy it, therefore, I have voluntarily made this statement. I claim to be a Douglas Democrat but my democracy has ever taught me to be always on the side of my country, willing to aid in putting down conspiracies instead of sustaining them.

State of Indiana, Randolph county, ss:

I affirm that the foregoing statement is true in substance, that it was my voluntary act done by my dictation.

Subscribed and affirmed to before me this 25th day of November, 1863.

(Seal) Justice of the Peace."

This organization had its signs, grips and pass words and at one time bade fair to be strong enough to accomplish their purpose. This organization became so strong throughout the state and so bold during the summer of 1863 that General John Morgan of Kentucky was encouraged to invade the state with his force, in the belief that there would be a general uprising. In 1864 they matured a plan for a general uprising in the city of Indianapolis. On the 16th of August the plan was discovered and the infantry stationed at Camp Morton searched the "invading post at Indianapolis." It is said that three hundred revolvers were taken from passengers on one train; hundreds of revolvers were thrown into Pogue's Run, which has given the search the name of "Battle of Pogue's Run." It is known that at least thirty thousand guns and revolvers were invoiced and it is fairly thought that at least sixty thousand revolvers and six thousand muskets had been distributed.

That this disloyal organization was in correspondence with the leaders of the Confederacy has been fully established. The statement made, as here published, is no doubt a true one, as these same things were afterward proven in trials in various parts of the state.

The other Randolph county citizen who had direct connection with this affair was R. H. Morgan, Greensfork township, who gave the following reminiscence:

"I was taken to Grand Gulf, May 13th; stayed there until June 5th. Governor Morton came with his hospital boat and took us to Evansville. I was in the City Hospital until July 3d, then at Indianapolis until July 7th. I was then furloughed home for thirty days; went back for eight or ten days and was furloughed again, and so on until November. I was then detailed to the provost marshal's office, at Indianapolis, and continued there until the close of the war, June 30, 1865. I helped arrest Milligan, Horsey, Bowles, Dodd and Heffron, and to capture the revolvers, ammunition and powder sent to Indianapolis in the conspiracy by the Sons of Liberty. We took thirty-four boxes of revolvers and fixed ammunition in the old book-bindery of the Sentinel office. The boxes were three feet by one foot by fourteen inches. The revolvers were seven shooters. The boxes were marked Sunday school books, on the outside. The plot was discovered by the detectives of General Carrington. We took also one hundred and four kegs of powder, in zinc-covered boxes. They had been sent on to Terre Haute, but were found there and brought back to Indianapolis and I helped to put them into the magazine.

Dodd escaped; Heffron turned state's evidence, and Milligan, Horsey and Bowles were tried by military commission and sentenced to be hung, but at the last moment were reprieved by President Johnson and their sentence was at length revoked by the United States court on the ground that a military commission had not the right to try them outside of the military lines.

Comrade Long and myself broke in the book-case containing the books for the ritual, etc., for the Golden Circle, in Heffron's office, and there were three or four bushels of them, and we turned them over to the provost marshal. There was also a plot at the same time (by the secret lodges of the Sons of Liberty) to capture the government, release the rebel prisoners in Camp Morton and turn the state in favor of the rebel cause; but the whole conspiracy, extending by kindred lodges far and wide throughout the West, was found out in time and checkmated. These revolvers, etc., were brought to the state under a false pretense of being Sunday school books, and they were to be distributed to the members of the Golden Circle through the state, arrangements having been perfected for the purpose."

TEMPERANCE.

GENERAL—UNION CITY—SONS—TEMPLARS—PORTER LODGES—S. S. V. AND E. L.—REMINISCENCES—GENERAL.

The cause of abstinence from intoxicating liquors early found advocates in Randolph county. The Friends had for many years been taking strong and comparatively high ground against the common use of strong drink, as had also the Methodists of the earlier days, not, perhaps, strictly identical with, yet much similar to, the more modern distinctive movement. This movement was in fact a gradual one, growing by progressive steps, and through various efforts during the lapse of many years, taking at length the shape of the American Temperance Society, which was formed at Boston, Massachusetts, in about 1826, on the principal of total abstinence from ardent spirits as a beverage.

That movement spread rapidly and extensively through the settled portions of the country, and in ten years had become a general success insomuch that the habits of drinking and offering ardent spirits their use in harvest and at raisings, etc., as also their sale in the general stores and groceries of the country had, in very extensive regions, mostly or entirely ceased. During several years before 1836, most of the active temperance workers became convinced that the enterprise could not be permanently successful unless all intoxicating drinks were abandoned. The pledge against all such liquors gradually superseded the old pledge; and, in 1836, the American Temperance Association changed its ground accordingly, framing its pledge substantially as follows: The undersigned, believing that the use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is not necessary, but rather injurious, and that while their moderate use is continued the evils of drunkenness can never be prevented, do hereby mutually pledge ourselves to each other that we will neither use nor traffic in the same nor furnish them to others; and that in all suitable ways we will discourage such use and traffic in the community.

This ground thus taken in 1836, seventy-eight years ago, has been in substance the basis and foundation of all temperance action since that time. During years past the forms of opposition to the use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage, and to the traffic in the same, have been legion; the principle in all, however, being substantially identical.

The detailed history of temperance work in Randolph county during those early times is supposed to be not now accessible. The first temperance meeting of which we have an account was held at the court-house in Winchester about 1830, under the auspices of the original National Association, with the pledge against distilled liquors. Temperance societies were formed extensively throughout the county, and the religious element for the most part became convinced of the correctness of the principles of the movement, and the necessity of the work proposed. Among those who were actively engaged were Moorman Way, Paul W. Way, John Way, Henry Huffman, Thomas Fisher, Isom Puckett, William Harris, J. E. Beverly, M. A. Reeder, James Clayton, the Dunkirk Friends in general, and many others whose names cannot now be given.

J. E. Beverly, then a young man under age, was, for a considerable time, Secretary of the County Society, and Isom Puckett was at one time its president. The movement flourished for several years and most good people were indoctrinated with its principles. Moorman Way at one time walked eight miles to attend a temperance meeting held by a Presbyterian clergyman who was an active and talented advocate of the cause.

A strong temperance society was organized in Winchester, January 1, 1839 at the Methodist meeting-house for the purpose of organizing an association for the suppression of the unnecessary use of liquor. The meeting was called to order by Benjamin Cox, one of the first county commissioners, and was addressed by Carey S. Goodrich, Wm. Hunt and John H. Hull. At this meeting a constitution was adopted and was signed by one hundred thirty-seven citizens. A committee, composed of George W. Goodrich, Moorman Way and James Clayton was appointed to draft the constitution. The resolutions passed at that time shows the sincerity of these people in their purpose.

They resolved to look on the cause of temperance as a common cause of every sincere lover of his country, his race and his God. They resolved that they would by all lawful and honorable means endeavor to prevent the licensing of houses for the retailing of liquors. They further resolved that "we consider the license law as totally erroneous in theory and highly destructive of our dearest interests and that we look upon it as a relic of barbarous days, entirely unworthy the sanction of an enlighted legislative body and that its beneficial effects are light, trivial when compared with the injurious results." An interesting historical fact is noticed in one of their resolutions when they "Resolved, that we deprecate the traffic of ardent spirits and especially in taverns as fraught with evils more direful than even groceries."

Edmund B. Goodrich was elected president and David Haworth, vice-president; Henry W. Way, secretary; and Solomon Reynard and John Wright, directors. An investigating committee was appointed which consisted of Moorman Way, George W. Goodrich, Henry D. Huffman, James Clayton, Carey S. Goodrich, John Way, John R. Davis, Thomas M. Davis, Wm. Hunt, John H. Hull. This committee met at the Goodrich Brothers & Company storehouse on the 7th day of December, 1839. David Haworth, John Wright and Solomon Reynard being present. That this society did good work is recognized at its next meeting, one year later, when they resolved, "That the operations of the temperance society for the last twelve months has demonstrated the efficiency of temperance societies as a means for the accomplishment of the end in view, to-wit: The arresting of the ravaging of intemperance and that we have increased confidence in the goodness and in the ultimate success of the cause."

That this society was in earnest is shown by the fact that in July of 1840, charges were preferred against Silas Colgrove for violating the pledge of the society. The committee consisting of John Wright, John Way, Moorman Way, James W. Moore and E. W Goodrich was appointed. Upon investigation it was found that Mr. Colgrove was guilty and he was expelled from the society, accordingly. This led to a great deal of public discussion and on the 10th of December of that year, 1840, a public debate was held to discuss the question of temperance societies. Arnold Buffam was for and Colonel Jeremiah Smith against temperance societies. The earnestness of the debate was shown by the minutes, "After a debate of six hours there was a call made for additional signers whereupon thirty-five members were added." At this time a distillery was being erected in the town of Winchester and the society took it upon themselves to fight its construction with all its power. This society went so far as to pledge themselves to refrain from dealing with individuals engaged in manufacturing liquors because they believed such to be an encouragement of them in their practice, to a certain extent. The enthusiasm ran high and in February, 1841, Mr. James Ferris gave an address of such great strength that he was asked to furnish it for publication, that it might be scattered over the entire country.

In 1842 a special committee consisting of John T. Beverly, Adam McPherson and Edmund B. Goodrich was appointed to draft resolutions for the good of the order. It was decided to organize a county wide Total Abstinence Society. This society held its meetings in Winchester on June 14, 1844, at which time by-laws and constitutions were signed by three hundred and fifty-nine people. We do not know how long this society continued as the last minutes found are dated September, 1845, and indicate a very flourishing condition of the society.

Soon after 1840, the movement was revived in the form of Washingtonianism. One Mr. Porter, from Cincinnati, held meetings at Winchester for that cause, and, perhaps, organized societies here, and the movement extended as before throughout the county-at-large and continued to prevail for several years, with much enthusiasm. Up to this time the various temperance societies had been open and free to all; but, as the Washingtonian movement began to show symptoms of decline, the temperance work took new shape in the form of secret associations of various kinds. Perhaps the earliest, at least one of the earliest, was the Sons of Temperance. It began in New York City, but spread rapidly westward, and was soon planted in Randolph county, in 1844. Others were Good Templars, Daughters of Temperance, Temples of Honor, etc.

These associations have done an extensive work, continuing for many years, in some cases even down to the present time.

In some respects the work done by these various societies was more restricted than the former movements, chiefly from two causes. First, many ardent temperance workers were in conviction opposed to secret societies, and could not, in consequence, affiliate with their work; and such, while deeply sympathizing with the object to be attained, and unwilling to throw anything in the way, yet felt obliged to stand aloof from active participation. The second reason was that the various secret orders required the payment of money as a pre-requisite of membership, and as a condition of continued connection.

In the summer of 1854, a Fourth of July temperance celebration was held at Winchester. Great preparation had been made and great display was indulged in. All the temperance orders then in vogue were present, and marched in procession in regalia. An immense crowd was in attendance and great enthusiasm was apparent. Just before that, an event of notable importance in temperance had taken place in Winchester. A notorious saloonkeeper had defied the whole power of public sentiment and kept brazenly on with his mischievous work. He had been appealed to in every way, and especially by the ladies of the village, to cease his work and close his saloon. He refused. A citizen of the town, once honored and prominent, who had at one time been county sheriff, having become a hard drinker, was lying sick from a debauch and prostrated with delirium tremens. He finally died with this awful disease, and while his lifeless corpse was lying stark and stiff at his wretched home, the ladies of Winchester gathered at the domicile of his afflicted widow, and, placing her at their head, formed a large and imposing procession and marched in a body to the grog shop where this man had bought much of his liquor, and sternly demanded of the keeper that he destroy his liquors and quit the business of dram selling. He refused and they proceeded to smash in his liquor barrels and spilled the whole in the street. Great excitement throughout the region was the consequence. The grog seller sued the women, but owing to the fact that all their wives were engaged in the onslaught, none of the attorneys of Winchester would engage for the plaintiff, and he was obliged to get legal assistance from Greenville, Ohio, and elsewhere. The final issue of the case is not now remembered. The case was strongly commented on and the spirit of the courageous ladies highly praised by the gifted orator of the day, Matthew R. Hull, Esq., who, to an enthusiastic and eloquent delivery, added a most sarcastic and fiery manner, and his invectives against the heinous traffic and all its participators were bitter and terrible.

For many years one of the most active and indefatigable workers in the various departments has been Miss Amanda M. Way, who has in later years gained even a national reputation.

E. B. Reynolds Esq., has also, among perhaps others, become famous through the country as an energetic and successful temperance orator and lecturer, having within the last year or two been engaged in the work in Kansas of bringing the temperance sentiments of that state to the point of adopting the prohibitory amendment in the constitution of that state.

Within a few years past, several new phases of the temperance work have made their appearance. About 1870, an organization intended to embrace all existing societies was formed, called the Temperance Alliance, which, for a time, did efficient work in educating the people in the principles of total abstinence.

About February, 1874, the Women's Crusade broke out at Union City, and for a brief season swept everything before it. Almost all the Christian women of the place were engaged in the work. It grew up without previous notice or preparation, and the movement seemed to be the spontaneous outburst of an overwhelming sense of the terrible power and curse of the drinking habit, and the fearful evils of the liquor traffic. The crusade first took shape at Washington Court House, a village in southern central Ohio, and was taken up rapidly throughout the state. A gentleman known as the "Ohio Broad Ax," held some meetings at Union City and told how they were doing in Ohio.

At one of these meetings, on Friday, a committee of ladies was appointed to decide upon a course of action. The committee was Mme. Commons, Galloway, Croner and McFeely. On Saturday, the committee, three of them, met at Mr. Commons' office. Mrs. Commons was made president, Mrs. Galloway, vice-president, and Mrs. Croner, secretary. A kind of constitution was drawn up, coupled with a general pledge "to do what they could." A meeting was held on Monday night and seventy-five ladies signed that pledge. The next day at 1 o'clock, another meeting was held at the Presbyterian church. One hundred and fifty or more ladies were present. Religious exercises were had, but no definite plan of action had been decided on. Suddenly one lady said, "Let us go to Cain's saloon." Others also said, "Let us go." The proposition was voted with a rush. A procession of about two hundred ladies was formed, two and two, and down they went, arm in arm, to Cain's saloon.

The news spread over town like wild-fire and the citizens came crowding down, fearful of the treatment their wives might receive from the saloon men and the roughs who were also there in great numbers. The ladies entered, their leaders pushing up to the counter and commencing a talk with Cain. He brandished an article written by some clergyman or other in opposition to the crusade in other quarters, telling "women to keep at home," and mind their own business, etc., and demanded them to "read that" and learn their duty. Meanwhile Cain, expecting prayer by the ladies, seemed desirous of having the matter over as speedily as possible, and asked the ladies if they wished to have prayers. No plan to that effect had been made, but the "spirit of the time" was on them, and Mrs. Commons, who was one of the leaders, replied that if he would keep the crowd still, they would. He said they should be still, and Mrs. Enos Turpen engaged in prayer, after singing. The whole thing was spontaneous; no plan whatever had been arranged and they did simply what the Spirit led them to do. Mrs. Turpen made a most moving prayer. Her soul was all on fire, and she evidently spake as the Spirit gave her utterance. Some who were there said, "she prayed like an angel," and that "such another prayer was never heard from human lips." At one point the roughs seemed about to break loose. Mrs. Commons glanced at Mr. Cain and he hushed them with his fist. After prayer, he insisted that his article should be read, and Mrs. Commons, standing behind the counter, in the midst of that strangely mingled crowd—Christian ladies, their husbands and friends, the saloon keepers and the roughs, read the article. He boasted of its doctrine, written by a clergyman and admonished the ladies to go home and be quiet and let his business alone. Some said, "Let us go home." Mrs. Commons said, "No, I want to talk" and said to Mr. Cain, "Will you keep them still?" "Yes, I will." Mrs. Commons went on to make her speech, taking the article as the basis. She said afterward that she felt as though "the power" rested on her, and she spoke simply as she was moved upon. The crowd was restrained from doing the ladies harm, and they went home. The next day the work was renewed and so it continued for some two weeks, and, for the time, every saloon but one was closed. The movement could not, in the nature of things, be kept up indefinitely, and the saloons after a time, opened again to resume their work of making drunkards for money.

A legal movement was also commenced against the saloon keepers, which, however, resulted in failure from the well known fact that to obtain evidence against saloon keepers is generally utterly impossible. At Cain's saloon, Mrs. Commons spoke about twenty minutes, and the house was as still as death. She seemed wonderfully helped, and spoke freely and with great apparent effect. The saloon keeper seemed like a caged lion. When Mrs. Commons closed her speech, she said, "Now I am ready to go"; and the ladies marched away as solemnly as though it were a funeral. The marshal on the Ohio side, though a drinking man, declared, "No one shall harm you," and he went with them for protection as they went their way round to every saloon on the Ohio side; and then they went back to the church and found the house filled with gentlemen. The next day they visited every saloon on the Indiana side. One was so frightened that he put up iron bars to his windows. He agreed to close out. Another sent a letter to the committee offering to ship the liquor back to the wholesale house and quit the business. Four places were closed on the Indiana side.

The Ohio side was visited again and for some time every liquor shop but one was shut up. There had been twenty saloons and for some weeks all were closed except one. Suits were also brought against several liquor sells. One offered to close up if they would drop the suit, but the Alliance would not do it. Cain was shut up by a legal process for awhile, but after a time he began again.

The Alliance held meetings every day until October, in the Presbyterian church and after that once a week. The suits that had been begun at Greenville proved a costly failure, since in a liquor loving community evidence against rum sellers can scarcely be obtained.

The next year (1875), the ladies of Indiana met at Indianapolis and formed the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and auxiliary unions were formed in Randolph county; and, among other places, at Union City, which were more or less effective in sustaining the temperance spirit and prosecuting temperance work. In November, 1875, a National Union was organized at Cleveland, Ohio, and the Indiana Union was made auxiliary thereto.

MURPHY MOVEMENT.

Francis Murphy began his work in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, late in the fall of 1876. Great success attended his labors. Many temperance converts were made and the movement spread extensively east and west. Among others the Timmony brothers joined the Murphy movement and began to hold meetings from place to place. In process of time, they came to Galion, Ohio. Meanwhile, the Temperance Alliance work was going on at Union City and elsewhere in Randolph county, but there was no knowledge in detail of the Murphy movement.

A great religious revival was in progress in Union City among the Methodists under the leadership of Rev. Mr. Vigus, their pastor. But an anxiety arose to become acquainted with the Murphy movement, and, if practicable, to introduce it there. A meeting was called at the Methodist church for consultation. At this meeting, Mrs. Commons made a statement of what little knowledge she had gained from the papers of the time and her nephew, Mr. Dodge, who had been in the work in Eastern Ohio, was visiting at her home, and, being present at the meeting, was called up, and he told what he knew. He stated, among other things, that the work was carried on mostly by the reformed men themselves. A committee was appointed and another meeting was held in a few days. The committee, however, had prepared no report. The Timmony brothers were at this time at Galion, Ohio. The committee was discharged and another one was appointed to confer with the Timmony boys, and arrange for them to come to Union City, if possible. The committee did so, and they agreed to come four nights. The people flocked to the meetings and joined in great numbers and it was clear that they ought to stay longer. But money was required to pay the rent of the hall as well as to pay the lecturers. At first a collection was taken each night, but that did not seem likely to be sufficient, and, among other things, a plan was arranged by which an individual gentleman or firm became responsible for the hall rent one night apiece. Thus the meetings were continued eleven nights. As the result, about two thousand names were obtained and for a time drinking liquor in Union City was mostly at an end.

A reading room and rooms for amusement and recreation were hired and fitted up and the movement went on quite enthusiastically for a time. The ladies helped the enterprise much in every possible way. Among other things, they held a strawberry festival to raise funds for the Murphy club, which netted one hundred and sixty dollars. But the movement flagged in interest and zeal, and is now entirely extinct. Many went out and held meetings throughout the surrounding country and formed auxiliary clubs, thus bringing many into the work.

The enterprise was soon after set on foot at Winchester and with great apparent effect though the results seem not to have been permanent. Among the gentlemen who were more or less prominent at Union City in furnishing funds for the movement, were Messrs. Caldwallader, Starbuck, Worthington, Pierce, Anderson, Reeder & Bowersox, Turpen and others.

As already stated, the Women's Temperance Union was subsequently formed and continues to the present time. During many years, the temperance sentiment has been very strong, so much so as mostly to prevent the existence of licensed saloons. At Union City, at Ridgeville, at Farmland, at Fairview, at Spartanburg, at Lynn, at Arba, sometimes at Winchester, liquor saloons have for the most part been prevented. The history of the movement in this respect would furnish much interesting and instructive material, yet the demon of drink is like that other demon of mischief, thrusting himself into every company, and everywhere seeking whom he may devour; and many are cast down by his power. One agency for temperance employed for a time with good effect at Union City and perhaps elsewhere, was the holding of Sunday afternoon street meetings. Many were held with large attendance and it is hoped with good results. The speeches at those meetings were good and often eloquent, and doubtless many listened to temperance truth from the sidewalk and the street corner who would not trouble themselves to attend a meeting held indoors.

The religious denominations have been mostly active in the temperance work from the beginning, as also many who were outside the churches. In fact, good and philanthropic men and women of all shades of belief in other respects have made common cause of the temperance work, and have marched shoulder to shoulder in the grand war against the legions of king alcohol.

Especially have the members of the Legislature from Randolph distinguished themselves in that body in undertaking to enact measures for the suppression of the drink traffic.

Hon. M. A. Reeder introduced a bill for the entire suppression of the traffic. Hon. Nathan Butts was chairman of the temperance committee in that Legislature which passed the so-called Baxter bill. That bill was the result of the joint labors of Messrs. Butts and Baxter, aided by the suggestions and advice of many other active and judicious friends of temperance, both in the Legislature and out of it. The perfected bill was presented by Mr. Butts as chairman of the committee. The only speech in its favor in the House was made by him, and it passed both branches of the Legislature, was signed by Governor Hendricks on his sick bed, with great interest expressed by him in its behalf, and became a law, only to be killed shortly afterward by an adverse decision of the Indiana supreme court.

One outgrowth of the woman's crusade in Union City was the Young Men's Christian Association.

After the saloons had been closed by the crusade, the ladies sent to Indianapolis for Dr. Munhall to come to Union City and organize a Young Men's Christian Association. He did so, and the following autumn the association established itself in a pleasant location with a reading room and library. The Young Men's Christian Association has been in operation with more or less activity ever since.

For a time the Young Men's Christian Association and the Women's Christian Temperance Union occupied the same rooms, holding frequent meetings, and carrying forward their respective enterprises with energy and success.

The Murphy movement took hold at Winchester with a rush, and seemed for a short time to sweep everything into its current; but the enterprise soon declined, and for a long time it has shown little or no activity. In Farmland and Ridgeville a longer life was attained, the latter place continuing to work in this respect even to the present. The Women's Christian Temperance Union is organized by townships. The County Union has a president, with a vice-president in each township.

In 1880 there was formed at Indianapolis an organization called the Grand Council. It was composed of delegates from the various temperance societies and orders in the state, such as Christian Temperance Unions, Good Templars, Temples of Honor, Blue Ribbons, Red Ribbons, Sons of Temperance, Knights Templar, etc. The chief work of the winter was the circulation of petitions to the Legislature asking for a prohibitory amendment to the state constitution forbidding the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage, and also for a law to prevent, so far as possible, the evils of the liquor traffic.

INDEPENDENT TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

The Murphy movement, after some years of activity, seemed to lag and die. During the winter of 1879-80 a new movement sprang up which has been in operation with greater or less degree of activity ever since. Meetings were sustained several times a week during the greater part of 1880, interspersed occasionally with concerts for amusement, instruction and pecuniary profit. At first the association fitted up a hall in the third story of a brick building east of the Branham House. The location, however, was difficult of access, and considerably uncomfortable, especially in hot weather. During the summer of 1880 the association succeeded in raising money and labor enough to erect a tabernacle on a vacant lot, south side of Oak street, east of the Bowers building.

The tabernacle was opened in July, 1880, by a series of temperance meetings, which were largely attended. Addresses, lectures and a temperance Sunday school were kept up in the tabernacle until the weather became too cold, the school being under the charge of Miss Dwinell.

REMINISCENCES.

As an indication of the public sentiment in many parts of Randolph county, as a specimen of the tactics sometimes employed, we append the following from Fairview, in Green township, as related by Philip Barger, Esq.:

"There has been a strong temperance work in this region for many years, Washingtonians, Sons, Good Templars, etc. The people generally are strongly opposed to liquor selling. Not much of it has ever been done here. Samuel Caylor once kept hotel and sold liquor. Several persons have tried to carry on the business at Fairview, but they have been shut up or driven out in some way. Some years ago William Clemens set up a liquor shop at Fairview. The fruits soon began to appear—noisy and drunken men, etc. I was justice, and I issued warrants to about a dozen drunken men who I knew got liquor there, and had Prosecutor Cheney come from Winchester. The men came and were examined separately, but we could get nothing from them. They had left a jug of liquor near when they came, and when they got to it again they swung the jug defiantly and drank in triumph. Some one or two with the prosecutor and constable had stayed to dinner, and saw and heard their defiance.

Mr. Cheney was greatly mortified at our failure, and angry at their triumph, and he cried, 'Is any one here willing to swear out a warrant against that man for keeping a nuisance?' 'I will,' said one. It was done instanter, and the constable posted off forthwith to serve the warrant. But the bird had flown. The magistrate's summons to those customers of his had frightened him, and he put out on the double quick without waiting to see the upshot; and he never came back to answer for a nuisance. Another man tried it. Twelve complaints were made, and three indictments were found. One was sustained, and he was fined and sent to jail in default of payment. He bailed himself out for $100, which he furnished, and went and got drunk and died of delirium tremens. So liquor sellers have found a hard road to travel in Fairview."

It is now almost seventy-five years since the first petition for a saloon license was presented to the county commissioners. This petition was presented by residents of Green township and signed by enough citizens of that township to induce the commissioners to grant it; however, in less than a year the saloon keeper was fined for violation of the law. This has been the record of all these years—violation after violation on the part of those who handle intoxicants.

The history of the drink traffic in Randolph county is full of exciting incidents. Its course has been "evil," only evil, and that continually," fighting, fighting, ever fighting for its devilish power over the bodies and the souls of men, like its old father, Satan, going about like a roaring lion seeking some human prey to devour. The commissioners of Randolph county have mostly refused to grant license to liquor sellers. It is said, indeed, that the circuit court has rendered a decision that in certain circumstances the law requires license to be given. Still, to their honor be it said, the commissioners persist in their refusal, thus throwing the fearful responsibility of the unseemly and mischievous act, if it must be done, upon the court itself.

The history of the liquor traffic, and of the struggles against it in Randolph county during the years that are past, and the various success attending them at different times, if it could be written, would be full of thrilling interest. The incidents at Union City and elsewhere in this behalf have been very exciting and somewhat dramatic.

PORTER LODGES.

About 1879 or 1880 a genteman by the name of Porter, who was a reformed inebriate, held many meetings and formed several "Porter Lodges" in Randolph county, chiefly in the western part. His influence seemed to be great for the time, and many were brought to espouse the cause of total abstinence through his efforts.

GOOD TEMPLARS.

The Good Templars was another society that originated in New York City about 1854. This order was introduced into Randolph county by the creation of Winchester Lodge No. 3, April 15, 1854, D. W C. F Hatch. During the same year lodges were established at Union City, Farmland, Windsor, Ridgeville, Lynn, Huntsville, Maxville and Spartanburg. The work spread rapidly in the state, fifty lodges being organized in less than a year. The Grand Lodge of the state was organized at Winchester January 17, 1855. At this convention forty-three lodges were represented, comprising nearly three thousand members. F. G. Hall was elected G. W. C. T., and Gen. Asahel Stone, G. W. S.

Lodges were instituted at Bloomingsport, Buena Vista, Deerfield, Morristown, Fairview, Harrisville and Jericho. These societies continued in operation many years, sowing good seed, spreading the knowledge and the practice of total abstinence, reclaiming the inebriate and saving the young from the terrible habit of drink. Since the passage of the Nicholson bill Randolph county has been for the most part dry. At first Winchester was dry in all the wards, excepting one, and this was overcome by remonstrance several years ago. Under the County Option law Randolph county voted and went "dry" by a very large majority.

Later on the township and ward unit was substituted, and under that law one ward of Union City was "wet." Union City, Ohio, however, was dry, and this led to a great deal of difficulty in that city. Ohio went wet so far as Union City is concerned, and the Indiana side then went dry.

The people of this county have always stood against the pernicious influence of intemperance and will continue to stand against it. The early principles of temperance have been inculcated deep in the minds of the better class of people, so much so, that this county will always be found on the side of humanity—which means against the liquor traffic.

The Sons of Temperance was an order instituted in New York City in 1849. The object was to solidify and perpetuate the results of the Washingtonian society referred to heretofore.

The Lodge of Sons was organized in Randolph county as early as 1846, at least the county commissioners rented "The Sons of Temperance room in the second story of the court house" that year. The order was very flourishing.

In 1854 a grand Fourth of July celebration for temperance in Randolph county was held at Winchester, embracing the Sons, the Good Templars and other temperance societies. The occasion attracted an immense crowd and the exercises were very impressive, and doubtless much good was accomplished. The fight at this time between the liquor and the temperance elements was exceedingly bitter.

The remonstrance referred to in the Winchester Temperance Association was filed with the county commissioners March 4, 1840, and again in 1845 another great remonstrance, signed by three hundred and fifty-nine citizens, was filed.

In the annual spring election held the first Monday in April, 1847, a vote was taken upon the question of "license or no license." It is interesting to know the results, which are referred to as follows:

"State of Indiana, Randolph County, ss.

"I, Nathan Garrett, auditor of said county, do hereby certify that it has been made known to me by the filing of the necessary certificates required by law by the proper officers of the spring annual election held in the following townships on the first Monday in April, A. D. 1847, that a majority of all the votes cast at such spring annual election were cast against license in the following townships, to-wit: White River township, Ward township, Monroe township, Stoney Creek township, West River township and Washington, all being townships in said county of Randolph aforesaid.

"Given under my hand this 7th day of June, A. D. 1847.

Signed "NATHAN GARRETT, A. R. C."

Thus a greater part of Randolph county went "dry" in the early part of its history.

CHAPTER XII.

AGRICULTURE.

From time immemorial the work of man has been to wrest from the soil the means of sustenance. It is true he may have depended more upon the chase for his food than upon the products of the soil but nevertheless tilling the land was in a way a necessity.

Primitive man raised his crops by making holes in the ground with a bone or a stone or a sharp stick and dropping the seeds into them. He cultivated it by merely scratching the soil a little. Thanks to the composition of the primitive soil he was able to raise a little grain but as he advanced in civilization and his needs became greater it became necessary to expand his process of farming. The soil must be cleared of trees. This he did by girdling them and then farming between the stumps.

Our first settlers were attracted to this country by the fertility and ideal topography of the land, as well as by its cheapness. They threaded their way among the giant forest trees to the spot of their choice in this new country and did not need implements other than the simple ones they had at hand. Often the plow share was the only piece of iron in their implements. The remainder of the plow was made from tough oak as well as was the harrow, in which both timber and teeth were made of wood. Our ancestors pinned their implements together with hickory pins, the holes for which were often made by burning, as often they had no auger. Fortunate, indeed, was the man who could boast so useful a tool as an auger. Nor was his fortune unto himself alone, for in that time of generosity such a useful instrument would be loaned from neighbor to neighbor until frequently it was difficult to tell where it might be found. A sledge was made from timbers split from the "crook" of a tree. Pitch forks were made from the branches and the wooden rake was the only kind to be found. Even before wooden harrows were made the same purpose was accomplished by brushing the ground, that is, a small tree or a big bush, would be cut and dragged over the freshly cut ground.

After the ground was prepared and the seed sown it was necessary to keep constant watch that the growing seeds were not destroyed by crows or blackbirds. They were numerous and ready to dig up the seeds and tear out the tender sprouts that they would soon destroy an entire field. The squirrels were almost as bad and many a boy and girl has found it necessary to guard the corn field from the invasion of these pests. Lucky indeed, was the boy whose father could afford to allow him to shoot the squirrels, but even without the use of the gun, boys had great sport in throwing stones and clods at the little robbers. Pounding old dish pans or kettles and yelling was the favorite way of scaring the crows. Another way was to stuff an old garment to make it have the appearance of a human figure and hang it near the place to be guarded. But Mr. Crow was too wise a bird to be fooled for any length of time by a device of that kind. Such a device was used so much that it became known as a "scare crow."

Wheat was cut with a sickle and tied in bundles and placed in shocks for a few weeks. It was then either hauled to the barn or put in ricks, "to go through a sweat," after which it was ready to be threshed. The sickle was followed by the cradle which was an implement like a scythe with the addition of long wooden fingers upon which the grain would fall. These fingers were curved which gave the implement somewhat the form of a cradle. In this way the grain would be cut and left in "wind rows" after which it would be raked into bunches with wooden rakes and then tied into bundles.

Following the cradle came machinery pulled by horses. This machine was known as the "reaper" which would cut the grain, allowing it to fall onto fingers which would be held in position by the driver and released when sufficient grain to make a sheath was gathered. This necessitated the grain being bound before the reaper could pass that way again. It was considered almost a disgrace to be "caught by the reaper," that is not being able to bind from one station to the next before the reaper would again come around. Usually the field was divided into four stations which meant that four binders could bind wheat or tie it into sheaves as rapidly as one team could cut it. From the hand rake they went to the self-rake, from that to to the harvester and from that to the self-binder. The first self-binder used in Randolph county was sold by George W. Robbins, who lived in Farmland. It was a "Buckeye Wire Binder," that is, the binder would bind by wire instead of twine. It was sold to William Wright of Stoney Creek township. There was much prejudice and feeling against the machine and it was thought necessary to watch it while not in use to keep it from being destroyed. The binder wire gave way to the twine binder which has reached perfection.

The process of threshing was a very laborious and irksome task in the pioneer days. This was usually done in the winter time when the weather was bad and the "men-folks" could not work out of doors. The threshing floor which was usually a bare place on the ground was circular in form, if cattle were intended to be used for tramping. The wheat would be scattered over this floor and oxen driven over it to remove the seed from the heads. While the oxen were being driven men would turn the wheat with wooden forks and in this way the cattle would be coming in contact with the unthreshed wheat. Another means to separate the wheat from the heads was to beat the wheat with a flail. The flail was made by fastening a piece of wood to a stout handle by means of a raw-hide or thong. This gave the piece of wood plenty of play which permitted it to be swung in all directions. The wheat would be placed upon the floor and beaten with a flail until the wheat and chaff were separated from the straw. When it was once "tramped or flailed out" the seed and chaff would be placed in a blanket and tossed into the air, at a time when the wind was sufficiently strong to blow away the chaff and not remove the wheat. If there was no wind and the necessities of threshing were urgent enough an artificial breeze would be made by fanning with a sheet or some other device.

Machines became a necessity and the inventive genius proceeded to make a machine to do the work of tramping or flailing. The first machine was a "chaff piler." This machine separated the wheat and chaff from the straw and left it in the same condition as was left in the tramping or flailing, after which the wheat would be separated as before. However, it was not long until the machine was made better and an artificial fan was placed in the machine so as to separate the wheat from the straw and chaff. This was a wonderful improvement over the old method and made threshing rather a short piece of work. The unpleasantness of this machine was the fact that the man "working at the tail end of the machine" had to stand in the immense amount of dust, that would come from the machine during the threshing. This led to the "stacker" which was an additional machine placed behind the threshing machine to carry the straw to a greater distance from the dust. This stacker also moved in a semi-circle, which relieved the stacker from forking the straw over the rick. Later an adjustment known as the "blower" has been made which with the elevator to elevate the threshed wheat into a wagon instead of running into a half bushel, has made threshing a comparatively easy task. But the farmer has no more work to do than his good wife, who must prepare the meals for twenty or thirty hungry men. Formerly men of the neighborhood would exchange work with each other and go from house to house, eating wherever the machine might be at meal time.

This meant that a man worked in the threshing for several days, which often would cover a period of a week. At the present time farmers' unions are organized. Set rules are made and men go home to their meals, especially supper. This relieves the house wife of the irksome duties which formerly attended threshing.

All other farm processes have undergone as radical a change as have the ones of which we have already spoken. The single shovel plow was followed by the double shovel; it by the walking, one row, cultivator; it by the riding, one row cultivator, until today, the farmer plows with the two row riding cultivator. The check row planter and the drill have superseded the single shovel plow, the corn dropped by hand and covered with a hoe; the bar-share is kept today as a relic while the grandson of the man who used it plows the same field with a "gang." The spring tooth and disc harrows have supplanted the brush and the single "A." The seven foot ball-bearing mowing machine, "without side draft," chuckles at the scythe while the hay loader relieves the rake of its duties.

No longer does the house wife do her work with the primitive methods but she also is as much up-to-date as her husband. The work of the little wheel, reel, winding blades, warping bars, rattling, pounding loom and the hand needle is done in the factory and not the direct result of her toil. All this has become necessary because, with the increase in population, society has demanded greater efficiency on the part of the producer—the men and women on the farm, who feed and clothe and shelter society. This is only possible when the producers can meet these demands with the most modern and efficient appliances. Modern farming is as much better than the pioneer farming as is the machine of today better than the machine of that time. More intelligence is required than was required at that time, for since then we have robbed the soil until in many cases it is almost impoverished. Man can not take continually from the soil and not exhaust its resources unless he returns an equivalent of that which he takes. This has been and is the great problem of farming today, and to solve problems of this kind the state has provided schools and colleges for the especial training of men and women along the lines of more efficient farming. These schools have, directly through their teaching, and directly through their extensive departments, and the public press, aroused all intelligent people to the growing needs and demands of today.

Through the Extension Department of the State Agricultural College at Purdue, farmers' institutes have been organized in townships and counties all over the state. This has brought men and women into direct contact with men and women of advanced opinion until the farmer of today looks to Purdue University as a source of intelligent training and advice. The Vocational Educational bill, passed by the state Legislature of 1913, makes it possible for each county to have a county agent who is an expert in agricultural matters and who advises along agricultural lines. This county is, at this time, fortunate in having a man as its first county agent, Mr. Charles A. Mahan, who was born and raised on a farm and educated in the State Agricultural College of Kentucky. He spent three and one-half years as a soil expert in the Philippines. This training makes it possible for him to advise with profit upon questions of interest to the farmer.

The stock of the farm has been improved as much as have been the agricultural products. As we have said, the old methods have given way to the new. This is not true of methods alone. The quality and character of seed planted, or sown has been improved as much by modern methods and applications of modern thought, as have the implements with which they are cultivated.

Randolph county being, strictly speaking, an agricultural county, has kept in line with these most advanced methods. The "elm peeler" and the "razor back" are no longer to be found, but in their stead have come the thoroughbred Poland-China, Berkshire, Chesterwhite, Duroc and other pure breeds. The "pennyroyal, that could jump a ten-rail fence and not half try," has been supplanted by the Jersey, Holstein, Durham, Hereford and other first-class breeds. In pioneer days cattle were not selected for any special purpose other than those of the immediate needs of the family. Today the stock raiser studies his problem and specializes towards the best accomplishments of his needs with his stock as well as with anything else he owns. The dairyman selects a dairy breed, and the feeder selects his stock with that in view. Randolph county has, as a whole, excellently improved live stock.

One of the first things done after a settler had began to clear his land was to set out an orchard of fruit trees, consisting of apple, cherry, plum and peach trees. The first orchard is thought to have been planted by Henry H. Way, near Sampletown, west of Winchester, perhaps before 1820. Many orchards were early started, very few of them, however, being grafted or budded fruit. This process has been developed since our pioneer days. An interesting story is told of an eccentric character who traveled through the Mississippi valley years and years ago, planting apple seeds wherever he went, and in this way starting many orchards. This character was known as "Johnny Apple-seed." These orchards contained trees of the best varieties, and, strange to say, much better than have since been propigated. In this climate no longer do we enjoy the old-fashioned "bellflower," "wine sap," "rambo," "vanderburg pippin" or even the little June and "stripy," nor does the "grind stone" rest until March in the apple hole. The loss of the fruit trees is one of the most serious with which the farmer of today has had to contend. The trees are attacked by insects of such a destructive nature that it seems as if our orchards will be entirely exterminated if intelligent and heroic treatment is not given.

Another means of raising the standard of farming has been the agricultural society, or county fair. These county fairs were organized as early as 1852.

At a meeting held at the court-house in Winchester April 17, 1852, after an address by D. P Holloway, of Richmond, Indiana, an agricultural society was formed, and officers appointed as follows: President, Asahel Stone; vice-president, David Lasley; treasurer, Uriah Ball; secretary, John Lasley; directors, George W Daly, Washington; James Clayton, White River; Elza Lank, West River; James C. Bowen, Greensfork; Daniel Hill, Wayne; James Simmons, Jackson; Joab Ward, Franklin; Philip Barger, Green; J. B. Somerville, T. W. Reece, R. N. Butler.

The first fair was held October 14 and 15, 1852. The ground was one acre, a beautiful grove northwest of the town, near Judge Colgrove's former residence. It was fenced as follows: The boards were placed lengthwise, edge to edge, the fence being seven feet high, and it was held up by two upright posts at each end, and at the middle also, with the boards between the posts, and the posts fastened together by hickory withes near the top. The cost of preparing the ground was $30. The display was good, with a fine show of horses, cattle, jacks, jennets, swine, etc. The surplus receipts were $150. The number of members was 200. Fair was held September 29 and 30 and October 1, 1853. The weather was bad, but the show was good. Hon. Samuel W. Parker delivered an address. Nathan Hinshaw presented proof of having raised four acres of corn, producing at the rate of 146 6-7 bushels per acre, and Thomas W. Reece four acres at the rate of 115 bushels per acre. Receipts, $615.02; outlays—premiums, $184.25; expenses, $203; total outlay, $387.25; surplus, $227.77. This fair was held near Mr. Pomroy's, northeast of town. The officers of the society were: President, W. A. Peelle; secretary, John B. Goodrich; treasurer, George W. Monks; delegate to state board, Asahel Stone.

1854—Officers: President, Thomas W. Reece; secretary, John W. Cottom; treasurer, George W. Monks. Fair, October 12, 13, 14, 1854.

The association rented ground (seven acres) south of town for ten years, and inclosed it with an oak fence eight feet high. The weather was bad, the wheat and corn crops had been light and poor; but the display of animals was better than before, and the exhibit of fruit was fine. Daniel Hill showed a harrow and roller combined, which was considered a great improvement, and Carter Brothers exhibited buggies and carriages of very fine construction. One of them, a rockaway, was sold to Asahel Stone, Esq., and he has had it in use for more than thirty years.

1855—President, N. Kemp; vice-president, Asahel Stone; secretary, J. W. Cottom; treasurer, G. W. Monks. Fair, September 27, 28 and 29, 1855; large crowd; good display.

1856—Attendance small; display only moderate. There were some good horses, cattle and swine. President, T. W. Reece; treasurer, N. Kemp; secretary, J. W. Cottom.

1857—Receipts, $712.73; expenditures, $578.11; surplus, $134.62; society prospering; land leased; buildings erected and paid for. The grain crop was good. A field of corn of five acres yielded 134½ bushels to the acre. Fruit was fine, and the cattle, etc., good.

1858—The fair was held October 13, 14 and 15, 1858. The weather was rainy, but the crowd was large. As one result, the association got out of debt, with a surplus of several hundred dollars on hand. Among other fine exhibitions were a beautiful Durham cow, by David Heaston; a splendid bull, by H. K. Wright; a superior cow, by William D. Frazee, giving five gallons in the morning and four gallons at night, without extra feed, and upon poor pasture; one yearling by the same, which had never eaten an ear of corn, and was estimated to weigh 1,000 to 1,100 pounds. Exhibitors of sheep were Brotherton & Reed, Picket, Puckett and Hartman. Swine were shown by Thomas Robison, J. L. Shaw and H. D. Huffman. Fruits, dairy, honey, etc., by William Doty. Carriages and buggies by Carter & Craig. Premiums paid that year, amount, $500. President, James Clayton; treasurer, Nathaniel Kemp; secretary, N. P. Heaston; assistant secretary, W. D. Frazee; one director from each township. The records have been destroyed mostly up to 1868.

1863—J. A. Moorman and Nathaniel Kemp were delegates to the meetings of the State Board of Agriculture. 1868—Thomas W. Kizer was delegate to the same. A new association was formed February 20, 1867.

Article I. Object, to encourage agriculture. Article II. Name, Randolph County Agricultural, Horticultural and Mechanical Association. Article III. Stock, $5,000; shares, $25. Article V. Officers: President, vice-president, secretary, treasurer, executive committee of seven stockholders. Article VI. Officers elected for one year. Article VII. Stock may be increased to $10,000.

There seems to have been another association formed in 1871, and by this association a tract of ground was purchased of L. L. Heaston, consisting of twenty-two acres, occupying a part of the old fort of the Mound-Builders, and containing the great mound in the center of the ancient inclosure. The officers were: President, Pharez Hiatt; vice-president, William Robinson; treasurer, William Moore; secretary, Edmund Engle; executive committee, Joshua M. Johnson, Davidson Cheesman, Nathaniel P. Heaston, Moses Lasley, James Barnes, Nathan Fidler, Walter Scott Monks; superintendent, Asa Teal. The fair for 1871 was held September 24 to 27; 3,000 were present the second day; tickets sold in all, 5,625; receipts, $2,277.87; expenditures, $2,277.87.

1872—Crops poor; wheat averaged eight bushels, badly damaged; price, $1 to $1.40; corn, forty to forty-five bushels per acre; price, 25 cents; swine, good throughout the county, many weighing 300 to 400 pounds at twelve months; there was much fruit; fair held September 24 to 27; second day 3,000 were present; entries for 1871, 779; for 1872, 888; receipts for 1872, $1,480.35; expenditures, $1,480.35; debt of association, $1,000.

1873—Officers: President, Asahel Stone; vice-president, Joshua M. Johnson; treasurer, William Moore; secretary, Edmund Engle; executive committee, Asa Teal, Pharez Hiatt, Nelson Pegg, Nathan Fidler, Davidson Cheesman, James Barnes, Thomas W. Kizer; fair held September 23 to 26, 1873; 5,000 present the first day; receipts, $2,719.82; expenditures, $2,689.90; surplus, $29.92.

1874—Officers: President, Thomas W Kizer; vice-president, George Addington; treasurer, James H. Bowen; secretary, John L. Stakebake; executive committee, Jesse Connor, William Snyder, George W. Hamilton, Andrew Adams, William O. King, Moses Lasley, Lewis L. Heaston; fair held September 14 to 18, 1874; tickets sold, 5,176.

1875—Officers: President, Joshua M. Johnson; vice-president, Richard Bosworth; secretary, D. E. Hoffman; treasurer, John Brooks; executive committee, T. Tharp, Nelson Pegg, John S. McIntyre, Asa Teal, Andrew Adams, William O. King, Marcus D. Starbuck; fair held September 13 to 17, 1875; attendance good; display fair. Crops had been badly damaged by rain. Farmers are attending largely to draining their grounds.

1876—The fair for 1876 was the best ever held here, up to that time. Total entries, 800; horses, 124; cattle, 38; hogs, 40; poultry becoming an important entry; they are largely dealt in throughout the county; twenty tons were shipped by one firm in twenty days; the crops were fair to good.

1877—Fair held September 18 to 21; horse entries, 93—18 for speed; sheep and hogs, a fine display; poultry, a large show and a grand success; receipts, $2,032.20; grains good; potatoes splendid; fruits good though quantity small, owing to overgrowth the previous year.

1878—Officers: President, John Brooks; vice-president, Nelson Pegg; secretary, George S. Fisher; treasurer, Thomas W. Kizer; executive committee, Isom Sedgwick, George Hamilton, William Snyder, Aaron Harris, L. L. Heaston, George Addington; fair held September 17 to 20; weather good; entries, 1,500—more than ever before; attendance, third day, 5,000 people. Fruit was nearly a failure, because of a killing frost May 13. The wheat crop was the best ever raised. Corn crop was good, but hogs sold largely for $2.25.

1879—Fair held September 16 to 19; show of fruits excellent—the best ever made at this fair; 1,300 entries; 4,700 tickets sold, a reasonable success, though display and attendance not so great as at some previous fairs; balance of receipts, $400; entries of fruit alone, 343.

1881—Officers: President, Thomas W. Kizer; vice-president, William Ruble; treasurer, William Moore; secretary, A. R. Hiatt; executive committee, I. J. Farquhar, John Frazier, I. B. Branson, J. K. Martin, Nelson Pegg, E. R. McIntyre, Thomas Tharp.

RANDOLPH FAIR---WINCHESTER, 1881.

The fair for 1881 was held at the usual time and place, and would probably have been a substantial success but for the week of rain, which threw a wet blanket over its affairs and of course greatly checked attendance upon its exhibition, and, moreover, seriously interfered with the amount of its receipts.

The officers for 1881-82 are: John R. Frazier, president; William O. King, vice-president; A. R. Hiatt, treasurer; D. E. Hoffman, secretary; Messrs. Carter, Murray, Heaston, Kizer, Sheeley, Farquhar and Branson, directors.

The county fair began to deteriorate in 1882. Farmers no longer felt that it was profitable to display their stock and produce, as practically all the attention was paid to race horses and some forms of entertainment. The association struggled along until 1890, when it was decided to hold no more fairs. But they were again revived in 1895, but the character of the exhibits and of the fair in general was so notoriously bad that the edition of the Farmland Enterprise, Mr. W. C. West, in referring to it, spoke of it as the "grafter's reunion." The fair consisted mostly of shows of bad character and gambling devices.

The enterprise was again abandoned for a few years and another attempt was made in 1905, but the failure was as great as heretofore.

Since that time no attempt has been made to hold a county fair.

One of the best exhibits ever held in the county was held in Winchester in the fall of 1913, known as the "Home Coming." This meeting was attended by thousands of people all over the county. The exhibits of stock, horticulture, agriculture and art were exceedingly fine and much good was done by the meeting.

Fairs have been held at two other places in the county with a great deal of success. The Union City Agricultural and Mechanical Association was created January 10, 1870.

UNION AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL ASSOCIATION, UNION CITY, INDIANA.

The record of the first meeting does not appear, but the officers elected for the second year (chosen in November, 1870), were: J. N. Converse, president; J. M. Janes, vice-president; E. Starbuck, treasurer; W. C. Johnson, secretary. The first president is not known; the others were as follows: vice-president, J. M. Janes; secretary, C. J. Van Andy; treasurer, Edward Starbuck.

The directors, chosen November, 1870, were: L. Arnold, J. S. Johnson, J. McFeely, John Griffis, J. D. Smith, H. Debolt, James Woodbury. L. D. Lambert was secretary for many years; E. Starbuck was treasurer until his death, and Henry Stockdale succeeded him. The society was accommodated with suitable and commodious grounds for their annual fairs by a generous act of Dr. Joel N. Converse, securing to their use a tract of land containing forty acres by a free lease for the term of twenty years from April 1, 1870. The original capital stock was $2,000, in $10 shares. The stock was some years afterward enlarged to the limit of $10,000. All the old stock and 213 shares of the new stock has been taken. The territory embraced by the association is Randolph and Jay counties, Indiana, and Darke county, Ohio, and the Constitution provides that the directors shall be chosen from the two states in proportion to the stock held in each, with not less than three, however, in either state at any election. Betting, gambling, traffic in intoxicating drink, and all immoral shows are expressly prohibtted. The fairs held at Union City grounds have been mostly free to all the world.

The following is taken from "Tucker's History":

"The first fair was held in the fall of 1870, and was a reasonable success; and a fair has been held each year since that time. The interest has varied from season to season, yet the stockholders and managers have felt satisfied that the enterprise that they have in hand is a good and praiseworthy one, and that a healthful effect has been produced upon the community through their means. The presidents have been Messrs. Converse, Janes, Branham, Smith, Reeder and Parent, and possibly others. The vice-presidents have been Messrs. Janes, Elston, Smith, Reeder, Morris and Jaqua, and perhaps others. The managers have been Messrs. Johnson, Arnold, Woodbury, Griffis, J. D. Smith, McFeely, Debolt, Turner, Parent, Trine, Buckingham, Wiggs, Stockdale, Mills, Trine, Grants, Morton, Hamilton, Shockney, Kunkle, Hall, and perhaps others."

This fair had to compete with Winchester on the west, Portland on the north and Greenville on the east, and was not a financial success. They battled against odds until early in the '80's when the stockholders decided to discontinue the enterprise. It is said the meetings were well attended and that the interest was good. It is said the crowd on one day in 1881 numbered at least eight thousand people. But the county fair degenerated into amusements and horse racing and lost the respect of the people from whom its support must come.

PATRONS OF HUSBANDRY.

In 1872 the farmers of the county held meetings throughout the region to discuss the merits of that order lately established in the county.

In March, 1873, Round Top Grange, No. 85, was established. Before the middle of 1874 twenty-seven granges were organized in Randolph county, with from 900 to 1,100 members. The Randolph County Council of Patrons of Husbandry was organized November 8, 1873, with Nathan Fidler as president, and B. F. Willmore as secretary. The object of the council was to impart instruction as to the inner work of the order, and for general supervision over its affairs. June 24, 1875, Henley James, master of the state grange, met a company of masters, past masters and matrons at Winchester and organized Randolph Pomona Grange, No. 2, installing I. J. Farquhar, master; Isom Sedgwick, secretary; William Ruble, treasurer; the work of organizing, however, being completed August 31, 1875. In 1876 the statistics of the order were as follows: First grange instituted March, 1873; twenty-seven granges established; three disbanded; four consolidated; lodges in operation, twenty—aggregating several hundred members.

Since 1876 the growth has not been apparent. In fact, for some reason, all of the granges have ceased active operations.

The objects of the order were "the increase of acquaintance and sociability among farmers and their families, growth in intelligence as to business and the farming interests of the country, consultation as to the best means of sustaining the prices of farmers' products and lowering the cost of farmers' supplies, and, in general, the promotion of the welfare, prosperity and success of the farming population of the country, home life training, beautifying and ennobling farm life, sweetening, refining and purifying the minds of the community at large."

Pleasant Grove Grange, No. 226—(Two miles north of Spartanburg)—This grange was organized June 28, 1873, by Thomas W. Reece, with twenty male members and ten females. The officers were as follows: James Rubey, master; C. F. Alexander, overseer; James Macy, lecturer; Levi Snyder, steward; J. W. Jackson, assistant steward; Emsley Jackson, treasurer; J. F. Middleton, secretary; Alfred Rubey, gatekeeper; Jennie Jackson, Ceres; Mrs. Hannah Wise, Pomona; Carrie Rubey, assistant lady steward.

The grange had a neat and convenient hall, which was dedicated by a picnic June 27, 1874, as also with addresses by Henley James, master of the State Grange, and by Messrs. Willmore and Fidler, of Randolph county. A large and interested crowd was present. Other granges were: Sugar Creek, organized July 31, 1873; New Dayton, organized 1873; Pleasant Grove, organized 1873; Pleasant Mound, South Salem; Jackson, Jackson township; Parker, Monroe township; Green township.

For many years the movement seems to have been from the country to the town, and much study is being displayed in how to prevent this movement. What the solution of the problem will be no one knows, but it is certainly to be hoped the question will be solved and that speedily.

Randolph county ranks high in its products of agriculture, being one of the leading counties of the state.

The statistics for 1910 show there were 20,652 acres of wheat, yielding an average of 14.99 bushels per acre; 67,015 acres corn, yielding 37.8 bushels per acre; 29,637 acres oats, yielding 31.82 bushels per acre, ranking tenth in the state in acreage; 807 acres of rye, with a yield of 11,832 bushels; 346 acres potatoes, yielding 21,192 bushels; 883 acres tobacco, yielding 609,946 pounds, ranking ninth in acreage and ninth in product; 71 acres tomatoes, yielding 250 tons; 11,260 acres timothy, yielding 12,382 tons; 96 acres alfalfa, yielding 159 tons; 20,549 acres clover, yielding 22,770 tons of hay and 4,436 bushels of seed, ranking eighth in the state in acreage and eighth in yield; 1,703 horses sold during 1910 for $207,661.00, leaving on hand 9,527, worth $930,596.00; 112 mules sold for $11,890.00, leaving 263 on hand, worth $30,160.00; 6,846 cows, valued at $226,843.00, produced 2,700,456 gallons of milk and 714,080 pounds butter, ranking eighth in the state in number of cows; 15,933 head of cattle on hand, worth $412,906.00; 5,341 head sold for $188,589.00, ranking eighth in state on number of cattle; 539 cattle died of disease, being the highest number of any county in the state; 54,410 hogs sold for $783,827.00, leaving on hand 39,853 head, worth $323,472.00; 1,343 died of disease and were valued at $12,268.00. We ranked ninth in the state as to number of hogs on hand and eighth as to number sold; 9,166 head of sheep on hand, worth $43,592.00; 5,272 sold for $26,761.00, 443 died of disease; wool clip, 47,540 pounds, worth $9,997.00. All kinds of poultry sold, 8,795 dozen, for $45,334.00; 15,315 laying hens, valued at $7,200.00, eggs produced 1,262,354 dozen, valued at $237,816, ranking second in the state in number of laying hens and fifth as to the amount of their products.

Of Randolph county the Department of Statistics said the following: "The county is known for its splendid farms, improved roads, magnificent school buildings, having perhaps the best of any county in the state, and its intelligent and progressive citizenship."

CHAPTER XIII.

TRASPORTATION—RAILROAD BUILDING AND FREIGHTING.

Transportation has been one of the greatest as well as one of most difficult problems that has ever confronted a people in a new country. At first the travel was by foot or horse and only paths or trails were used for their purposes. Paths were blazed through the forest, trailing in and around hills, so as to make the best possible footing, paying little or no attention to distance. The few articles of commerce, that were imported into the country, were brought by horses or carried upon the shoulders of men, hence the few trails were sufficient to meet the needs of the people. Wagons and carts were used but little as it was impossible to get them through the country. The paths gave way to the trails, and the trails became public highways. These highways were merely places cut through the forest, with stumps being left where they stood, no attention whatever being paid to straightening or grading the road. All that was necessary was to have some way to go.

There were two general places of trade; one at New Orleans, the other Cincinnati. The New Orleans trade was carried to the Mississinewa, on horses, and there loaded into flat boats and floted down the Mississinewa river in the spring freshet.

Joab Ward was a flat boat builder of that region. He commenced building boats as early as 1835 and did a thriving business for a great many years. The Mississinewa had been declared a navigable river and was kept somewhat free from snags by the road supervisor, whose duty it was to work the men of his district upon the river. The men who lived within two miles of the river were presumed to work at least two or three days per year to keep the river-bed clear.

Ridgeville and Deerfield were considered the headwaters of navigation, so Mr. Ward took to building boats and selling them to people to take their produce down the river. He would build a boat forty feet long by ten feet wide, at sixty-two and one half cents a foot, that is twenty-five dollars for the boat, all ready for floating. He would cut the timber green from the woods, have two heavy side pieces sloped rounding upward at both ends, cut a gain in the lower edge to receive the end of the plank, which formed the bottom, pin the bottom plank to the side and middle beam, fasten on some piece of plank at the top of the gunwale, so as to increase the depth of the boat, making it perhaps two feet, stop up the cracks and she was ready to receive her load and to float her along her downward way. This flat boating could be done only in times of flood. It is said that Mr. Ward built as high as thirty-seven boats in one year. He used to hire hands to work for him and board them at twelve and one-half cents a meal. Mr. Edwards Edger was one of the men who used to buy produce and take it to New Orleans on boats built by Mr. Ward.

Mr. Edger had been a boatman all his life and knew exactly how to load a boat so as to "jump the dam." His brother-in-law, Mr. Searle, did not understand this art and hence the boat which he attempted to take down the river was capsized while jumping the McKinney dam at Fairview. It is said that Mr. Searle lost something like two thousand dollars worth of produce at that time. Many years afterwards, when the abutments were being placed at the Fairview ridge, the workmen found a part of the old boat which Mr. Searle had lost, perhaps in the year 1839. But as transportation became better for wagons, the flatboat business became poor and finally disappeared. The state had opened up many highways and had improved them so that wagons could be drawn to Piqua and Hamilton, Ohio, and carry large loads. The merchants of Randolph county would employ teamsters to haul loads of all kinds of produce to either Piqua or Hamilton and from there to Cincinnati. Upon their return they would bring a load of merchandise which was to be sold or traded for other produce. One of the early merchants, Mr. Cottom, kept a man, a Mr. Ashton, constantly in his employ, hauling produce to Hamilton and returning with a cargo which Mr. Cottom would purchase at Philadelphia, bring overland to Pittsburg, and then down the Ohio to Cincinnati, where they would be gotten by Mr. Ashton and brought to Winchester.

Travel at that time was very difficult and Mr. Ashton was weeks in making some of his trips. This is not to be wondered at when we think of the character of the roads, over which he had to travel, especially in the spring of the year. So deep was the mud that it often required four or six horses to pull a load of only a few hundred pounds. At times it became necessary to build log strings of causeway or corduroy roads so that the roads would be passable at all. It is said that sometimes logs as much as two feet in diameter would have to be put in these places. Poles would then have to be put between the logs, at the top, and the whole covered with dirt. The dirt would, of course, wash off leaving the very rough road over which the horses and wagons must travel. But this was by far better than the mud and looked upon as a splendid road at that time. Even the streets of Winchester were at times almost impassable. Mr. Cottom tells the story that while he was in business, a man came through Winchester with a hour-horse team, pulling a few plows. These had been made in Delaware, Ohio, and the freighter was carrying them to Anderson. On the south side of the court-house the mud was so deep that the horses could not pull the light load along; the man became angry and in his fit of anger sold the plows to Mr. Cottom.

Small streams were bridged and eventually the larger streams received a similar attention. The corduroy road, however, suggested an improvement that is known as plank road. Plank roads were built in a great many places over the state but never in Randolph county. Road improvement was a very serious one, not only for the county and townships, but for the state as well. The state realized that if the people were to be happy and progressive they must have means of transportation. As early as 1820 great thoroughfares were provided for all over the state. Randolph county was fortunate in being the center of a number of these roads, as the state provided for a 3 per cent state road fund to be used in their construction.

There were at least five of these state roads starting from Winchester. The first was the "Winchester and Greenville road", the next was the "Winchester and Indianapolis road." This road was to start at the Ohio line, come by way of the Greenville road to Winchester, then by the road that is known as the Winchester and Windsor pike, then the nearest and best way to Indianapolis.

John Foster, who lived near Bartonia, was to be the commissioner. The "Lawrenceburg and Winchester road" was to lead from Lawrenceburg to Brookville, to Connersville, to Centerville, and thence to Winchester. This road was not to be over sixty feet wide and was never built as a state road. It is what is now known as the Bloomingsport pike. The next road was the "Winchester and Portland road." This road led through Deerfield and was surveyed as far as Berne by the Hon. Jere Smith. Another road was the "Winchester and Newcastle road." This was to start at Winchester and go in a southwesterly direction until it struck the Jacksonburg road in West River township. This is now known as the "Bundy pike." The Greenville road was used more than any other for freighting as it led directly to Piqua, Ohio. However, the first road, petitioned for in the county, the road now known as the Lynn pike, was used a great deal, as it led to Hamilton, Ohio.

The above mentioned roads received more attention in the early history of the country than any other roads because of the fact that they were great routes of freighting from Winchester. There were, however, some other important freight routes through the county. One was the angling road from Union City to Deerfield and Ridgeville, and one from Greenville, Ohio, to Marion. These roads were used more by settlers or emigrants than by freighters; they also became the early postal routes of the county, especially the Winchester, Richmond and Ft. Wayne road. It was not only necessary to haul the freight by wagon from Winchester to other places but it was also necessary to drive all the live stock to Cincinnati or Piqua, Ohio, for sale.

Great flocks of turkeys would be driven, as well as great droves of hogs and cattle. This necessitated good roads just as much as the freighters needed them.

Many interesting stories are told of the early freighters driving their herds to Cincinnati. Regular stopping places were provided for along the way, at which they would stop to water and feed the stock. It sometimes took as much as from three to four weeks to take a drove of hogs from Winchester to Cincinnati. One would think, at first thought, that turkeys would be exceedingly difficult to drive, but this was not true. It is said they were easier controlled than any other kind of live stock driven in herds. Geese were also driven the same way.

With such great inconveniences as these it is no wonder that people heralded with great joy the news that steam roads were to be built in this county. Great stories had been told of these wonderful iron horses, running on iron rails, and many a settler became a "Doubting Thomas", when told of the wonderful news.

Hon. O. H. Smith, in his Early Indiana Trials and Sketches, tells the following amusing experience he had in the campaign of 1862. Mr. Smith was a candidate for Congress and had as an opponent the Hon. John Test, one of the strongest men of his day. He was a fine lawyer, a good speaker and had been in Congress three full terms. Mr. Smith found him a very worthy adversary, and says:

"The contest on my part looked, at first, almost hopeless. Stump speaking was just coming in fashion. The people met our appointments by thousands. The judge had his high character to aid him, and I brought to my aid a strong voice, reaching to the very extremes of the largest crowds. The judge went for the graduation of the public lands, and I went for home gifts to actual settlers. My position was the most acceptable to the masses. We met in Allenville, Switzerland county, on one occasion. The whole country was there. The judge was speaking and for the first time introduced the new subject of railroads. He avowed himself in favor of them, and said he had voted for the Buffalo and New Orleans road, and then, rising to the top of his voice, 'I tell you, fellow-citizens, that in England they run cars thirty miles an hour, and they will be run at a higher speed in America.' This was enough, the crowd set up a loud laugh at the expense of the judge. An old fellow standing by me, bawled out, 'You are crazy, or do you think we are fools, a man could not live a moment at that speed.' The day was mine, the judge had ruined his prospects by telling such an improbable story at that day."

The Indianapolis and Bellefontaine railroad was the first to be built in this county and was the second road to enter Indianapolis. The State Legislature passed a bill granting a charter to the Indianapolis and Bellefontaine railroad company permitting them to pass through this state. The original bill directed the road to be built directly east from Muncie to Union City. This would have established the road one and one-half miles north of Washington street in Winchester. The secret of it was, some parties had taken an option on land one and one-half miles north of Winchester and had secretly engineered the scheme to build the road there, knowing that the county-seat would eventually be established at that point on the railroad. The scheme was discovered at the very last moment, by some citizens of Winchester, and the bill was amended so as to compel the Railroad Company to build the road through Winchester. A reference to the map of the county will show that the course of the road was changed southeast at the west line of White River township. It was begun in 1848 but was not finished until 1853. Stock was subscribed for all over the state, many subscribers giving land instead of money.

It became the duty of the commissioners to have such land assessed or appraised, and in September of 1848 the board appointed Silas Colgrove to appraise the land subscribed as stock in the Indianapolis & Bellefontaine Railroad Company. It is very evident that bad feeling existed between the county commissioners and the railroad company. In November, 1850, the board was called in special session to consider the question of holding a special election in the county. The entry of that meeting is self explanatory and is as follows:

"And the board being called upon by the directors of the Indianapolis & Bellefontaine Railroad Company to call an election of the people of this county for or against the county commissioners taking not exceeding $12,000.00 stock in said railroad company, and after hearing the arguments of counsel for and against calling said election the board refused to call said election." It would seem that the directors of the company attempted to force the commissioners into taking stock and the commissioners justly relieved themselves of that responsibility.

Stock holders of the company became impatient and did not think they should pay tax upon the stock for which they had subscribed. This led to the following action being taken by the commissioners, June 10, 1852:

"Ordered by the board that the auditor in making of the duplicate of the taxes for the year 1852 strike out the stock of the Indianapolis & Bellefontaine Railroad Company charged against individual tax payers and that he enter the stock of said company as certified by the secretary and treasurer of said company in the aggregate against the president and directors of said company on the duplicate."

The commissioners did not lose any opportunities to assess them wherever possible. This is shown by assessing them to help pay for the bridge, just south of Farmland, in 1853. The road was completed about 1852 and much joy was expressed all over the country at its completion.

The road ran a free excursion from Union City to Indianapolis and hundreds of citizens availed themselves of the opportunity of taking a free ride, at the same time visiting for the first time the capital of their state. The excursion started about midnight and people went for miles to meet the train. No stations were established and the trains were stopped anywhere upon being flagged. This was true of the road for a great many years. All one had to do to stop the train was to flag it in the daytime with any kind of a flag, or wave a light at night.

The story is told that a little after daylight a woman came running out on the track waving her apron; the engineer stopped the train and the woman said to the conductor, "John wants to go but he hasn't yet finished his breakfast, just wait on him a few minutes and he will be ready." We don't know what the conductor said but John took the trip just the same.

No coaches were on this train, simply flat cars were used and boards place across the top of the side-boards for seats. Some of the cars had branches of trees put over them to provide a shade.

This was a wonderful experience in the history of the county as well as the experience of the people who made the first trip.

For many years a regular schedule was almost impossible; a train would come "about" on time, usually the "about" ended by the train being about two or three hours late. The engines were all wood burners. The wood was cut by men and hauled along the right-of-way and corded in long ricks, near the track, when the engine neared this fuel the train would be stopped and the trainmen would load the tender with wood. Thousands and thousands of cords of wood have been sold in this county to the railroad company.

Great stories are told of the dishonesty of the people cording this wood. It is said that one stump east of Farmland was regularly corded and measured in the body of the wood for something like five years before the company found it out. The engines threw sparks and set fire to a great many piles of wood, and the company gave free passages to many people who fought fire for them.

The writer of this article knows one man and woman who had a life time pass from Farmland to Indianapolis because of the great amount of fuel they had saved the road by putting out fire.

While the work was progressing rapidly upon the Indianapolis & Bellefontaine Railroad, the Dayton & Union Railroad was also being built. It was the intention to make Union City the conjunction of the two roads, and by pushing the work to the utmost the track layers of the Dayton & Union entered Union City, Christmas Day, December 25, 1852. It is said that on that day the rails extended about one foot upon Indiana soil. The Indianapolis & Bellefontaine road was also nearly completed to Union City and in a few days after this Dayton & Union was completed; the two tracks were joined. And on January 24, 1853, the first through passenger train went from Dayton, by way of Union City, to Indianapolis.

R. A. Wilson was the first station agent for the two roads. He also was agent for the Pan-Handle.

The Cincinnati & Ft. Wayne Railroad Company was organized in 1853 and the survey made through the county that year.

In June the board of commissioners rented a room in the court-house to this company to be used as an office. The original survey of the road contemplated its being built along Meridian street. This would take it on the west side of the court-house.

In September of 1853 Moorman Way and others filed a remonstrance against the board of county commissioners granting the right-of-way to Meridian street in the town of Winchester to the Cincinnati & Ft. Wayne Railroad Company, to construct a railroad, thereon, through said town of Winchester. This led to quite a discussion but eventually the railroad company agreed to go one square west, and the curve just south of Winchester from Meridian street one square west, and the curve in the north part of town where the track is taken one square east to Meridian street is due to the compromise between the commissioners and railroad company at that time. This railroad afterwards became a part of the Pennsylvania system and is now known as the Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad.

The story is told that when this company was organized old William Parry went to New York to consult with Jay Cook in the matter. The office boy of Cook informed him (Cook) that an old Quaker wished to see him. Mr. Cook, anticipating some fun, told the boy to show him in. Mr. Parry introduced himself and said that he understood that Mr. Cook knew how to build a railroad without money, meaning of course, by the issuing or bonds. Mr. Cook became interested in the enterprise, through the sincerity of Mr. Parry, and eventually the company was organized and the project commenced. Mr. Parry became first president of the road, and the writer of this article remembers of one time being on a Grand Rapids train that stopped near the home of Mr. Parry and waited until he walked from his home to the train.

This railroad company met with some very severe reverses and was unable to provide funds for the completion of the road and as was customary by railroad companies of that period asked the public to contribute toward its construction; to this end the commissioners were asked to donate money, and on the 9th of December, 1865, made the following entry:

"Donation to Cincinnati & Ft. Wayne Railroad Company.

It is hereby ordered by the board of commissioners that the sum of Five Thousand ($5,000.00) Dollars, be, and the same is hereby donated to the Cincinnati & Ft. Wayne Railroad Company to assist in constructing said road. Said sum to be due and payable when the freight and passenger cars run through the county of Randolph."

This, however, did not satisfy the railroad company. It felt that the county should contribute much more than that to the road.

Many people of the county felt that it was not right to donate it out of the public county funds as the people in parts of the county, not traversed by the road, would receive little or no benefit.

Sufficient sentiment was created in this matter, that on the 22nd day of October, 1869, Thomas Ward and one hundred twenty-nine other freeholders of White River township petitioned the county commissioners to call a special election of the voters of that township to pass judgment upon the question of making an appropriation of $31,513.20 to aid in the construction of the Cincinnati, Richmond & Ft. Wayne Railroad in and through said township. (From $31,000.00 by taking stock in said company to that amount.)

The commissioners were satisfied that the petition had been properly signed by the requisite numbers of free-holders and ordered an election to be held December 7, 1869.

A similiar petition was received from A. McKew and forty-nine others, asking for an election to be held in Franklin township to appropriate $8,144.30.

John F. Hunt and thirty others filed a similar petition from Washington township, asking for an appropriation of $14,596.90. The total appropriations would be $54,000.00.

The election was held as ordered with the following results:

White River Township—Winchester precinct, 479 for the appropriation, 248 against. Maxville precinct, 9 for the appropriation, 61 against; making a majority of 179 for the appropriation.

Washington Township—Liberty precinct, 40 for the appropriation, 131 against; Lynn precinct, 63 for the appropriation, 70 against; making a majority of 98 against the appropriation.

Franklin Township—204 votes for the appropriation and 68 against it; making a majority of 136 for the appropriation.

Hoping that the sentiment in Washington township would be changed, another petition signed by James Barnes and forty-two other citizens and free-holders of Washington township, was presented the last of December, 1869. This petition was passed upon by the commissioners the 14th day of January, 1870. This petition called for an appropriation of $13,700.00. The commissioners acted favorably upon it and an election was held in Washington township on Tuesday the 1st day of March, 1870. The results of the election were:

Lynn precinct, 80 for the appropriation and 59 against; Liberty precinct, 41 for the appropriation and 164 against; making a majority of 102 in the township against the appropriation.

In June, 1870, the commissioners made a "levy of taxes for appropriation to aid in the construction of the Cincinnati, Richmond & Ft. Wayne Railroad, to be levied on the taxable property of White river and Franklin townships represent one percentum of the valuation of taxable property of said townships."

July 25, 1871, at a special session of the board the following order was made:

"The board having under consideration the matter pertaining to the proper dispensation of the amount heretofore collected in White River and Franklin townships for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the Cincinnati, Richmond & Ft. Wayne Railroad, through said townships, by taking stock in said road as authorized by a vote of the qualified voters of said townships at elections held therein on the 7th day of December, 1869—said board make the following order, towit:

"It is ordered by the board that the sum of seven thousand two hundred and fifty ($7,250.00) dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated out of the funds heretofore raised for that purpose in White River township, and also the sum of one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars in Franklin township is hereby appropriated making in all the sum of eight thousand two hundred and fifty dollars for the purpose of taking stock in the Cincinnati, Richmond & Ft. Wayne Railroad—said amount to be applied to aid in the construction of said railroad, through said townships, provided however, that the said sum of seven thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, and one thousand dollars, hereby so appropriated shall not be paid until certificate of stock in said railroad company shall have been made and issued for the full amount of said sums, respectively, and deposited with the treasurer of said county of Randilph to the credit and for the use of said townships of White River and Franklin. When said provisions shall have been fully complied with the auditor of said county is hereby authorized and directed to draw his warrants on the county treasurer in favor of the treasurer of said railroad company for said above named sums, amounting in all to eight thousand two hundred and fifty dollars ($8,250.00).

THOMAS CLEVENGER,
H. K. WRIGHT,
ELIHU CAMMACK."

This in a measure relieved the county of having to pay the $5,000.00 formerly donated, hence on Monday, March 3, 1873, the board rescinded the former order as follows:

"Ordered by the board that the order made by the board of commissioners, December 9, 1865, donating five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars to the Cincinnati & Ft. Wayne Railroad Company, to assist in constructing said road. Being made without authority of law. Be hereby rescinded annulled and expunged from said record."

The commissioners attempted to refund $8,023.07, with interest, to those assessed in White River and Franklin townships to pay the taxes voted for December 7, 1869, claiming that the said tax was "vitiated it by the efficiency in the auditors notice of said election." But the end of the trouble was not yet.

On the 8th of December, 1873, the commissioners were confronted with a new dilemma. It was shown them that at their June term, 1870, they had "pretended and attempted to levy a tax of $1.00 on each $100.00 of taxable property of the taxpayers, of White River township, and that in June, 1871, they had attempted to levy a tax of eighty-five cents on the $100.00. That these levies were placed upon the duplicate and delivered to the treasurer for collection and that the tax payers had paid the treasurer the tax upon the duplicate of 1870 and 1871, under protest, the sum of $12,823.59." That the commissioners had paid $7,250.00 of this money to the Cincinnati, Richmond & Ft. Wayne Railroad Company and that afterwards on the 8th of March, 1872, James J. Clayton, for himself and other taxpayers of White River township, had instituted suit against James H. Bowen, then treasurer of said county, to enjoin the collection of railroad tax and that the treasurer "was by said court enjoined on account of illegalities of said tax from collecting this tax."

The commissioners were asked to refund "pro rata to the tax payers who paid said railroad tax" all of said tax in the hands of Simon Ramsey, the treasurer, the sum being $5,573.59. The commissioners ordered that this sum of money be refunded as asked for and attempted to do so December 9th when it was:

"Ordered by the board that the order of the board of commissioners, September 9th, 1873, refunding $8,023.07 of railroad tax collected to aid the construction of the Cincinnati, Richmond & Ft. Wayne Railroad and remaining in the hands of the county treasurer, be and the same is hereby rescinded on account of its defectiveness, and said money refunded in accordance with orders No. 96 and 97, on commissioner's record No. 5, December 9th, and 10th, A. D., 1873."

This order was, itself, defective and on the following day an effective order was made as follows: (This order was complied with by the county treasurer.)

"Ordered by the board that two thousand four hundred and forty-nine dollars and forty-eight cents ($2,449.48) of railroad tax, collected off of the tax payers of Franklin township, to aid in the construction of the C. R. & Ft. W. Railroad, and remaining in the hands of the county treasurer, be and the same is hereby refunded 'back' to all parties paying said railroad tax, in the same manner as set forth in order No. 96, commissioner's record No. 5, (see p. 65), refunding White river township railroad tax: That is to say: That there shall be refunded and paid to each and all taxpayers of Franklin township, who paid any of such railroad tax an equal rate per cent on the amount of such tax that each taxpayer paid into the county treasury, so that when each taxpayer entitled thereto shall have received his equal per cent on the amount he shall have paid, that said sum of $2,449.48 shall be exhausted: And the auditor is hereby ordered and directed on demand of any such taxpayer under this order, and in all other respects to carry out and comply with this order."

For many years no trains were run on first day, because of the conscientious scruples which the president, Mr. Parry, had upon that matter. It was originally intended to take the road directly north to Portland, which would have been through Deerfield. It is said that through the obstinacy of one or two men the road was changed to the present location. Had it not have been for the short-sightedness of these people Deerfield would no doubt today be as large or larger than the near by town, Ridgeville.

PAN-HANDLE RAILROAD.

The third road to be built in the county was the division of the Pan-Handle road, east of Union City. This road was first built from Columbus to Union City and was completed about 1866. At that time Union City was a terminus of this road. The western division or Union City to Logansport was built sometime later. The two roads have since been consolidated and are under the Pennsylvania system, one of the greatest railroad systems of the world.

This incorporation controls a great portion of the entire mileage of roads of the United States. This branch of the road is one of the principal trunk lines between Pittsburg and Chicago.

In 1911-12-13 the tracks were doubled and it is now one of the finest road beds of the world.

The Indiana, Bloomington & Western Railroad Company was organized in 1880 for the purpose of building a railroad from Indianapolis to Springfield, Ohio. In 1881 they asked subsidies of the townships in Randolph county to which they proposed to construct their railway.

Of Nettle Creek township they asked $10,000.00; West River, $12,000.00; Washington, $16,600.00, and Greensfork, $18,400.00.

On the 23rd of April, 1881, the commissioner met in special session to receive petition from citizens of these four townships. At that meeting they found the petition of West River and Greensfork townships defective on account of not being signed by the legally required number of freeholders. The petitions of Nettle Creek and Washington were held good.

They adjourned until the 25th of April when at a special session they found the petitions valid and appointed election inspectors at an election, which they ordered to be held on the 28th day of May.

The election was a hotly contested one and many a quarrel and dispute arose over the matter of the proposed road. The people of Spartanburg were told that if the subsidy was not voted for favorably in Greensfork township, the road would not pass through that town. The people thinking that the road would come anyhow used their efforts against voting for the tax and defeated it very decisively. To their sorrow they learned in a short time that the threat of the officials of the road was true and they were destined to be off the railroad for all times to come.

When the ballots were counted the following was found to be the result:

Names of Precincts	For the tax	Against the tax	Blank
Losantville	114	108	1
Bloomingsport	7	110	1
Rural	5	129	1
Lynn	48	79	4

It will be observed that Nettle Creek township was the only one to vote in favor of the tax.

Ordered that a tax of one per cent be levied on valuation of the real and personal property of Nettle Creek township, for the construction of the Indiana, Bloomington & Western Railroad, through said township.

The road was completed in due time but to do so it required that the ties be laid on brush or any material that could be thrown in some of the swamps near Modoc. In fact the first train attempting to go over the road was wrecked by the engine literally falling off the track. The train, however, passed over in time to enable the company to claim the subsidy which had been voted.

This road is now known as the Springfield division of the Big Four.

LAKE ERIE.

There has been attempts made to build roads in this county that were not successful. One was the Lake Erie & Louisville Railroad, which was organized under the laws of this state and proposed to cross this county on the line from Cambridge City to Union City. This road would cross Washington township and Wayne township diagonally, passing near Bloomingsport in the first and South Salem in the latter. Much work was done upon this road in the way of constructing the road bed and laying the ties upon which to place the rails. The old rails can yet be distinguished very clearly just at the north edge of Bloomingsport.

This road was sometimes called the "Calico" road. In order to help in its construction, Isaac P. Gray and many others, of Wayne township, petitioned the county commissioners to call an election in Wayne township to vote upon the question of giving a subsidy of $8,000.00 from that township to aid in building this road. The road was to be completed by the first day of August, 1871.

Nathan W. Johnson and a great many others filed a similar petition from Washington township. The commissioners found the petition correct and ordered an election to be held on Monday, the 18th day of July, 1870, at the polls of the several voting places of these two townships.

The result was as follows:

Liberty precinct, Washington township, 33 votes and 91 votes against the appropriation.

Lynn precinct, 64 votes for and 12 votes against the appropriation.

Wayne township, at Salem, 3 votes for and 944 were cast against the railroad appropriation.

At Union City, 263 votes were cast for and 109 votes cast against the railroad appropriation.

The returning board, from Washington township, made the following report:

Liberty precinct, thirty-three (33) votes were cast for the railroad appropriation and ninety-one (91) were cast against the railroad appropriation.

Lynn precinct, thirty-three (33) votes were cast for the railroad appropriation and twelve (12) votes were cast against the railroad appropriation.

At the Liberty precinct, ninety-one of the ballots that were cast had written thereon the words, 'against the appropriation:'

"At Lynn precinct twenty-five of the ballots that were cast had written thereon the words 'against the appropriation,' also three ballots that were cast at said election at Lynn having thereon the words 'against the railroad appropriation' were variously marked by writing and scribbling thereon in letters and characters other than the names of the persons voting the same."

From the above it would seem that elections had been very hotly contested. The canvassing board reported the election having carried in Wayne township and in Washington township they said:

"Whereby it appears and is hereby certified, that, at said election in Washington township the whole number of votes cast, was two hundred and sixty-three votes, ninety-seven votes for said railroad appropriation, thirty-one votes against said appropriation and one hundred thirty-five votes informal."

The results of this election stopped the building of this road and the enterprise was never pushed further. It has been a very unfortunate thing, indeed, that this is true because the road would have been of a great value to the country through which it would have passed.

BLUFFTON & UNION.

Another contemplated road was the Bluffton & Union. This road was first contemplated about 1855, when a railroad was contemplated from Union to Portland in Jay county. A great deal of the grading was done and some rails were said to have been laid but the project fell through at that stage. About 1866 it was revived, new stock was obtained, considerable more work was done and it was said that the road would be opened for travel in a short time.

The matter failed again, however, remained dormant until 1882. During the early part of that year the company was organized as the Bluffton & Union Railroad Company and asked for a subsidy from Wayne township and Jackson township, $22,500.00 from the former and $5,600 from the latter. The commissioners honored the petition and ordered an election held on the 24th day of July, 1882, for Wayne township and June 27, 1882, for Jackson township. It was thought by the voters that it would be sure to carry in Wayne township and that this might have a wholesome effect upon the voters of Jackson. The result would indicate their judgment very good.

Jackson Township	For tax	Against tax	Blank	Total
1st Ward U. C. pre.	215	4	2	221
2nd Ward U. C. pre.	270	7	5	282
3rd Ward U. C. pre.	179	44		223
Harrisville	4	100		104
Bartonia	2	59		61
Jackson	113	47		160

From the above it will be seen that a great majority of both townships favored it. It is also the significant fact that in Wayne township the two country precincts were almost unanimous in their opposition. The vote being only six in favor of the appropriation and one hundred fifty-nine against.

Elections were being held at the same time in Jay county and the opposition was so great that the vote did not carry. Hence the project was given up and a new board was devised. It was then decided to build a road from Union City by way of Camden, Antioch, Boundary City and New Pittsburg to Bluffton. This would have it pass through Franklin township and to this end Henry C. Kitselman and fifty others petitioned the commissioner on the 17th day of July, 1882, to hold an election in Franklin township, for the purpose of ascertaining if the voters would donate $12,000.00 to the proposed road.

The election was held on Tuesday, August 17, 1882, and resulted as follows:

	For tax	Against	Blank	Total
Ridgeville	219	74	1
Walnut Corner	6	111	0

Making a total of 225 for and 185 against the appropriation.

This like the others, however, was a failure and nothing more was done towards the building of the road.

CHICAGO, UNION CITY & CINCINNATI.

In the early part of 1891 the Chicago, Union City and Cincinnati Railroad Company was organized, the purpose of which was to build a road on the old right-of-way out of Union City. Again a subsidy was asked for and an election held in Wayne township and Jackson township, July 7, 1891, which resulted as follows:

	For tax	Against	Blank
Union City Pre. A.	132	41
Union City Pre. B.	106	42
Union City Pre. C.	87	34
Union City Pre. D.	121	41
Bartonia	4	107
Harrisville	4	131

From which it will be noticed as before that the city favored the subsidy while a majority of the voters of the country were radically opposed to it.

At Pittsburg, Jackson township, 78 were for, 55 opposed. At Thursden 10 were for, 116 opposed.

This made the result in Wayne township 454 for and 399 opposed. Jackson township 88 for and 171 opposed, making a total of 542 for and 570 opposed in the two townships. This was the last of the Chicago, Union City and Cincinnati Railroad Company.

UNION CITY AND HUNTINGTON.

This project, however, could come to life oftener than the proverbial cat for in the latter part of 1895 the Union City and Huntington Railroad Company was organized with the same old view in mind. They asked for a subsidy in Wayne township and on April 14, 1896, the election was held with the following result:

	For Tax.	Against.	Blank.
Precinct A	126	48
Precinct B	141	48
Precinct C	121	49
Precinct D	108	45
Bartonia	7	129
Harrisville	2	141

It will be observed that the results were very similar to those of former elections. This, so far as we are able to ascertain, has been the end of building railroad out of Union City northwest.

CINCINNATI, RICHMOND AND MUNCIE.

The only remaining steam road to be built in the county was the Cincinnati, Richmond and Muncie Railroad which passes through Losantville. This road is sometimes called the "Crooked Road to Muncie," and any one having ridden over it will readily see the application of the name. It was built in 1900, but was not a financial success and went into the hands of a receiver February 13, 1908, at which time James P Goodrich, of Winchester, was appointed receiver.

Mr. Goodrich was able in less than four years to put the road upon a sound financial basis and satisfy the United States federal authorities that he had performed his duty well. The road was sold to the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company of Indiana.

When one stands near a railroad today and sees the monster engines go past at the rate of sixty, seventy or eighty miles an hour pulling passenger trains having from five to fourteen coaches; and freight trains from fifty to one hundred coaches, it is almost impossible to imagine the condition when the roads were first built.

Trains of fifty loaded cars travel today at a high rate of speed where trains forty or fifty years ago used to "stick" with but few small cars.

No one factor has made rapid transit possible more than the air-brake. Formerly when a train was to be stopped, the engineer blew one long blast on the whistle, and the brakeman would run over the train or through the cars to the hand brakes and stop the train "by hand." This took quite a distance to stop a train with any speed. Today a train going seventy miles per hour will come to a stop in much less time than a train one-fourth its length would fifty years ago with a hand brake.

No factor has done more for the advancement of commercial interests than steam power, but a new power has come into existence. This great force, known to the world as electricity, is understood only through its effects.

Three electric lines have been planned to cross Randolph county; two of them not having been built. One of these was to be built from Richmond to Portland, passing through Lynn, Winchester and Ridgeville; the other was to be built from Richmond to Portland passing through Arba, Spartanburg, Union City and New Pittsburg. The other, built from Union City to Muncie, passing through Union City, Winchester, Farmland and Parker, of this county was built in ————, and is now a part of the Indiana Union Traction System. This road was heralded with as much joy as were the steam roads when they were built.

Rapid transportation trains every hour of the day, convenient express and freight service have popularized the electric railroad, and they are looked upon as being as indispensible as steam roads.

CHAPTER XIV.

BENCH AND BAR.

The memory of the life and work of a lawyer to a great degree passes away with his generation; our great judges are soon forgotten, and their names and work are preserved only in the pages of dry and musty reports of which the average man knows, and cares nothing. The very nature of the work of the lawyer and the jurist insures its speedy oblivion in the midst of the more spectacular achievements of the soldier, the executive, the inventor, the author and the statesman. How many of the citizens of our county can name a half dozen of the early judges and lawyers who were prominent in our county history? And yet they were men famous in their day, looked upon with something akin to awe by the rough makers of our pioneer civilization.

This chapter is written with a desire to do some measure of justice to the men who made the early legal history of the county and whose memories are rapidly fading, even among the members of the profession, and to preserve in a permanent form something of the work of our modern bench and bar which is equally as sure of oblivion in the near future. That this desire will be satisfactorily fulfilled is not even hoped, but we trust that we may be able to set forth in this chapter some information that will make it of value to both the legal profession and the public generally.

Indiana became a state in 1816, and Randolph county was formed during the legislature of 1817-1818, held at Corydon. It was carved out of Wayne county, which had been formed in 1810, and its boundaries were described as beginning at the intersection of the Ohio state line with the line dividing townships 16 and 17, thence westward to the old boundary, thence westward with the center line of the 18th township to the Indiana boundary, thence northward on the Indiana boundary to the Ohio line and thence south to the beginning, thus including all the territory north of Wayne county and east and south of the twelve-mile boundary. It was afterward changed for judicial purposes and contained at one time, the area now occupied by the counties of Delaware, Grant, Jay, Adams, Blackford, Wells and Allen, and an indefinite area, in which no county had then been organized, so that it is quite possible that at one time the courts of Randolph county had jurisdiction as far north as the present southern boundary of Michigan. Winchester was the county-seat from the first, being laid out in 1818, before either Indianapolis or Fort Wayne was established. The first court house was 18x24 feet, two stories high, and of hewn logs and the jail was a similar structure, to which entrance was gained by a ladder. The Hon. O. H. Smith, in his "Early Indiana Trials," gives an interesting description of the typical court room of that day. "The building," he says, "generally contained two rooms,—the court room being the largest,—at one end of which there was a platform elevated some three feet high, for the judges, with a long bench to seat them. These benches were very substantial in general, sufficient to sustain the most weighty judges. The bar had its benches near the table of the clerk, and the crowd was kept back by a long pole fastened with withes at the ends."

The state was divided into judicial circuits, each composed of a number of counties, and each presided over by the circuit, or as he was then called, the president judge. These judges moved about from one county to another in their circuits, holding court at the various county-seats, and Randolph was in the third judicial circuit. The president judges were appointed by the legislature and were invariably men well versed with the law, but the most interesting feature of our early judicial organization was the system of associate judges. Two associate judges were elected in each county by the people, and no legal knowledge was required of them; they sat with the president judge and each of them had equal power with him, a power which they often exercised in overruling his decision. The associates often carried on the business of the court in the absence of the president judge, the records often showing that after important cases had been disposed of he left the bench and they proceeded to the end of the term, ruling on pleadings, the meaning of which they had not the slightest idea. The average lawyer of those days was a man learned not only in the substance of the law, but also in its highly technical language, and the associates were often compelled to appeal to them to learn the meaning of terms used in the arguments and pleadings. Many of our early lawyers were men educated in eastern universities, who brought with them much of culture and refinement entirely foreign to our rude frontiersmen; they were looked upon as professional men indeed, invariably being the leaders of social and intellectual life of the community. The country was largely virgin forest and the population hardy and rough, and generally reckless. This latter characteristic is amply illustrated by the pages of the early court order books, on which a great amount of space is devoted to indictments for affray, riot, and assault and battery

The members of our present bar may find it hard to picture in their minds the practice of law under such conditions. The lawyers often traveled about the circuit with the president judge, riding horseback through the forests, fording streams and putting up at rough country taverns, and in spite of the scholastic atmosphere which surrounded the practice of law, it was not a sedentary pursuit by any means and its followers were apt to become physically hardy and vigorous like the people among whom they lived.

Mr. Smith gives an interesting picture of the early court days. "The 'crowds' at that day thought the holding of a court a great affair. The people came hundreds of miles to see the judges, and hear the lawyers 'plead' as they called it. On one occasion there came to be tried before the jury an indictment for an assault and battery against a man for pulling the nose of another who had insulted him. The court room was filled to suffocation. The two associate judges were on the bench. The evidence had been heard and public expectation was on tip-toe. All was silent as death, when my young friend, then 'squire', afterward Judge Charles H. Test, rose and addressed the court: 'If the court please.' He was here interrupted by Judge Winchell from the bench: 'Yes, we do please; go to the bottom of the case, young man. The people have come in to hear the lawyers plead.' The young squire, encouraged by the kind response of the judge, proceeded to address the jury some three hours in excited eloquence upon the great provocation his client had received to induce his docile nature to bound over all legal barriers and take the prosecutor by the nose. All eyes were upon him, and as he closed, Judge Winchell roared out, 'Capital; I did not think it was in him!' The jury returned a verdict of not guilty amid the rapturous applause of the audience. Court adjourned, and the people returned home to tell their children that they had heard the lawyers 'plead.' "

It may be noted that until the constitution of 1851 the common law of England was largely the law of our state, and that the library of the average "backwoods" lawyer consisted generally of a work on common law pleading, the few Indiana statutes then in force and the volumes of Blackford's reports, all of which were easily carried from place to place.

Randolph county was a part of the third judicial district until 1830, when it was made a part of the sixth circuit, it was changed to the eleventh district in 1838, and it now constitutes the twenty-fifth judicial circuit. All the probate business of the county was transacted by the associate judges of the circuit court until 1829, when the legislature created probate courts. In 1831 a separate probate court was established for each county, presided over by a single judge, and this situation continued until 1852, when the court was abolished by the legislature. No separate court of chancery ever sat in Randolph county, and no circuit court has always exercised chancery jurisdiction. The English chancery forms were universally used until 1852, when distinctions between law and equity were abolished, and since which time there has been no distinct chancery side of our circuit courts. In 1852 the same legislature which abolished the probate courts created a court of common pleas for each county in the state, presided over by a separate judge, and Randolph county had a common pleas court until it was abolished in 1873. The common pleas court had jurisdiction of all matters formerly taken charge of by the probate courts, and in addition could try all cases except for libel, slander, breach of marriage contract, action on official bond, actions involving title to real estate and actions involving more than $1,000, the circuit court having exclusive jurisdiction of all such excepted actions.

Except in certain classes of cases, specifically designated by statute, which are tried before justices of the peace, mayors of cities, and county commissioners, all legal practice in Randolph county is now confined to the circuit court.

The first court held in Randolph county was on October 12, 1818, at the house of William Way, before William Edwards and John Wright, associate judges. The first action of the court was to admit James Rariden to the bar and appoint him prosecuting attorney. A grand jury was empanelled, retired and returned to report no indictments; the grand jury was discharged and court adjourned. Charles Conway was clerk of the court, and sessions were held at his house until the court house was built. Court sat but once in 1818 and twice in 1819, and at the September term, 1819, John Watts, the president judge of the circuit, presided. That our sturdy pioneers were not slow in airing their domestic difficulties in court is evidenced by the fact that a bill for divorce was filed at the June term, 1820; the bill was evidently defective, however, as it was dismissed on a demurrer filed by prosecutor Rariden, who received an allowance of $10.00 for his services. The prosecutor was allowed $12.00 per term, and the associate judges $2.00 a day, for their services at this time. In October, 1820, court met at the court house for the first time, and in October, 1821, the Hon. Miles C. Eggleston, of whom O. H. Smith has written many interesting anecdotes, sat as president judge. The first indictment returned, was in October, 1820, and was, as might be expected, for an affray, and in April, 1822, six indictments for assault and battery were returned. The records show that an indictment was returned against Henry Smith and Jesse Gray for murder, and this case stood on the docket until February, 1825, when it was nolle prossed.

At this time the business of the court consisted largely of actions on the case, civil and criminal trespass, assault and battery, riot and affray, and the chancery side of the court was occupied by actions concerning real estate where publication of notice to non-residents was ordered. It is interesting that all publications went to the Richmond Weekly Intelligencer, there being no newspaper in Randolph county. Fort Wayne, then a village of two hundred inhabitants, was in Randolph county at that time and one Alexander Ewing was licensed in this court to keep a tavern in Fort Wayne. At the February term, 1825, Oliver H. Smith (the author of "Early Indiana Trials"), produced his commission and was sworn in as prosecuting attorney of the third judicial district. Charles H. Test, who afterward became judge, was sworn in as prosecutor in August, 1827.

At the February term, 1832, with judge Charles H. Test presiding, and William Edwards and John Wright still serving as associates, rules of court were adopted, some of which are so interesting as to require mention here.

Rule 2 provides that it shall be "the duty of the bailiff to take the petit jury to their place of retirement, there to keep them without meat or drink, water excepted."

By rule 3 the bailiff is charged with the duty of keeping "the most profound silence amongst the bystanders" and "to prevent all persons not having business from coming within the bar."

Rule 7. "The members of the bar shall be once called aloud by the sheriff at the door of the court house immediately after the opening of the court and before the minutes of the preceding day are read and signed."

Rule 9. "If one attorney shall interrupt another in the examination of a witness by asking a question or in any other manner except by rising in his place and regularly objecting to the court he will be punished."

These remarkable rules further provide that if any attorney wander from the point in argument he will be stopped; that on the calling of the docket attorneys shall be given precedence according to the dates of their licenses; that no bill of exceptions containing any part of the evidence in a cause will ever be signed unless the party excepting will reduce the evidence to writing before the witness retire from the bar or the bill is agreed to by the opposing counsel; that "not more than two counsel will be allowed to argue a cause to the jury on each side, nor in civil cases will common law authorities be read to the jury by the counsel unless by the special permission of the court first obtained."

Members of the profession will find a peculiar interest in these rules, and it may be that the administration of justice would be facilitated, and greater respect for our courts imbued in our people, were some of them in force today. Reference to the order books demonstrates that these rules were, at least at times, rigidly enforced.

Indictments for betting, gaming, retailing liquors without license, assault and battery, malicious mischief and vending foreign merchandise, bills for divorce and specific performance of law contracts on the chancery side of the court, and actions for debt and on the case on trespass of various kinds, constituted the chief business of the court for many years, and at the September term, 1840, there were no less than forty criminal cases on the docket. Court business had increased until in 1839 the April term lasted from April 22nd until May 3rd. The murder trial of James Holland occupied the time of the court from May 16th to the 21st in 1838, and the "pleading" of the lawyers, lasting two days, must have given rare entertainment to our citizens. The action of ejectment, or as it was then known, "ejectione firmae," held no small place on our early dockets, quite a different action from the modern action of that name, and is well illustrative of the subtleties and complexities of common law pleading, with which our early lawyers were necessarily familiar. Following is a typical case: John Doe, ex demise John Morrison vs. Richard Roe; September term, 1844. Mr. Doe in his complaint sets out that on August 21st John Morrison leased certain real estate to him for ten years; that he, Doe, entered upon the real estate and then on the very day the defendant Richard Roe, who happened to be strolling that way, entered also and put off poor Doe, "with force and arms." Attached to this complaint against Roe is a note as follows: "Mr. Joseph Merryfield: I am informed that you are in possession of or claim title to the premises in the foregoing declaration of ejectment, and I being sued in this action as casual ejector only and having no claim whatever to the same, advise you to appear on the 1st day of the next term of the Randolph Circuit Court to cause yourself to be made defendant in my stead; otherwise I shall suffer default and you will be turned out of possession. Your loving cousin, Richard Roe." Mr. Merryfield, being served with this notice by the sheriff, hastens into court and applies to the court for permission to be made defendant in this case, thus proving that, unlike his loving cousin Roe, he is somewhat interested in the result. The court thereupon allows Mr. Merryfield to enter as a defendant, upon condition that he plead by simply making a denial of the complaint, and that at the trial he shall confess that John Morrison went on the land in question and there executed a lease for ten years to John Doe and that the mischievous Roe thereupon pushed Doe off and took possession himself. Mr. Merryfield will do all these things and get himself substituted for Roe as defendant at the trial and the action will proceed with the question solely one of title between Morrison and Merryfield. It is then apparent that the controversy has been there all the time, that Morrison has claimed title to a farm which Merryfield thinks belongs to him. Morrison, in order to try his claim, sues the other in ejectment; but the common law action of ejectment is one for possession of real estate, has had a peculiar history, and must be carefully handled, so these two men, aided by their diligent attorneys, go through the form of confessing that John Doe has a lease from Morrison and that Roe has dispossessed him. By the process shown above, the battle between the straw men is gradually narrowed down until at the trial poor Doe and Roe are entirely neglected and the two real parties proceed to try their claims to the land.

The action of ejectment was a once common one, and the order books furnish plenty of examples like the above, but the new laws in 1852 abolished all legal fictions and retired Doe and Roe to oblivion.

The following interesting item appears among the minutes of the court made on May 2nd, 1840: "Robert Way is allowed 75 cents for hauling two loads of saw dust to put on the court house floor during the present term of court."

On August 14, 1844, Adam Fey, a German, filed in court a declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and on September 5th, following he was placed on trial for the murder of Heltz, his son-in-law. Martin M. Ray, William Ray, Silas Colgrove and Beattie McClelland were assigned by the court to defend him, and John Davis was prosecutor; the trial lasted six days, Fey was convicted and sentenced to be hanged, and his attorneys were allowed $20.00 each for their six days' work. Fey's sentence was afterward commuted to life imprisonment and he committed suicide in prison.

The new rules of court, adopted in 1846, provided that each applicant for license to practice law must furnish a certificate of good moral character and that "he has read law diligently under the direction and tuition of some reputable practising attorney at least one year." Unfortunately, our present constitution prevents any such qualification as the latter.

A condition which the modern lawyer may find it difficult to appreciate is illustrated by the following entry, made at the spring term, 1851: "Ordered by the court that the clerk keep the copy of Blackford's Reports furnished by the state for the use of this court, safely in his office during the vacations of this court, to be kept safely locked up."

The first sessions of the probate court presided over by John Wright and William Edwards, associate judges of the circuit court, were held at the houses of Paul Way and Charles Conway, and the first business transacted was the binding of Anthony Way, a minor son of Huldy Way, by his guardian, Jonathan Ozborn, to Thomas Frazier, "to learn the art of labor or husbandry," until he should arrive at his majority.

The associate judges of the circuit court carried on the probate business of the county until 1831, when the legislature gave it a separate probate court. James T. Liston was its first judge, serving from 1831 to 1833, then Zachariah Puckett, 1833-1834; Smith Elkins, 1834-1836; Edmund B. Goodrich, 1836-1842; Beattie McClelland, 1842-1849, and George Debolt from 1849 until the court was abolished by the legislature in 1852.

The president judges, or as they were afterward known and are now known, the circuit judges, in the order of their service in the Randolph Circuit Court are as follows: John Watts, 1818-1821; Miles C. Eggleston, 1821-1830; Charles H. Test, 1830-1836; Samuel Bigger, 1836-1839; David Kilgore, 1839-1846; Jeremiah Smith, 1846-1852; Joseph Anthony, 1852-1855; Jeremiah Smith, 1855-1858; Jehu T. Elliott, 1858-1864; Silas Colgrove, 1864-1870; Jacob M. Haynes, 1870-1873; John J. Cheney, 1873; Silas Colgrove, 1874-1879; Leander J. Monks, 1879-1894; Garland D. Williamson (by appointment), from October to close of year 1894; Albert O. Marsh, 1894-1902; John W. Macy, 1902-1908; James S. Engle, 1908-1914.

John Watts, the first president judge of this circuit, was a Baptist preacher, characterized by O. H. Smith as a man of strong, clear mind, friendly to all, and always courteous to the bar.

Miles C. Eggleston, the next judge, presided over the third judicial circuit, which extended from the county of Jefferson on the south to the state of Michigan on the north, some 200 miles, and from the Ohio line on the east to White river on the west near where Indianapolis is now located. Judge Eggleston was one of the most prominent and popular of the early Indiana jurists, and many interesting stories of him are told by Mr. Smith. He was an able, fearless and honest judge, especially kind and courteous to young members of the bar, and his figure stands out prominently among the heroes of the "Early Indiana Trials."

Charles H. Test followed Judge Eggleston on the bench, when he was not yet thirty years of age. He ranked among the ablest of his profession and practiced law a number of years after his retirement from the bench. Judge Test lived on his farm near Centerville, and was very fond of hunting and fishing and all outdoor amusements. He became a member of the state legislature, secretary of state, and later, when he removed to Indianapolis, judge of the criminal court of Marion county.

Samuel Bigger, the next circuit judge, came from Rushville. He was a solid, honest, fearless man, and after leaving the bench, served as governor of the state. Judge Bigger is described as a man over six feet high, with a fine face and commanding appearance, and an orator in great favor with the people. always closing his speeches with an eulogy of General Harrison.

David Kilgore followed Judge Bigger. Kilgore was popularly known as the "Delaware Chief", was highly successful as a practising lawyer and was a power as a stump speaker. He afterward served many years in congress.

Jeremiah Smith was one of the early settlers of Randolph county and the proprietor of the town of Union City. He was an energetic and vigorous lawyer and a competent judge, and acquired prominence in railroad building and management, becoming president of the Cincinnati, Union and Ft. Wayne, and the Evansville, Indianapolis & Cleveland Railroad Companies. Joseph Anthony, of Delaware county, was judge between the two terms of Judge Smith. John T. Elliott, of New Castle, followed Judge Smith. He was a sound and able lawyer and afterward became judge of the supreme court. His opinions rank among the best of the Indiana judges.

Silas Colgrove, a brigadier general of the Civil war, was appointed in 1864 by Governor Morton to fill out the unexpired term of Judge Elliott, who had been elected to the supreme bench. He was elected judge in the same year and served until 1871, and was again elected in 1873, serving another term of six years. Judge Colgrove's forte as a lawyer was his knowledge of men and his natural powers to command. He was clear-headed, fair and impartial, and while not profound in "book law," he was a man of excellent judgment, strong common sense and rarely made mistakes. He came to Winchester from Steuben county, New York, in 1837 and resided here until shortly before his death, when he returned east.

John J. Cheney, a former partner of Judge Colgrove, and of Thomas M. Browne, was serving as common pleas judge in 1873 when the legislature abolished that court, and was thereupon appointed judge of the twenty-fifth judicial circuit by Governor Hendricks. He served until the next regular election, when he refused to be a candidate again. Judge Cheney came to Winchester in 1852 from Greene county, Ohio.

He was more than forty years at the bar and was the highest and best type of "all-round" lawyer,—clear concise and brief in his pleadings, he had utter contempt for the redundancies and superfluous allegations which characterize the work of so many lawyers; he managed the trial of cases well, and although he was no orator, he was very effective with juries, impressing them invariably with his sincerity and seriousness. He maintained his high reputation on the bench. Judge Cheney was a man of high sense of honor and strict integrity, fond of home and family above all else; he had a strong sense of humor, and was loved and honored by all who knew him well. He died at Winchester in 1903.

Jacob M. Haynes, of Portland, served as common pleas judge of Randolph and Jay counties from 1856 to 1860, of Jay, Randolph, Blackford and Delaware from 1860 to 1870, and in the latter year was elected judge of the circuit composed of Jay, Randolph, Blackford and Wayne counties. Judge Haynes had a record of twenty-one continuous years on the bench and was a man of sterling qualities. He was said to be absolutely fair and impartial on the bench. Leander J. Monks occupied the bench of the Randolph Circuit Court continuously from 1878 to 1894. He was elected in 1894 as a supreme judge of the state and served as such until 1912. He was among the ablest of Indiana jurists, and his opinions, brief and pointed, are highly regarded. He has helped make much of the legal history of Randolph county and of Indiana. Although still a resident of Winchester, Judge Monks is now practising law in Indianapolis. A complete sketch of him is given elsewhere.

Garland D. Williamson, now of Ridgeville, served as judge by appointment of Governor Matthews from October to December, 1894. (Mr. Williams was a native of Pennsylvania, a soldier of the Civil war, and is now serving as postmaster at Ridgeville by appointment of President Wilson.) Albert O. Marsh, the regularly elected judge, took office at the beginning of 1895. Mr. Marsh had served as a captain in the Civil war with distinction, had been prosecuting attorney and a prominent figure in politics, and proved to be an able judge. He was a man of strong character and a successful lawyer. He served as judge until 1902, when he was appointed United States pension agent for Indiana. He died at Winchester in 1912. Judge Marsh was vigorous and forceful at the bar and on the bench; of commanding figure and impressive demeanor, and although not always understood, was always sincere and earnest, a conscientious and fearless lawyer and judge. He was an enthusiastic worker in politics, an eloquent speaker, and had an enviable record as a soldier.

In 1902 Governor Durbin appointed John W. Macy, at the time a practising attorney of Winchester, to fill the unexpired term of Judge Marsh who had been appointed pension agent for the state of Indiana, and at the fall election following, Judge Macy was elected without opposition. His term expiring at the end of 1908, he re-entered the law firm of Macy, Nichols and Bales, but was soon compelled to retire from the practice by ill health, and died in August, 1912. He was a veteran of the Civil war, an enthusiastic Republican, and a man of indomitable energy with but small ambition for himself. He was a successful lawyer and business man, with an almost superhuman capacity for hard work, and served the county well as judge.

Judge Macy was succeeded by James S. Engle, another Winchester attorney. Judge Engle had long been in the active practice of law and had met with marked success. His legal ability was of a high order, he was energetic and vigorous in his conduct of cases and was successful before juries, and as a judge he has proven tireless and efficient, rapidly dispatching the business of the court as it came before him. His term expires with the present year (1914).

Of the various probate judges who have been mentioned above, Smith Elkins, Edmund B. Goodrich, Zachariah Puckett, Beattie McClelland and George Debolt were perhaps the most prominent. Elkins was admitted to practise in the Randolph Circuit Court in 1833 and long enjoyed a lucrative practise at this bar. He served as probate judge from 1834 to 1836.

Edmund B. Goodrich came to Randloph county from Virginia in 1831, his father having been a judge in that state. He served as probate judge from 1836 to 1842.

Beattie McClelland was born and educated in Ireland and brought with him to the study and practice of law much of his native Irish wit. He was admitted to the bar here in 1839, was probate judge from 1842 to 1849 and practised at this bar until the beginning of the Civil war, when he moved to Columbus, Indiana. He was long in partnership with Moorman Way, was one of the most prominent of Randolph county attorneys, and was afterward elected and served as circuit judge in Bartholomew county.

George Debolt was the last probate judge of this county, serving from 1849 to 1852.

The common pleas court was of barely twenty years' duration. Its first judge, Nathan B. Hawkins, of Jay county, who had been admitted to practise at this bar in 1841, died in the year of his election, 1853. James Brown, his successor, was licensed to practise in Randolph county in 1846 and was on the common pleas bench from 1853 to 1854.

William A. Peelle, the next judge, came to Winchester in 1846 and became prosecuting attorney in 1848. He was on the bench from 1854 to 1860 and was twice afterward elected secretary of state. He removed to Centerville, Wayne county, in 1864, and practiced law there until the county-seat was changed to Richmond, after which he lived in that city. He also served as judge of the criminal court of Wayne county, and was a member of the legislature.

Jacob M. Haynes, of whom we have written above, followed Judge Peelle and served as common pleas judge until the court was abolished in 1873.

In mentioning the early lawyers who practised at this bar, it should be borne in mind that few of them lived in Randolph county; they came, generally on horseback, with other lawyers, and often riding with the circuit judge, were formally admitted to practise, and when their business was completed rode away to their homes or to other "court towns" in the circuit where they had business.

Alonzo L. Nichols has practiced law with marked success since 1889, excepting a four years' term as clerk of the Circuit Court, to which office he was elected in 1892. He has been active in church work and in all movements for moral and civic reform.

John W. Newton has won distinction as a trial lawyer, having been connected either on behalf of the prosecution or defense in many of the most important criminal cases tried in this county during the last twenty-five years.

Thomas W. Hutchens was formerly engaged in the teaching profession, but has practiced law in Winchester since 1893. He has served four years as deputy prosecuting attorney and has been twice elected mayor of Winchester.

Wesley O. Smith is a graduate of the Central Normal College and has been in the practice of law since 1886.

Silas A. Canada has long been prominent in legal and business circles. He has served as prosecuting attorney and has represented the county in two terms in the state legislature. He has often been called upon to act as special judge.

Clarkson L. Hutchens, former prosecuting attorney, is now in the Civil Service of the state. He was for a term postmaster of Winchester.

The first lawyer admitted was James Rariden, on October 12, 1818, and the following is the record of admissions as shown by the order books:
